P R E F A C E.

TH^O History wants not the most Solid Arguments that can be to recommend it to the Esteem of all, who wou'd attain a competent Knowledge of Mankind and the Affairs of the World, yet the Pleasure it affords is the general Inducement of its Readers, who for the most part are well enough content if they are but agreeably amus'd. That busie Humour which makes People curious to know what others have done, or are doing, which furnishes common Conversation, and puts every Body upon Enquiries after News, invites Men of Leisure and Taste to search the Records of their own and former Ages. But whatever be the Motive, 'tis hardly possible but the Time thus employ'd will be rewarded with some real Improvement, and he that reads will have no Cause to complain, if in the Event he find his Judgment encreas'd, tho' perhaps he only intended that his Fancy shou'd be entertain'd.

This is a considerable Advantage which History has in laying hold of Mens Natural Curiosity, and employing usefully a Passion which is not only exercis'd for the most part frivolously, and to no good, but often to very ill Purposes. The Rise and Fall of Empires, the gradual Changes in their Laws, Manners, Arts and Government, the surprizing Events and Revolutions in their Story, and the Conduct and Fortunes of particular Men, have all that can be to entertain a curious Mind; and there are few of so little Penetration, but are capable of drawing from such a Variety of Matter many proper Reflections, which may be serviceable in a private as well as publick Life. Besides which, 'tis no vain Supposition, that Mens Morals may be sometimes improv'd, together with their Understandings, and that the distinguish'd Characters of Vertue, which they find upon Record, may have somewhat of an assimilating Influence: For what we admire we are easily dispos'd to imitate, and let every one consult his own Breast, whether he does not feel it touch'd with a generous Sentiment of those Men who are represented to have accomplish'd great and worthy Designs, to have been the Authors of wise and good Counsels, or to have expos'd their Lives, and sacrific'd their Fortunes for the publick Good and Security.

Whatever may be said to the Advantage of History in general, is yet with better Reason to be affirm'd of the English History. 'Tis natural to all People, to have a Veneration for their Ancestors, and a more particular Desire to be inform'd of what pass'd on the same Scene, where themselves are now acting; and as England has been a Scene of as various and as memorable Transactions as most Parts of the World besides, an Account of these cannot but be equally agreeable to an English Reader. As for the useful Part, 'tis a Question easily resolv'd, Whether 'tis not most for any Man's Advantage, to be chiefly familiar with those Affairs to which he is nearest related? The Original of our Laws and Customs is a part of Knowledge so requisite to Men of Learning or of publick Employment, so necessary to the Understanding of our Constitution, Rights, and Liberties, and to the clearing of Controversies which daily happen in private Conversation as well as in Courts of Judicature; and Matters of Fact have such a Force in Precedents to all those that have any Share in the Legislature or Administration, or wou'd judge of either, that 'tis needless to prove what every Body owns. However it may not be improper to take Notice, that it has sometimes been reproach'd us by Foreigners, that the Humour of the English too often leads 'em abroad to learn the Curiosities of other Countries, before they have taken any Care to be tolerably inform'd of their own.

The mean and imperfect Performances of our most common Historians, is certainly the Reason why Many are more negligent of reading our Story than they would perhaps have been, if they had met with it better related. For tho' the Matter of History is the first thing to recommend it, the Form, which depends wholly on the Writer, is almost of equal Consequence; Now the Laws and Rules which the Criticks have prescrib'd for it, are so endless and refin'd, that it may reasonably be question'd, Whether the Character of a perfect Hero, or that of a perfect Historian, be the greater Chimæra, and 'twill be easily allow'd by those who well consider the Comparifon, that to record great Actions in the finest manner is a Task no less difficult than to perform 'em.

'Tis necessary, That all Readers of History shou'd be appris'd of this, that they may judge fairly as well as freely of the Authors they meet with, and not be so unreasonable in their Expectations, nor so prepossess'd by any great Names, as to look for what a Judge of Writing has stil'd on another Occasion,

A Faultless Monster that the World ne'er saw.

And whether a perfect Historian is not to be thought such, let it appear by this short Description. He is requir'd to be a Man born with all the Felicities of a lively penetrating Wit, and unbounded Genius: Form'd by great Study, Experience, and Practice in the World; one that is both a Scholar and a Man of Business; a good Geographer, Chronologist, Antiquary, Linguist; conversant in Courts, Councils, Treaties, in Affairs Military as well as Civil, and in short in every thing that is the Subject of History; furnish'd with all proper Materials and Records, and a perfect Master of all the Graces of the Language he writes in. This is a great deal, but not enough; for what is yet more extraordinary, he must have no Passions or Prejudices, but be a kind of Deity that from a Superior Orb looks unmov'd on Parties, Changes of State, and grand Revolutions. And you are to suppose him bless'd with Health, Leisure, an easie Fortune, and a stedfast Application to his Subject. After which, the Perfections requisite in his Performance are almost innumerable; a judicious Proportion of all the Parts of his Story; a beautiful Simplicity of Narration; a noble, yet unaffected Stile; few and significant Epithets; Descriptions lively, but not Poetical; Reflections short and proper; and lastly, besides a Multitude of Particulars, which cannot be mention'd here, a good Conduct thro' the whole, and an animating Spirit that may engage the Reader in every Action as if personally concern'd, and give him the firm Assurance that he sees things in their own Light and Colours, and not in those which the Art or Mistake of the Writer has brought upon 'em.

'Twou'd be easie to enlarge this Discourse; the Laws of History are all but the Dictates of good Sense, drawn out and methodis'd in Rules; of which a long detail may be found in * Books written purposely on this Subject. But what is here only touch'd, may suffice to represent the extream Difficulty of writing History. And the Difficulty much encreases, when the Subject is of so large a Scope as the general History of any Nation, which is esteem'd of all the several Kinds the greatest, as an Epick Poem is in Poetry. And as some will scarce allow, that there have been more than two Epick Poets, Homer and Virgil; so the Name and Honour of General Historians have been restrain'd by the Criticks to almost the same Number. Livy among the Ancients, and Mariana among the Moderns, are plac'd in the highest Rank, tho' others have their Parties and Favourers, and are allow'd many Beauties, which every one magnifies or lessens, according to his particular Relish.

But it has been a long Complaint, that whatever be the Difficulty of compiling a General History, other Nations have master'd it better than our own, which yet all the World knows has not been unfruitful of very great Men, in all Capacities, both of acting and Writing. Some Attempts have indeed been made, but with what Success is too well known; for 'tis not a tedious Chronicle fill'd with a World of frivolous Matter and minute Circumstances, tho' ever so true and faithful, nor a laborious Plunder of Libraries, Manuscripts, publick Rolls and Records, tho' put together by many Years Application in a cold and barren Stile, that will be valu'd as a History. No body, that is acquainted with our Performances in other Parts of Learning and Wit, in all which we are allow'd to equal most of our Neighbours, and in some to excel 'em, or that considers the Solidity and Vigor of Genius, which is the known Character of the English, can doubt but that we have had many among us of Qualifications for such a Work equal at least with any other Nation. But whether a modest Distrust of themselves, or want of Leisure and Encouragement, or whatever else has been the Impediment, it must be own'd we have not yet seen it done with Approbation; and if we may ever hope for it, 'tis perhaps a Happiness in Reserve, till the many Wonders of Her Majesty's most Wise, Just, and Fortunate Reign, shall have made the Glory of the English Annals compleat.

However, 'tis thought a Design of such Consequence cannot be well executed by one Man; and therefore || some have wish'd to see it carry'd on by a Society or Club of Men of Parts and Learning, some whereof are Masters of our ancient Languages, and others of the Modern; some vers'd in the Writings of the old Britains, Romans, Saxons, Danes, and others thoroughly acquainted with the Historians since the Conquest, some that know the Geography, and others the Law of the Realm, some that have been bred at Court, and others in the Camp; and that it shou'd be an Engagement generously enter'd into by Men of Leisure and Fortune. This indeed is a rational Project, and might probably succeed, if the Gentlemen cou'd be found, who are both willing and fit to engage in it. But few are drawn to laborious Tasks, or have Constancy enough to struggle with great Difficulties, when they are not animated by some other Motive than raising a Reputation to themselves, and doing a Service to the Publick.

P R E F A C E.

In the mean time, the present Collection is the nearest such a Design of any thing that has appear'd; for we are not so entirely at a Loss for a History of England, but that we have already many Parts of it by several Hands, in just Esteem; and these are the standing Authorities and Guides to which all Attempters in this Way must ever have Recourse. Many of 'em answer the Characters mention'd in that imaginary Society, and some had the additional Advantage of living in or near the times they describe, so that theirs may be reckon'd Pictures by the Life, which have usually the most of Spirit as well as the truest Likeness; whereas succeeding Hands, tho' they copy ever so skilfully, can scarce avoid losing much of the Force, and Justness, and Grace of the Original.

Their Reputation, as was hinted before, is not now to be made in the World, which is generally slow and sparing, and disagreed in distributing its Applause to Books even of the highest Merit, if their Authors are living. The procuring 'em severally was formerly found troublesome and expensive; some of 'em were scarce, and others had suffer'd by the multiplying of Editions and wanted a careful Correction; the Design of Printing 'em in this Method, so as to compose a compleat History of our Affairs has been for several Years recommended, and the Undertakers encourag'd to it by Letters from Eminent Hands in many Parts of the Kingdom; and to give it all proper Advantages, Care has been taken to procure many Manuscripts and Papers of Value, by means of which, and other Helps, such Additions have been made as were thought necessary for a Supplement or Illustration of the History. The Stiles of the English Authors, tho' some of 'em a little antiquated, are preserv'd according to their Originals, but the Latin Lives, Papers, Verses, &c. are translated for the Benefit of common Readers. If any one imagines the Difference of Stiles an Objection, others are of a contrary Opinion, and think that this Variety may divert and relieve the Mind, which is often tir'd by Voluminous Works by one Hand, tho' written ever so elegantly.

For the Times before William the First, tho' the Views of 'em have been less distinct than the rest, and in some Places look like Scenes of Fairy-Land, yet so much as could be trac'd and put into order, has been admirably done by Mr. John Milton, with whose Book this Collection begins. His great natural and acquir'd Parts, and his excelling in so many different kinds of Learning, besides his daring and uncommon Genius in Poetry, have made him generally look'd upon as one of the most extraordinary Persons that the last Age produc'd: And even the greatest Admirers of Antiquity have a particular Reason to rank him with most of the Ancients, whom he so nearly resembles. For this seems to be his distinguishing Character, and is agreeable to what Monsieur * Fontenelle observes, That "The Wit of one Climate more easily suffers transplanting into another, than its Trees and Fruit; and that tho' 'tis said there's more Diversity among Wits than Faces, yet one Face by stedfastly regarding another cannot take a new Resemblance, but Wit may. And 'tis thus, that People do not always retain the Turn of Thought which they derive from their Native Climate, but by reading Greek Books, become as it were ally'd to the Greeks."

Mr. Milton's History, as well as his Poetical Works, proves this; where, in his Thoughts and Language, he appears with the Majestick Air of old Greece or Rome. This makes him indeed look particular, and perhaps to some uncouth, like the Roman Architecture heretofore, when the Gothick was in Fashion. But whether his or the more Modern Diction be the best, let the Controversers of old and new Books decide as they please. 'Tis sufficient if his History, as was said, be the best Draught of those rude Times he chose to describe. His Abilities and Diligence to perform that part were unquestionable, and his Impartiality too, which would not have been, if he had written the History of later Times. Sir William Temple, tho' he has very ingeniously treated the same Subject, is not particular enough, and seems so much in haste to come to his Favourite Character of William the Norman, that the rest of his Book is indeed but an Introduction.

Mr. Daniel's History follows next, containing the Reigns of William I. and II. Henry I. King Stephen, Henry II. Richard I. King John, Henry III. Edward I, II, and III. The Author had a Place at Court in the Reign of King James I. being Groom of the Privy Chamber to the Queen, and seems to have taken all the Refinement a Court could give him. 'Tis said he had a good Vein in Poetry, and 'tis certain he has shewn great Judgment in keeping it, as he did, from infecting his Prose, and destroying that Simplicity which is a principal Beauty in the Style of an Historian. His Narration is smooth and clear, and carries every where an Air of good Sense and just Eloquence, and his English is much more Modern than Milton's, tho' he liv'd before him: But Mr. Milton chose to write (if the Expression may be allow'd) a hundred Years backward, whereas 'tis particularly to be admir'd how Mr. Daniel cou'd, so long ago, express himself with the same Purity and Grace as our most sensible Writers do now, tho' we flatter our selves that we have considerably improv'd the Language.

The Continuation of his History thro' the Reigns of Richard II. Henry IV, V, and VI. was so meanly perform'd by Mr. Trussel, and the Style so wretched, that there was a Necessity

cessity to have those Reigns new writ, which have therefore been done much larger and more exact, and after Mr. Daniel's Method. In this, and the former Work, and so throughout the first Volume, is added at the end of every Reign an Account of Eminent Men, and Remarkable Occurrences, from Hollingshead and others. That the like Method is omitted in the succeeding Volumes, is because 'twas thought unnecessary; for the Historians are larger, and have not omitted any worth mentioning, and the Index supplies it once for all.

The next Author is Mr. Habington, whose History is the best extant of Edward IV. No Reign afforded a Prospect of more surprizing Turns and Reverses of Fortune than this, all which he has largely and eloquently describ'd; yet to speak impartially, he seems to Moralize too much, and if he had been more sparing of his General Remarks and Sentences, the Thread of his Story wou'd have run off even: But this by the way, and with the utmost Deference to his excellent Performance, in which he has highly merited by painting in such lively Colours those Times of most remarkable Confusion.

Sir Thomas Moor, that learned Lord Chancellour of England, writ his History of the Short and Unhappy Reign of King Edward V. and of the Beginning of King Richard III. in Latin: His Masterly Command of the Delicacies of that Language, considerably help'd to spread his Fame all over Europe; but to render the Work more uniform, and of more general Use, there was a Necessity to have this carefully translated. Nothing can be said to add to the Author's great Reputation; his high Employments were conferr'd on him as well in Reward of his Learning as of his other Merit, by a King, who was known chiefly to value himself upon being a Scholar and a Judge of Books. In this Reign the Intrigues of the Protector and his Creatures against the young Princes are related with wonderful Clearness and Judgment in Affairs of State; the Speeches are sensible, and the Descriptions proper; that of King Richard's guilty Terrors after the Murther of his Nephews, is admirable; which is mention'd here, because 'tis certain, Description in History as well as in Poetry is a dangerous Part to manage, and the soonest betrays an affected and injudicious Writer.

Sir Thomas Moor left the Reign of Richard III. unfinish'd; the Supplement to it is therefore extracted out of Hall and Hollingshead; after which follows George Buck's Life of the same King, which makes this part of the History compleat. His Relation is particular, and very remarkable for the Pains he takes to wipe off the bloody Stains upon King Richard's Character, and to vindicate from common Imputation one of the blackest Reigns in all our Story. Whether he has done it with Reason or not, let the Reader judge; for there are various Opinions about it, and 'tis upon this Account that the Book-sellers were advis'd to print it. His Book indeed, tho' it were all Truth, is much too loosely writ for a History; 'tis pedantick and full of Harangue, and may more properly be call'd a Defence of King Richard than any thing else; yet as he is the only Advocate of Note that has appear'd in so odd a Cause, 'tis well worth the while to give him a Place here, tho' among so many of his Betters. In some things 'tis highly probable he has done that King but Justice; yet 'tis strange that he'll neither allow him to have had any Deformity in Mind or Body, for he is angry to find him describ'd by others crook-back'd, and of an ill Visage, and seems to be for reversing his Character throughout. 'Twas not fit to let this Work pass without some Animadversions; and, to set all things as much in the Light as possible: Mr. Stripe, an industrious Antiquary, has added large Notes and Remarks, from an Authentick Manuscript which he had by him, and from other Authors.

We come now to one of the most applauded Pieces of History that has ever been writ in our own or any other Language, either Ancient or Modern, the incomparable Lord Bacon's Life and Reign of King Henry VII. which, with the Reverence due to so great a Man, is printed here in his own Style without the Alteration of a Word. 'Tis impossible to exceed in his Praise: One may observe in him all the Depth of a Statesman and Philosopher, all the Ornament of a discreet Orator, and the Conduct of a just Historian. From him alone might sufficiently be learn'd the Idea of that true Sublime which enobles History; which consists rather in a Greatness of Thinking than in a Pomp of Expression, and is therefore reconcileable with that Simplicity requir'd too, tho' these are Beauties rarely seen united. He traces things with extraordinary Judgment, relates 'em with Clearness of Sense and good Connexion, and has the Secret of making every part of the Story instructive, without sprinkling it over with perpetual Adages and Observations, which retard it, and are the false Jewels for which Coquet Writers affect to be admir'd. Another masterly Excellence in him is, that he does not content himself with a superficial Narration, but enters deeper into his Subject, and discovers the Motives of Affairs, which every where seem true Representations, and not fanciful Conjectures; this is the more worthy of notice, because Tacitus, who is much admir'd for it by many, is by others thought to have over-acted the * Politician, and by too nice a Subtlety to have expounded the simplest Actions in the World into Design and Artifice. But as nothing is more improving than this way of writing when well manag'd, so it seems to be the Talent of a wise rather than of a cunning Head.

P R E F A C E.

'Tis remarkable that three of our Historians of greatest Fame (of whom two have their Works in this Collection) have been Lords High Chancellours of England, and 'tis certain the Qualifications which properly recommend Men to that Trust and Honour are such as make 'em likewise better capable than most others of writing a good English History.

The Notes which are added to the Lord Bacon's Book are chiefly extracted from that which was written by Sir James Ware, in Relation to the Affairs of Ireland, which was publish'd first in Latin at the End of the Antiquitates Hibernicae, in 8^o and afterwards turn'd into English, and printed lately with his other Works in Folio at Dublin. And this concludes the Account of the Historians in the first Volume.

The Second begins with the Ingenious Lord Herbert of Cherbury's Life of King Henry VIII. which for its great Reputation may well be compar'd with the Lord Bacon's. These two Historians seem by their Sense as well as Quality, of a Rank superiour to most others; for few besides have the Art of being particular in their Narration without growing flat and tiresome, and of making Remarks which are always worth the Reader's attending to, and no where offend by an unnatural or ambitious Air. The Lord Herbert, to qualifie him for this Undertaking, had an Education Military as well as Learned, the Improvement of Travel, and the Advantage of great Employments. He was of the Council to King James I. who, after he had employ'd him five Years in an Embassy to Louis XIII. of France, made him Baron of Castle-Island in Ireland. He afterwards serv'd King Charles I. both in the Field and in Council, and was by him created an English Peer. In order to write King Henry VIII's Life, he made a vast Collection of Manuscripts and other Materials; of which the Athenae Oxonienses mentions four thick Folio Volumes Vol. II. which that Author says he had seen. The Original Copy of his History, written by his own hand, is in the Possession of the University of Oxford, to which he presented it. 'Tis large and copious, as the multiply'd Affairs of a busie Reign requir'd; and as all Europe was concern'd in the Intrigues of those Times, the Politicks then were so intricate and variable, and of such an unusual Turn, that 'twas not possible for a common Hand to trace 'em; nor can we imagine that any one beside himself cou'd so happily have conquer'd the Difficulty he complains of, viz. To write that Prince's History of whom no one thing might constantly be affirm'd, and to draw his Picture well, who had several Countenances.

In this Edition the Pope's Bulls, the Letters, and other Pieces, which were in Latin before, are printed both in Latin and English.

The Life and Reign of King Edward VI. was written by Sir John Hayward, Doctor of Laws, and Historiographer to King James I. The same Hand had written the Reign of King Henry IV. but this of King Edward was publish'd after the Author's Death. 'Tis here printed with large Notes from a valuable Collection of Papers relating to the Reformation. 'Tis no wonder that in those Party-Times the Characters of many Persons and Circumstances of Affairs were left so variously and doubtfully represented as might mislead even a diligent Writer; wherefore an impartial Censure of this Author is prefix'd to his Book by Mr. Stripe, to which the Reader is referr'd.

The next is the Annals of Queen Mary, written originally by Francis Godwin Lord Bishop of Hereford, who together with this wrote likewise the Reigns of King Henry VIII. and King Edward VI. in Latin, for the Use of Foreigners. His Stile is grave and succinct, and he appears to have been a good Master of that Language, and a faithful and sensible Historian. His Son Morgan Godwin, Doctor of Laws, publish'd this Book afterwards in our own Tongue, with some Enlargements by the Author's Consent. That which is here printed is new translated in more modern English; and Mr. Stripe, who has a large Manuscript of this Queen's Reign, has likewise perform'd his Part by adding Notes, and has insert'd some few Passages in the Margin, which he has observ'd to be in the former English Edition.

The long and happy Reign of Queen Elizabeth is describ'd at large with the utmost Exactness by the Learned Mr. Cambden, call'd frequently the Prince of Modern Antiquaries. This elaborate Work was begun at the Instigation of his great Patron the Lord Treasurer Burghley in 1597. the same Year that Mr. Cambden was made Clarenceux King at Arms; but that Nobleman had only the Satisfaction and Honour of laying the first Stone of the Building, without living to see it in any Forwardness, for he dy'd the next Year. This Loss much afflicted Mr. Cambden, and interrupted his Design; and the Queen her self dying about five Years after, it remain'd for some time at a stand; but, in the Year 1608. he fell to it again with great Application, and never perhaps had any Man more universal Qualifications or greater Advantages. He had premeditated it many Years, his chief Study had long before been the Antiquities of his Native Country, and the Transactions

He

he was now to record were such as pass'd in his own Time; he began it slow, and after his Studies were ripe, and his Judgment in full Maturity; for his Britannia was first compleated, which left him wholly at Liberty, and better instructed for this Undertaking. He wanted no Helps from Men of the greatest Learning in England, who were proud of supplying him with Papers and Books; all Libraries were open to him, and if he had not been Master of an admirable Judgment for separating, chusing and digesting his Materials, the Variety must have put him in Confusion. The Queen's Collection of Writings, Letters, and Memorials, had been imparted to him by the Lord Burghley, who likewise furnish'd him with his own, and he afterwards receiv'd great Assistance from his Friend Sir Robert Cotton, all which he mentions in his Preface; but nothing could equal his own Industry and indefatigable Study, which was indeed wonderful.

For the Moral Qualifications of an Historian, such as Fidelity, Disinterest, and a sincere Affection to Truth, he has given all the Proofs of 'em that can be desir'd; For besides the Air of Probity, which is seen in his Annals, 'tis remarkable that he at first design'd they should not be publish'd in his Life time, but had bequeath'd 'em by Will to the Famous Thuanus, with whom he had a particular Friendship. However, he was prevail'd on to alter this Resolution, and in the Year 1615. came out the first Volume reaching to the Year 1589. It had the natural Effect of a well-writ Piece of Modern History, for it gain'd him much Applause, and many Enemies; which last, tho' a good Proof of his Merit, was a severe one, and discourag'd him from venturing abroad his Second Volume till the Year 1625. and then it was in a manner extorted from him by Importunity, after it had lain finish'd for a considerable time.

The Affairs of Spain, France, and Scotland, were much interwoven with those of England in that Queen's Reign, and consequently Mr. Cambden has given 'em their proper Place in his Composition. 'Twas his Character to leave nothing imperfect that his Art or Labour could compleat. In his manner of relating he rather chose to be Exact than Ornamental, and dispos'd his Matter into the plain Form of Annals, by that to excuse himself from all superfluous Finery. His Preface gives a very good Idea of his Book; and for the Particulars of his Life, the Reader may find 'em in Latin by Dr. Smith, printed with the Collection of Cambden's Letters, &c. and in English by Mr. Gibson, prefix'd to the last Edition of his Britannia. Several Translations have been made of these Annals from the Original Latin; but 'twas thought necessary to have 'em new translated, examin'd and corrected; in a just Regard to the Author's Reputation. His Sketch of the Annals of King James, tho' consisting only of short Heads, is likewise added in English, that nothing from so great a Hand might be omitted.

The last Historian, in the Second Volume, is Mr. Wilson, who wrote the Life of King James I. The Learned Dr. Welwood has been prevail'd with to add some Notes and Observations of his own upon it, and has furnish'd some few Original Papers relating to that Reign, which hitherto never saw the Light; all which Notes and Observations are printed at the bottom of the Pages. At the Beginning the Author has given us in course Rhime what he calls his own Picture, but in the Note there added the Reader will find it drawn with a truer Likeness than that which he drew himself, and with better Skill than can be done in this Preface.

For what remains to be said concerning the Third Volume, the Judicious and Accomplish'd Writer of it, has thought fit in his own Words to address the Publick as follows.

To the READER.

THIS Third and Last Volume of our English History requires but a short and easie Introduction to it. For here is no Collection of Writers, that need a Character and Account of them, as in the two former Volumes. This Continuation is a New Work done by a particular Hand, with a strict Regard to Truth and Justice.

Since the Period of the Second Volume, the Death of King James I. no one Reign hath been so exactly written; or at least brought into so just a Compass, as to deserve to be here intirely inserted. And therefore it was thought more fair and reasonable to draw up all the following Reigns into a New Prospect, just and proportionable, and not deceiving the Eye. The Person who draws it is not so delighted with it, as to value himself on the Performance: He did it for his own Diversion, rather than for the Satisfaction of the World. For he knows, that of all things History is least understood by the Generality of Mankind: And what is very strange, People are for the most part least able to judge of the History of their own Times: They have imperfect Remembrances, they have confused Notions, they have a Partiality to one side, and a Prejudice to another, they have their Presumptions, and their Conjectures, and like some distemper'd Heads have a Sight so uncertain, that it deceives them more than Blindness it self could do. For this Reason, no prudent Writer would set a Name to the History story of his own Times; for it is impossible to please, or to be thought impartial, till Posterity find out his plain and honest Dealing.

Therefore the Hand chiefly concern'd in those Papers withdraws it self from the Notice of the World, and does rest satisfied with its own Intention; which was to hold an Even Balance, and to let nothing turn it but Truth and Justice. A great Regard has been had to the excellent History written by my Lord Clarendon, which is far from serving any one side only; and the Characters which are the best Part of it are most of them here transcrib'd. The following Reigns are done with some few Discoveries of what had not been before publish'd in the general and common Affairs; the Story is told according to the best Writers, and very often in their very Words.

A D V E R T I S E M E N T.

SINCE this Book was near finish'd, it has been thought proper to add an Appendix to Mr. Camden's Life of Queen Elizabeth, in order to give farther Light into some weighty Matters. And there being nothing of it mention'd in the Index, a Catalogue of the Papers contain'd is here printed for the Reader's Satisfaction.

1. A Declaration of the Causes moving the Queen of England to give Aid to the Defence of the People afflicted and oppressed in the Low Countries, Vol. II. (654)
2. An Addition to the Declaration, touching the Slanders publish'd of Her Majesty, (658)
3. The Order of the Rites and Ceremonies used at the Consecration of the most Reverend Father in Christ, Matthew Parker Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Chapel at Lambeth; Sunday, December 17. 1559. (659)
4. The Answer of the Queen's Highness to the Petition propounded unto Her by the Lower House, concerning Her Marriage, Feb. 10th. 1558. (660)
5. The Petition of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal to Her Majesty, upon the two great Matters of Marriage and Succession, deliver'd by the Lord Keeper in Parliament, Nov. 5th. 1566. (661.)
6. Her Majesty's Answer, (663)
7. The Queen's Speech at the Dissolution of the Parliament, on Thursday, January 2d. 1566. ibid.
8. Reasons to prove the Queen's Majesty bound in Conscience to proceed with Severity, in the Case of the late Queen of Scots, (664)
9. An humble Petition to Her Majesty, and the Reasons gather'd out of the Civil Law, by certain appointed by Authority in Parliament to prove, that it standeth not only with Justice, but also with Her Majesty's Honour and Safety, to proceed criminally against the Pretended Scotch Queen, (667)
10. Reasons answering the former Arguments, (668)
11. Her Majesty's Speech at the Conclusion of the Parliament, March 29th 1585. (670)
12. The Petition of the Lords and Commons to the Queen, for the due and deserved Punishment of Death to be executed on Mary, commonly called Queen of Scots, for her most Execrable Treasons and Offences, (671)
13. A Memorial written by the Speaker's own Hand, containing Reasons to move Her Majesty to consent to the Execution of the Sentence against Mary late Queen of Scots, ibid.
14. The Queen's Speech at the Dissolution of the Parliament, April 10th 1593. (672)
15. The Speaker's Speech to the Queen in the Council Chamber, Nov. 30th 1601. and the Queen's Answer, (673)
16. The manner of the Execution of the Earl of Essex in the Tower of London, Feb. 25th 1600. with his Speech and Behaviour at the same, (674)

ENGLAND,

Continu'd to the Norman Conquest.

By Mr. JOHN MILTON.
BOOK I.

THE Beginning of Nations, those excepted of whom Sacred Books have spoken, is to this day unknown. Nor only the Beginning, but the Deeds also of many succeeding Ages, yea, periods of Ages, either wholly unknown, or obscur'd and blemish'd with Fables. Whether it were that the use of Letters came in long after, or were it the Violence of barbarous Inundations, or they themselves, at certain Revolutions of Time, fatally decaying, and degenerating into Sloth and Ignorance; whereby the Monuments of more ancient Civility have been some destroy'd, some lost. Perhaps dis-esteem and contempt of the Publick Affairs then present, as not worth recording, might partly be in cause. Certainly oft-times we see that wise Men, and of best Ability, have forbore to write the Acts of their own Days, while they beheld with a just loathing and disdain, not only how unworthy, how perverse, how corrupt, but often how ignoble, how petty, how below all History the Persons and their Actions were; who either by Fortune, or some rude Election, had attain'd as a fore Judgment, and Ignominy upon the Land, to have chief Sway in managing the Commonwealth. But that any Law, or Superstition of our old Philosophers the Druids, forbade the Britains to write their memorable Deeds, I know not why any out of Cæsar should alledge: He indeed Cæsar 1. 6. saith, that their Doctrine they thought not lawful to commit to Letters; but in most Matters else, both private and publick, among which well may History be reckon'd, they us'd the Greek Tongue: And that the British Druids, who taught those in Gaul, would be ignorant of any Language known and us'd by their Disciples, or so frequently writing other things, and so inquisitive into the highest, would for want of Recording be ever Children in the Knowledge of Times and Ages, is not likely. Whatever might be the reason, this we find, that of British Affairs, from the first Peopling of the Island, to the coming of Julius Cæsar, nothing certain, either by Tradition, History, or Ancient Fame, hath hitherto been left us. That which we have of oldest seeming, hath by the greater part of judicious Antiquaries been long rejected for a Modern Fable.

Nevertheless, there being others besides the first suppos'd Author, Men not unread, nor unlearned in Antiquity, who admit that for approved Story, which the former explode for Fiction; and seeing that oft-times Relations heretofore accounted fabulous, have been after found to contain in them many footsteps, and relicks of something true, as what we read in Poets of the Flood, and Giants little believ'd, till undoubted Witnesses taught us that all was not

* There are some Objections, and those not inconsiderable, against this Assertion. Græci literis utuntur, saith Cæsar: Which does not necessarily imply that they us'd the Greek Tongue, but only their Letters: For if he had meant the Language, he would have rather said, Græco sermone, or Græcâ linguâ. But this does not take off the difficulty neither: For if they made use of the Greek Letters, it had been but a poor contrivance of Cæsar's, to write to Cicero (in Gaul) in the Greek Character, for fear the Letter should be intercepted, and their Designs discovered. Hanc Græci conscriptam literis mittit, ne interceptâ epistolâ, nostrâ ab hostibus consilia cognoscantur, saith Cæsar, lib. 5. Now if the Druids (the great Ministers of State) us'd the Greek Character in their common business, why should Cæsar think, that this Character would conceal his Designs? The learned Selden believes Græci to have been foisted into that place of Cæsar, where he speaks of the Druids, (lib. 6.) and will have him mean no more, than that Religious Matters were never writ down, but in all Secular Affairs they made use of Writing: A Conjecture natural enough, and very probably true.

feign'd; I have therefore determin'd to bestow the telling over of these reputed Tales; be it for nothing else but in favour of our English Poets, and Rhetoricians, who by their Art will know how to use them judiciously.

I might also produce Examples, as Diodorus among the Greeks, Livy and others of the Latines, Polydore and Virunnius among our own Writers. But I intend not with Controversies and Quotations to delay or interrupt the smooth course of History; much less to argue and debate long who were the first Inhabitants, with what Probabilities, what Authorities each Opinion hath been upheld, but shall endeavour that which hitherto hath been needed most, with plain and lightsome brevity, to relate well and orderly things worth the noting, so as may best instruct and benefit them that read. Which imploring Divine Assistance, that it may redound to his Glory, and the good of the British Nation, I now begin.

That the whole Earth was inhabited before the Flood, and to the utmost point of habitable Ground, from those effectual words of God in the Creation, may be more than conjectur'd. Hence that this Island also had her Dwellers, her Affairs, and perhaps her Stories, even in that old World those many hundred Years, with much reason we may infer. After the Flood, and the dispersing of Nations, as they journey'd leisurely from the East, Gomer, the eldest Son of Japhet, and his Off-spring, as by Authorities, Arguments, and Affinity of divers Names is generally believ'd, were the first that peopl'd all these West and Northern Climes. But they of our own Writers, who thought they had done nothing, unless with all circumstance they tell us when, and who first set foot upon this Island, presume to name out of fabulous and counterfeit Authors a certain Samothbes or Dis, a fourth or sixth Son of Japhet, whom they make about two hundred years after the Flood, to have planted with Colonies, first the Continent of Celtica, or Gaul, and next this Island: Thence to have nam'd it Samothbea, to have reign'd here, and after him lineally four Kings, Magus, Saron, Druis, and Bardus. But the forg'd Berosus, whom only they have to cite, no where mentions that either he, or any of those whom they bring, did ever pass into Britain, or send their People hither. So that this out-landish figment may easily excuse our not allowing it the room here so much as of a British Fable.

That which follows, perhaps as wide from truth, though seeming less impertinent, is, That these Samothbeans, under the Reign of Bardus, were subdu'd by Albion a Giant, Son of Neptune: who call'd the Island after his own name, and rul'd it forty four years. Till at length passing over into Gaul, in aid of his Brother Lestrygon, against whom Hercules was hastening out of Spain into Italy, he was there slain in fight, and Berigon also his Brother.

Sure enough we are that Britain hath been anciently term'd Albion, both by the Greeks and Romans. And Mela the Geographer makes mention of a stony Shoar in Languedoc, where by report such a Battel was fought. The rest 'as his giving name to the Isle, or ever landing here depends altogether upon late furrifises. But too absurd, and too unconscionably gross is that fond invention that wast'd hither the fifty Daughters of a strange Dioclesian King of Syria; brought in doubtless by some illiterate pretender to something mistaken in the common poetical Story of Danaus King of Argos, while his Vanity, not pleas'd with the obscure beginning which truest Antiquity affords the Nation, labour'd to contrive us a Pedigree, as he thought, more noble. These Daughters, by appointment of Danaus on the Marriage-night, having murder'd all their Husbands, except Linceus, whom his Wife's Loyalty sav'd, were by him, at the suit of his Wife their Sister, not put to death, but turn'd out to Sea in a Ship unmann'd; of which whole Sex they had incurr'd the hate; and as the Tale goes, were driven on this Island. Where the Inhabitants, none but Devils, as some write, or as others, a lawless crew left here by Albion without Head or Governour, both entertain'd them, and had issue by them a second breed of Giants, who tyranniz'd the Isle till Brutus came.

The eldest of those Dames in their Legend they call Albina; and from thence, for which cause the whole Scene was fram'd, will have the same Albion deriv'd. Incredible it may seem, so sluggish a conceit should prove so ancient, as to be authoriz'd by the elder Ninnius, reputed to have lived above a thousand years ago. This I find not in him, but that Hiftion sprung of Japhet, had four Sons, Francus, Romanus, Al- Holinshed.
mannus, and Britto, of whom the Britains; as true, I believe, as that those other Nations whose Names are resembled, came of the other three; if these Dreams give not just occasion to call in doubt the Book it self, which bears that title.

Hitherto the things themselves have given A. M.
us a warrantable dispatch to run them soon 2855.
over. But now of Brutus and his Line, with the whole Progeny of Kings, to the entrance of Julius Caesar, we cannot so easily be discharg'd; Descents of Ancestry, long-continu'd Laws and Exploits, not plainly seeming to be borrow'd, or devis'd, which on the common belief have wrought no small impression: defended by many, deny'd utterly by few. For what though Brutus, and the whole Trojan pretence were yielded up, seeing they who first devis'd to bring us from some noble Ancestor, were content at first with Brutus the Consul; till better invention, although not willing to forego the name, taught them to remove it higher, into a more fabulous Age, and by the same remove lighting on the Trojan Tales, in affectation to make the Britain of one Original with the Roman, pitch'd there, yet those old and inborn Names of successive Kings, never any to have been real persons, or done in their lives, at least some part of what so long hath been remember'd, cannot be thought without too strict an incredulity.

^b Concerning the first Peopling of Britain, Mr. Cambden has given us as distinct an account, as can be drawn from probable conjectures, and as the great distance of Time and want of Records will allow. See his Britannia, the English Edition, p. 10.

^c 'Tis possible enough he might give name to the Isle, though he never landed here. Pliny tells us it was call'd Albion, to distinguish it from the Islands round Britain, which went under the general name of Britannica: and this likely enough was done by the Greeks, who delighted so much in fabulous Names.

^d That Romantick Story of Brutus and his Posterity, is fairly confuted by Mr. Cambden, English Edit. p. 6.

^e Leland has published a Vindication of the Story: and the Welsh are generally very unwilling to give it up for fabulous.

^f If the Britains are so fond of a Trojan Original, Mr. Cambden has pointed out a much better claim to it, than the Story of Brutus can give them: For the Romans (descended from the Trojans) by their long continuance in this Island, could not but have many inter-marriages with the Britains; whereby a great many Britains at this day must be of Roman, and by consequence, of Trojan Extraction.

For these, and those Causes above-mention'd, that which hath receiv'd Approbation from so many, I have chosen not to omit. Certain or uncertain, be that upon the Credit of those whom I must follow; so far as keeps aloof from impossible and absurd, attested by ancient Writers from Books more ancient, I refuse not, as the due and proper Subject of Story. The principal Author is well known to be Geoffrey of Monmouth; what he was, and whence his Authority, who in his Age, or before him have deliver'd the same Matter, and such like general Discourses, will better stand in a Treatise by themselves. All of them agree in this, that Brutus was the Son of Silvius, he of Ascanius, whose Father was Aeneas a Trojan Prince, who at the burning of that City, with his Son Ascanius, and a collected Number that escap'd, after long wandering on the Sea, arriv'd in Italy. Where at length, by the Assistance of Latinus King of Latium, who had given him his Daughter Lavinia, he obtain'd to succeed in that Kingdom, and left it to Ascanius, whose Son Silvius (though Roman Histories deny Silvius to be the Son of Ascanius) had married secretly a Niece of Lavinia.

Westminster.

She being with Child, the Matter became known to Ascanius. Who commanding his Magicians to enquire by Art, what Sex the Maid had conceiv'd; had answer, That it was one who should be the Death of both his Parents; and banish'd for the Fact, should after all in a far Country attain to highest Honour. The Prediction fail'd not, for in Travail the Mother dy'd. And Brutus (the Child was so call'd) at fifteen Years of Age, attending his Father to the Chace, with an Arrow unfortunately kill'd him.

Banish'd therefore by his Kindred, he retires into Greece. Where meeting with the Race of Helenus, King Priam's Son, held there in servile Condition by Pandrasus, then King; with them he abides: For Pyrrhus in Revenge of his Father slain at Troy, had brought thither with him Helenus, and many others, into Servitude. There Brutus, among his own Stock so thrives in Virtue, and in Arms, as renders him belov'd by Kings, and great Captains, above all the Youth of that Land. Whereby the Trojans not only begin to hope, but secretly to move him, that he would lead them the way to Liberty. They alledge their Numbers, and the promis'd Help of Assaracus, a Noble Greekish Youth, by the Mother's Side a Trojan; whom for that Cause his Brother went about to dispossess of certain Castles bequeath'd him by his Father. Brutus considering both the Forces offer'd him, and the Strength of those Holds, not unwillingly consents.

First therefore, having fortify'd those Castles, he, with Assaracus, and the whole Multitude, betake them to the Woods and Hills, as the safest Place from whence to expostulate; and in the Name of all sends to Pandrasus this Message; That the Trojans holding it unworthy their Ancestors to serve in a Foreign Kingdom, had retreated to the Woods; chusing rather a savage Life, than a slavish: If that displeas'd him, that then with his Leave they might depart to some other Soil.

As this may pass with good Allowance, that the Trojans might be many in these Parts; for Helenus was by Pyrrhus made King of the Chalcians, and the Sons of Pyrrhus by Andromache, Hector's Wife, could not but be powerful through all Epirus; so much the more it may be doubted

how these Trojans could be thus in Bondage, 2855. where they had Friends and Country-men so potent. But to examine these things with Diligence, were but to confute the Fables of Britain with the Fables of Greece or Italy; for of this Age, what we have to say, as well concerning most other Countries, as this Island, is equally under Question. Be't how it will, Pandrasus not expecting so bold a Message from the Sons of Captives, gathers an Army: And marching toward the Woods, Brutus, who had notice of his Approach nigh to a Town call'd Sparatium, (I know not what Town, but certainly of no Greek Name) over Night planting himself there with good part of his Men, suddenly sets upon him, and with Slaughter of the Greeks, pursues him to the Passage of a River, which mine Author names Akalon, meaning perhaps Achelous, or Acheron: Where at the Ford he overlays them afresh. This Victory obtain'd, and a sufficient Strength left in Sparatium, Brutus with Antigonus, the King's Brother, and his Friend Anacletus, whom he had taken in the Fight, returns to the residue of his Friends in the thick Woods. While Pandrasus with all speed recollecting, besieges the Town. Brutus to relieve his Men besieg'd, who earnestly call'd him, distrusting the Sufficiency of his Force, bethinks himself of this Policy. Calls to him Anacletus, and threatening instant Death else both to him and his Antigonus, enjoins him, that he should go at the second Hour of Night to the Greekish League, and tell the Guards he had brought Antigonus by stealth out of Prison to a certain Woody Vale; unable through the Weight of his Fetters to move further; entreating them to come speedily and fetch him in. Anacletus, to save both himself and his Friend Antigonus, swears this; and at a fit Hour sets out alone toward the Camp: Is met, examin'd, and at last unquestionably known. To whom, great Profession of Fidelity first made, he frames his Tale, as had been taught him: And they now fully assur'd, with a credulous Rashness leaving their Stations, far'd accordingly by the Ambush that there awaited them. Forthwith Brutus dividing his Men into three parts, leads on in Silence to the Camp; commanding first each part at a several Place to enter, and forbear Execution, till he with his Squadron possess'd of the King's Tent, gave Signal to them by Trumpet. The Sound whereof no sooner heard, but huge havock begins upon the sleeping, and unguarded Enemy; whom the besieged also now sallying forth, on the other side, assail. Brutus the while had special Care to seize and secure the King's Person; whose Life still within his Custody, he knew was the surest Pledge to obtain what he should demand. Day appearing, he enters the Town, there distributes the King's Treasure, and leaving the Place better fortify'd, returns with the King his Prisoner to the Woods. Strait the ancient and grave Men he summons to Counsel, what they should now demand of the King.

After long Debate, Mempricius, one of the gravest, utterly dissuading them from Thought of longer stay in Greece, unless they meant to be deluded with a subtle Peace, and the awaited Revenge of those whose Friends they had slain, advises them to demand first the King's Eldest Daughter Imogen in Marriage to their Leader Brutus, with a rich Dowry, next Shipping, Mo-

* Nennius, who liv'd in the 7th Century, makes the Island to be first inhabited by Bruto, Son to Ascanius and Grandson to Aeneas; who, as he supposes, reign'd in Britain at the Time when Eli judg'd Israel, about the Year of the World, 2830. Sigebertus Gemblasensis, a French Monk, who liv'd 20 Years before Geoffrey of Monmouth, writes, that Brute pass'd from Gaul into Britain; and Henry Huntington, Contemporary with Geoffrey, is of Opinion that Britain was Peopled by Brute.

2855. ney, and fit Provision for them all to depart the Land.

This Resolution pleasing best, the King now brought in, and plac'd in a high Seat, is briefly told, that on these Conditions granted, he might be free; not granted, he must prepare to die.

Press'd with Fear of Death, the King readily yields, especially to bestow his Daughter on whom he confess'd so Noble and so Valiant: Offers them also the Third part of his Kingdom, if they like to stay; if not, to be their Hostage himself, till he had made good his Word.

The Marriage therefore solemniz'd, and Shipping from all Parts got together, the Trojans in a Fleet, no less written than three Hundred four and Twenty Sail, betake them to the wide Sea; where with a prosperous Course two Days and a Night bring them on a certain Island, long before dispos'd and left wast by Sea-Rovers; the Name whereof was then Leogecia, now unknown. They who were sent out to discover, came at length to a ruin'd City, where was a Temple and Image of Diana that gave Oracles: But not meeting first or last save wild Beasts, they return with this notice to their Ships: Wishing their General would enquire of that Oracle what Voyage to pursue.

Consultation had, Brutus taking with him Germanus his Diviner, and twelve of the ancientest, with wonted Ceremonies before the inward Shrine of the Goddess, in Verse, as it seems the manner was, utters his Request, Divia potens nemo-rum, &c.

*Goddeſs of Shades, and Huntreſs, who at will Walk'ſt on the rolling Sphere, and thro' the deep,
On thy third Reign the Earth look now and tell
What Land, what Seat of Reſt thou bid'ſt me ſeek,
What certain Seat, where I may worſhip thee
For aye, with Temples vow'd, and Virgin Quires.*

To whom ſleeping before the Altar, Diana in a Viſion that Night thus answer'd, Brute, ſub occafum Solis, &c.

*Brutus, far to the Weſt, in th' Ocean wide Beyond the Realm of Gaul, a Land there lies:
Sea-girt it lies, where Giants dwelt of old,
Now void, it fits thy People; thither bend
Thy Courſe, there ſhalt thou find a laſting Seat,
There to thy Sons another Troy ſhall riſe,
And Kings be born of thee, whoſe dreaded Might Shall awe the World, and conquer Nations bold.*

These Verses originally Greek, were put in Latin, ſaith Virumius, by Gildas a British Poet, and him to have liv'd under Claudius. Which granted true, adds much to the Antiquity of this Fable; and indeed the Latin Verses are much better, than for the Age of Geoffrey ap Arbur, unless perhaps Joſeph of Exeter, the only smooth Poet of those Times, befriended him. In this Diana over-shot her Oracle thus ending, Iſſis totius terra ſubditus orbis erit, That to the Race of Brute, Kings of this Island, the whole Earth shall be subject.

But Brutus guided now, as he thought, by Divine Conduct, speeds him towards the West; and after some Encounters on the Aſic Side, arrives at a Place on the Tyrrhene Sea, where he happens to find the Race of those Trojans, who with Antenor, came into Italy; and Corineus, a Man much fam'd, was their Chief: Though by ſever Authors it be reported, that those Trojans with Antenor, were ſeated on the other ſide of 2855.

Italy on the Adriatic, not the Tyrrhene Shoar. But these joyning Company, and paſt the Herculean Pillars, at the Mouth of Ligeris in Aquitania caſt Anchor. Where after ſome Diſcovery made of the Place, Corineus hunting nigh the Shoar with his Men, is by Meſſengers of the King Goffarius Picus met, and queſtion'd about his Errand there. Who not anſwering to their Mind, Imbertus, one of them, lets fly an Arrow at Corineus, which he avoiding, ſlays him: And the Picarian himſelf hereupon levying his whole Force, is overthrown by Brutus and Corineus; who with the Battle Ax, which he was wont to manage againſt the Tyrrhene Giants, is ſaid to have done Marvels. But Goffarius having drawn to his Aid the whole Country of Gaul, at that time govern'd by Twelve Kings, puts his Fortune to a ſecond Trial, wherein the Trojans, over-born by Multitude, are driven back, and beſieg'd in their own Camp, which by good Foreſight was ſtrongly ſituate. Whence Brutus unexpectedly iſſuing out, and Corineus in the mean while, whoſe Device it was, aſſaulting them behind from a Wood, where he had convey'd his Men the Night before, the Trojans are again Victors, but with the Loſs of Turon a valiant Nephew of Brutus; whoſe Aſhes left in that Place, gave Name to the City of Tours, built there by the Trojans. Brutus finding now his Powers much leſſen'd, and this yet not the Place foretold him, leaves Aquitain, and with an eaſie Courſe, * arriving at Totneſs in Devonſhire, quick-ly perceives here to be the promis'd End of his Labours.

The Island, not yet Britain, but Albion, was in a manner deſart and inhospitable; kept only by a Remnant of Giants; whoſe exceſſive Force and Tyranny had conſum'd the reſt. Them Brutus deſtroys, and to his People divides the Land, which with ſome Reference to his own Name he thenceforth calls Britain. To Corineus, Cornwall, as we now call it, fell by Lot; the rather by him lik'd, for that the hugeſt Giants, in Rocks and Caves were ſaid to lurk ſtill there; which kind of Monſters to deal with was his old Exerciſe.

And here, with Leave beſpoken, to recite a grand Fable, though dignify'd by our beſt Poets; while Brutus on a certain Feſtival Day ſolemnly kept on that Shoar, where he firſt landed, was with the People in great Jollity and Mirth, a Crew of theſe Savages breaking in upon them, began on the ſudden another ſort of Game than at ſuch a Meeting was expected. But at length by many hands overcome, Goemagog the hugeſt, in height twelve Cubits, is reſerv'd alive; that with him Corineus, who deſir'd nothing more, might try his Strength; whom in a Wreſtle the Giant catching aloft, with a terrible hugg broke three of his Ribs: Nevertheleſs Corineus enrag'd, heaving him up by main Force, and on his Shoulders, bearing him to the next high Rock, threw him headlong all ſhatter'd into the Sea, and left his Name on the Cliff, call'd ever ſince Langoemagog, which is to ſay, the Giant's Leap.

After this, Brutus in a choſen place builds Troja Nova, chang'd in time to Trinovantum, now London, and began to enact Laws; Heli being then High Prieſt in Judea; and having govern'd the whole Iſle 24 Years, dy'd, and was buried in his new Troy. His three Sons Lochrine, Albanaſt and Camber, divide the Land by Conſent. Lochrine had the middle part Loegria;

* The time of his Landing is ſuppos'd to be about 1200 Years after the Flood, A. M. 2830.

† He gives it a Latin Name, tho' that Language was not then us'd in Italy.

2855. Camber possess'd Cambria or Wales; Albanact, Albania, now Scotland. But he in the end by Humber, King of the Hunns, who with a Fleet invaded that Land, was slain in Fight, and his People driven back into Loegria. Lochrine and his Brother go out against Humber; who now marching onward, was by them defeated, and in a River drown'd, which to this Day retains his Name. Among the Spoils of his Camp and Navy, were found certain young Maids, and Estrildis, above the rest, palling fair, the Daughter of a King in Germany, from whence Humber, as he went wafting the Sea-Coast, had led her Captive: Whom Lochrine, though before contracted to the Daughter of Corineus, resolves to marry. But being forc'd and threaten'd by Corineus, whose Authority and Power he fear'd; Guendolen the Daughter he yields to marry, but in secret loves the other; and oft-times retiring as to some private Sacrifice, through Vaults and Passages made under Ground; and seven Years thus enjoying her, had by her a Daughter equally fair, whose Name was Sabra. But when once his Fear was off by the Death of Corineus, not content with secret Enjoyment, divorcing Guendolen, he made Estrildis now his Queen. Guendolen all in Rage departs into Cornwall, where Madan, the Son she had by Lochrine, was hitherto brought up by Corineus his Grand-father. And gathering an Army of her Father's Friends and Subjects, gives Battle to her Husband by the River Sture; wherein Lochrine shot with an Arrow ends his Life. But not so ends the Fury of Guendolen, for Estrildis, and her Daughter Sabra she throws into a River; and to leave a Monument of Revenge, proclaims, that the Stream be thenceforth call'd after the Damfel's Name; which by length of time is chang'd now to Sabrina, or Severn.

15 Years she governs in behalf of her Son, then resigning to him at Age, retires to her Father's Dominion. This, saith my Author, was in the Days of Samuel. Madan hath the Praise to have well and peacefully rul'd the Space of 40 Years; leaving behind him two Sons, Mempricius and Malim. Mempricius had first to do with the Ambition of his Brother, aspiring to share with him in the Kingdom; whom therefore at a Meeting to compose Matters, with a Treachery which his Cause needed not, he slew.

Nor was he better in the sole Possession, whereof so ill he could endure a Partner, killing his Nobles, and those especially next to succeed him; till lastly given over to unnatural Lust, in the twentieth of his Reign, hunting in a Forest, he was devour'd by Wolves.

2969. His Son Ebranc, a Man of mighty Strength and Stature, reign'd 40 Years. He first after Brutus wasted Gaul; and returning rich and prosperous, builded Caerebranc, now York; in Albania, Alchud; Mount Agned, or the Castle of Maidens, now Edinburgh. He had 20 Sons and 30 Daughters by 20 Wives. His Daughters he sent to Silvius Alba into Italy, who bestow'd them on his Peers of the Trojan Line. His Sons under the leading of Assaracus their Brother, won them Lands and Signiories in Germany, thence call'd, from these Brethren, Germania: a Derivation too hastily suppos'd, perhaps before the Word Germanus or the Latin Tongue was in use. Some who have describ'd Henault, as Jacobus Bergomas, and Lessabeus, are cited to affirm that Ebranc in his War there was by Brunchildis Lord of Henault put to the worse.

Brutus therefore surnamed Greenshield succeeding to repair his Father's Losses, as the same Lessabeus reports, fought a second Battle in Henault with Brunchild at the Mouth of Scaldis, and encamp'd on the River Hanaa. Of which 3000. our Spencer also thus sings.

*Let Scaldis tell, and let tell Hania,
And let the Marsh of Esthambruges tell
What Colour were their Waters that same Day,
And all the Moor 'twixt Elvertham and Dell,
With Blood of Henelois which therein fell;
How oft that Day did sad Brunchildis see
The Greenshield dy'd in dolorous Vermeil, &c.*

But Henault, and Brunchild, and Greenchild seem newer Names than for a Story pretended thus Ancient.

Him succeeded Leir, a Maintainer of Peace 3022. and Equity; but slacken'd in his latter End, whence arose some civil Discord. He built in the North Caerliel, in the Days of Solomon.

Rudbuddibras, or Hudibras, appeasing the Com- 3043. motions which his Father could not, founded Caerkeynt or Canterbury, Caerguent, or Winchester, and Mount Paladur, now Septonia or Shaftsbury: But this by others is contradicted.

Eladud his Son built Caerbados or Bath, and 3085. those Medicinal Waters he dedicated to Minerva, in whose Temple there he kept Fire continually burning. He was a Man of great Invention, and taught Necromancy: Till having made him Wings to fly, he fell down upon the Temple of Apollo in Trinovant, and so dy'd after Twenty Years Reign.

Hitherto from Father to Son the direct Line 3105. hath run on: But Leir, who next reign'd, had only three Daughters, and no Male Issue: Govern'd laudably, and built Caer-Leir, now Leicester on the Bank of Sora. But at last, failing through Age, he determines to bestow his Daughters, and so among them to divide his Kingdom. Yet first to try which of them lov'd him best (a Trial that might have made him, had he known as wisely how to try, as he seem'd to know how much the trying behov'd him) he resolves a simple Resolution, to ask them solemnly in order; and which of them should profess largest, her to believe. Gonoril, the Eldest, apprehending too well her Father's Weakness, makes answer, invoking Heaven, That she lov'd him above her Soul. Therefore, quoth the old Man over-joy'd, since thou so honour'st my declined Age, to thee and the Husband whom thou shalt chuse, I give the third part of my Realm. So fair a speeding for a few Words soon utter'd, was to Regan the second, ample Instruction what to say. She on the same Demand spares no protesting, and the Gods must witness, that otherwise to express her Thoughts she knew not, but that she lov'd him above all Creatures; and so receives an equal Reward with her Sister. But Cordeilla the youngest, though hitherto best belov'd, and now before her Eyes the rich and present Hire of a little easie soothing, the Danger also, and the Loss likely to betide plain Dealing, yet moves not from the solid Purpose of a sincere and vertuous Answer. Father, saith she, my Love towards you is as my Duty bids; what should a Father seek? What can a Child promise more? they who pretend beyond this, flatter. When the old Man, sorry to hear this, and wishing her to recall those Words, persisted asking; with a Loyal Sadness at her Father's Infirmitie, but something on the sudden harsh, and glancing rather at her Sisters, than speaking her own Mind, Two ways only, saith she, I have to answer what you require me; the former, your Command is, I should recant; accept then this other which is left me; look how much you have, so much is your Value, and so much I love you. Then bear thou, quoth Leir, now all in a Passion, what thy Ingratitude

3105. Ingratitude hath gain'd thee; because thou hast not reverenc'd thy aged Father equal to thy Sisters, part in my Kingdom, or what else is mine reckon to have none. And without delay gives in Marriage his other Daughters, Gonnil to Maglaunus Duke of Albania, Regan to Hemmus Duke of Cornwall; with them in present half his Kingdom; the rest to follow at his Death. In the mean while Fame was not sparing to divulge the Wisdom, and other Graces of Cordeilla, inso much that Aganippus a great King in Gaul (however he came by his Greek Name) seeks her to Wife, and nothing alter'd at the Loss of her Dowry, receives her gladly in such manner as she was sent him. After this, King Leir, more and more drooping with Years, became an easie Prey to his Daughters and their Husbands; who now by daily Encroachment had seiz'd the whole Kingdom into their hands, and the old King is put to sojourn with his Eldest Daughter, attended only by three score Knights. But they in a short while grudg'd at, as too numerous and disorderly for continual Guests, are reduc'd to Thirty. Not brooking that Affront, the old King betakes him to his second Daughter: But there also Disorder soon arising between the Servants of differing Masters in one Family, five only are suffer'd to attend him. Then back again he returns to the other; hoping that she his Eldest could not but have more Pity on his gray Hairs: But she now refuses to admit him unless he be content with one only of his Followers. At last the Remembrance of his youngest, Cordeilla, comes to his Thoughts; and now acknowledging how true her Words had been, though with little Hope from one he had so injur'd, be it but to pay her the last Recompence she can have from him, his Confession of her wife forewarning, that so perhaps his Misery, the Proof and Experiment of her Wisdom, might something soften her, he takes his Journey into France. Now might be seen a Difference between the silent and downright spoken Affection of some Children to their Parents, and the talkative Obsequiousness of others; while the Hope of Inheritance over-acts them, and on the Tongues end enlarges their Duty. Cordeilla out of mere Love, without the Suspicion of expected Reward, at the Message only of her Father in Distress, pours forth true filial Tears. And not enduring either that her own, or any other Eye should see him in such forlorn Condition as his Messenger declar'd, discreetly appoints one of her most trusty Servants, first to convey him privately toward some good Sea Town, there to array him, bath him, cherish him, furnish him with such Attendants and State, as becom'd his Dignity. That then, as from his first Landing, he might send word of his Arrival to her Husband Aganippus. Which done with all mature and requisite Contrivance, Cordeilla with the King her Husband, and all the Barony of his Realm, who then first had News of his passing the Sea, go out to meet him; and after all honourable and joyful Entertainment, Aganippus, as to his Wife's Father, and his Royal Guest, surrenders him, during his abode there, the Power and Disposol of his whole Dominion: Permitting his Wife Cordeilla to go with an Army, and set her Father upon his Throne. Wherein her Piety so prosper'd, as that she vanquish'd her impious Sisters with those Dukes, and Leir again, as saith the Story, three Years obtain'd the Crown. To whom dying, Cordeilla with all Regal Solemnities gave Burial in the Town of Leicester. And then as right Heir succeeding, and her Husband dead, rul'd the Land five Years in Peace; until Marganus and Cunedagius, her two Sisters Sons, not bearing that a Kingdom should be govern'd by a Woman, in the unseasonablest time to raise that Quarrel against a Woman so worthy, make War against her, depose her, and imprison her; of which impatient, and now long unexercis'd to suffer, she there, as is related, kill'd her self. The Victors between them part the Land: But Marganus the Eldest Sister's Son who held by Agreement from the North-side of Humber to Catbness, incited by those about him, to invade all as his own Right, wars on Cunedagius, who soon met him, overcame, and overtook him in a Town of Wales, where he left his Life, and ever since his Name to the Place.

Cunedagius was now sole King, and govern'd with much Praise many Years, about the time when Rome was built.* Him succeeded Rivallo his Son, wife also and fortunate; save what they tell us of three Days raining Blood, and Swarms of stinging Flies, whereof Men dy'd. In order then Gurgustius, Jago or Lago, his Nephew; Sifilius, Kinmarcus. Then Gorbogudo, whom others name Gorbodego, and Gorbodion, who had two Sons, Ferrex and Porrex. They in the old Age of their Father falling to contend who should succeed, Porrex attempting by Treachery his Brother's Life, drives him into France; and in his return, though aided with the Force of that Country, defeats and slays him. But by his Mother Videna who less lov'd him, is himself, with the Assistance of her Women, soon after slain in his Bed: With whom ended, as is thought, the Line of Brutus; whereupon, the whole Land with civil Broils was rent into Five Kingdoms, long time waging War on each other; and some say 50 Years. At length Dunwallo Molmutius, the Son of Cloten King of Cornwall, one of the foresaid five, excelling in Valour, and Goodliness of Person, after his Father's Decease found means to reduce again the whole Island into a Monarchy: Subduing the rest at Opportunities. First Immer King of Loegria whom he slew; then Rudaucus of Cambria, Staterius of Albania, confederate together. In which Fight Dunwallo is reported, while the Victory hung doubtful, to have us'd this Art. He takes with him 600 stout Men, bids them put on the Armour of their slain Enemies, and so unexpectedly approaching the Squadron, where those two Kings had plac'd themselves in Fight, from that part which they thought securest, assaults and dispatches them. Then displaying his own Ensigns, which before he had conceal'd, and sending notice to the other part of his Army what was done, adds to them new Courage, and gains a final Victory. This Dunwallo was the first in Britain that wore a Crown of Gold; and therefore by some reputed the first King. He established the Molmutine Laws, famous among the English to this Day; written long after in Latin by Gildas, and in Saxon by King Alfred; so saith Geoffrey; but Gildas denies to have known ought of the Britains before Cesar, much less knew Alfred. These Laws, whoever made them, bestow'd on Temples the Privilege of Sanctuary; to Cities also, and the ways thither leading, yea to Plows

* Romulus built Rome A. M. 3198. Tall. Tab.

^b Sifilius reign'd before Lago, who according to Mr. Tallent's Chronological Tables succeeded him A. M. 3336, and was succeeded by Kimmachus or Kinmarcus, A. M. 3364.

^c The Line of Brutus reign'd in this Island, according to Geoffrey of Monmouth's Account, 650 Years.

3565. granted a kind of like Refuge: And made such Riddance of Thieves and Robbers, that all Passages were safe. Forty Years he govern'd alone, and was buried nigh to the Temple of Concord; which he, to the Memory of Peace restor'd, had built in Trinovant.

His two Sons, Belinus and Brennus, contending about the Crown, by Decision of Friends came at length to an accord; Brennus to have the North of Humber, Belinus the Sovereignty of all. But the younger not long so contented, that he, as they whisper'd to him, whose Valour had so oft repell'd the Invasions of Ceulphus the Morine Duke, should now be subject to his Brother, upon new Design sails into Norway; enters League and Affinity with Elfing that King; which Belinus perceiving, in his Absence dispossesses him of all the North. Brennus with a Fleet of Norwegians makes toward Britain; but encounter'd by Guthlac the Danish King, who laying claim to his Bride, pursu'd him on the Sea, his haste was retarded, and he bereft of his Spouse: Who from the Fight by sudden Tempest, was by the Danish King driven on Northumberland, and brought to Belinus. Brennus nevertheless recollecting his Navy, lands in Albania, and gives Battle to his Brother in the Wood Calaterium; but losing the Day, escapes with one single Ship into Gaul. Mean while the Dane upon his own Offer to become tributary, sent home with his new Prize, Belinus returns his Thoughts to the administering of Justice, and the perfecting of his Father's Laws; and to explain what High-ways might enjoy the foresaid Privileges, he caus'd to be drawn out and pav'd four main Roads to the utmost Length and Breadth of the Island, and two others athwart; which are since attributed to the Romans. Brennus on the other side soliciting to his Aid the Kings of Gaul, happens at last on Seginus Duke of the Allobroges, where his Worth and Comeliness of Person won him the Duke's Daughter and Heir. In whose Right he shortly succeeding, and by obtain'd Leave passing with a great Host through the length of Gaul, gets footing once again in Britain. Nor was Belinus unprepared, and now the Battle ready to joyn, Conuenna the Mother of them both, all in a Fright, throws her self between, and calling earnestly to Brennus her Son, whose absence had so long depriv'd her of his Sight, after Embracements and Tears, assails him with such a Motherly Power, and the mention of things so dear and reverend, as irresistibly wrung from him all his Enmity against Belinus.

Then are hands joyn'd, Reconciliation made firm, and Counsel held to turn their united Preparations on foreign Parts. Thence that by these two all Gallia was over-run, the Story tells; and what they did in Italy, and at Rome, if these be they, and not Gauls, who took that City, the Roman Authors can best relate. So far from home I undertake not for the Monmouth Chronicle; which here against the Stream of History, carries up and down these Brethren, now into Germany, then again to Rome, pursuing Gabius and Porfena two unheard of Consuls. Thus much is more generally believ'd, that both this Brennus, and another famous Captain, Britomarus, whom the Epitomist Florus and others mention, were not Gauls but Britains; the Name of the first in that Tongue signifying a King, and of the other a great Britain. However, Belinus after a while returning home, the rest of his Days rul'd in Peace, Wealth and Honour above all his Predecessors; building some Cities, of which one was Caerose upon Osia, 3563. since Caerlegion; beautifying others, as Trinovant with a Gate, a Haven, and a Tower on the Billing-Thames, retaining yet his Name; on the Top Gate, whereof his Ashes are said to have been laid up in a Golden Urn.

After him Gurguntius Barbirus was King, mild 3596. and just, but yet inheriting his Father's Courage, he subdu'd the Dacian, or Dane, who refus'd to pay the Tribute covenanted to Belinus for his Enlargement. In his return finding about the Orkneys thirty Ships of Spain, or Biscay, fraught with Men and Women for a Plantation, whose Captain also Bartholimus wrongfully banish'd, as he pleaded, besought him that some part of his Territory might be assign'd them to dwell in, he sent with them certain of his own Men to Ireland, which then lay unpeopl'd; and gave them that Island to hold of him as in Homage. He was bury'd in Caerlegion, a City which he had wall'd about.

Guthelme his Son, is also remember'd, as a just 3615. and good Prince, and his Wife Murtia to have excell'd so much in Wisdom, as to venture upon a new Institution of Laws. Which King Alfred translating, call'd Marchen-League, but more truly thereby is meant the Mercian Law; not translated by Alfred, but digested or incorporated with the West-Saxon. In the Minority of her Son 3656. she had the Rule, and then, as may be suppos'd, brought forth these Laws, not her self, for Laws are Masculine Births, but by the Advice of her sagest Counsellors; and therein she might do virtuously, since it befel her to supply the Nonage of her Son: Else nothing more awry from the Law of God and Nature, than that a Woman should give Laws to Men.

Her Son Sifillius coming to Years, receiv'd the Sifillius Rule; then in order Kimarus, then Danius or the 2d. Elaninus his Brother. Then Morinus, his Son by 3666. Tanguestela, a Concubine, who is recorded a Man of excellent Strength, Valiant, Liberal, and fair of Aspect, but immanely Cruel; not sparing in his Anger, Enemy or Friend, if any Weapon were in his Hand. A certain King of the Morines, or Picards invaded Northumberland; whose Army this King, though not wanting sufficient Numbers, chiefly by his own Prowess overcame; but dishonour'd his Victory by the cruel Usage of his Prisoners, whom his own hands, or others in his Presence put all to several Deaths: Well fitted to such a Beastial Cruelty was his end; for hearing of a huge Monster that from the Irish Sea infested the Coast, and in the Pride of his Strength, foolishly attempting to set Manly Valour against a brute Vastness, when his Weapons were all in vain, by that horrible Mouth he was catch'd up and devour'd.

Gorbonian the Eldest of his five Sons, than whom 3676. a juster Man liv'd not in his Age, was a great Builder of Temples, and gave to all what was their due; to his Gods devout Worship, to Men of Desert, Honour, and Preferment; to the Commons Encouragement in their Labours, and Trades, Defence and Protection, from Injuries and Oppressions, so that the Land flourish'd above her Neighbours, Violence and Wrong seldom was heard of: His Death was a general Loss; he was buried in Trinovant. Archigallo the second Brother follow'd not his Example; but depress'd the ancient Nobility, and by peeling the wealthier sort, stuff'd his Treasury, and took the right way to be depos'd. Elidure the next Brother, firnam'd the Pious, was set up in his Place; a Mind 3686. 3687.

* Said to be built on the Ground where Blackwell-Hall now stands. Selden mentions Kinmarcus in his Janus Anglorum.

† He is said to have built Lancaster, and Warwick. And Cambridge, as is pretended, was now built by Cantabar a Spaniard.

3687. so noble and so moderate, as almost is incredible to have ever been found. For having held the Scepter five Years, hunting one day in the Forest of Calster, he chanc'd to meet his deposed Brother wandering in mean condition; who had been long in vain beyond the Seas, importuning foreign Aids to his Restoremēt; and was now in a poor Habit, with only ten Followers, privately return'd to find subsistence among his secret Friends. At the unexpected sight of him, Elidure himself also then but thinly accompanied, runs to him with open Arms; and after many dear and sincere Welcome, conveys him to the City Alclud, there hides him in his own Bed-Chamber. Afterwards feigning himself sick, summons all his Peers, as about greatest Affairs; where admitting them one by one, as if his weakness endur'd not the disturbance of more at once, causes them, willing or unwilling, once more to swear Allegiance to Archigallo. Whom, after reconciliation made on all sides, he leads to Tork, and from his own Head, places the Crown on the Head of his Brother. Who thenceforth, Vice it self dissolving in him, and forgetting her firmest hold with the admiration of a Deed so Heroick, became a true converted Man, rul'd worthily ten Years, dy'd and was bury'd in Caerleir. Thus was a Brother sav'd by a Brother, to whom love of a Crown, the thing that so often dazles and vitiates mortal Men, for which thousands of nearest Blood have destroy'd each other, was, in respect of Brotherly dearness, a contemptible thing.

3690. Elidure now, in his own behalf, re-assumes the Government, and did as was worthy such a Man to do. When Providence, that so great Virtue might want no sort of tryal to make it more illustrious, stirs up Vigenius and Peredure his youngest Brethren, against him who had deserv'd so nobly of that relation, as least of all by a Brother to be injur'd: Yet him they defeat, him they imprison in the Tower of Trinovant, and divide his Kingdom; the North to Peredure, the South to Vigenius. After whose Death Peredure obtaining all, so much the better us'd his power, by how much the worse he got it. So that Elidure now is hardly miss'd. But yet in all right, owing to his Elder the due place whereof he had depriv'd him, Fate would that he should die first.

3715. And Elidure, after many Years Imprisonment, is now the third time seated on the Throne; which at last he enjoy'd long in Peace; finishing the interrupted course of his mild and just Reign, as full of vertuous Deeds as Days, to the end. After these five Sons of Morindus, succeeded also their Sons in Order: * Regin of Gorbonian, Marganus of Archigallo, both good Kings. But Enniaunus his Brother taking other courses, was after six Years depos'd. Then Idwallo, taught by a near Example, govern'd soberly. Then Runno, then Gerunnius, he of Peredure, this last the Son of Elidure. From whose Loins (for that likely is the durable and surviving Race that springs of just Progenitors) issu'd a long descent of Kings, whose Names only for many Successions, without other memory, stand thus register'd, Catellus, Coillus, Porrex, Cberin, and his three Sons; Fulgenius, Eldadus, and Andragius, his Son Urianus; Eliud, Eledaucus, Clotenus, Gurguntius, Merianus, Bleduno, Capis, Oemus, Sifillius, twenty Kings in a continu'd row, 3720. that either did nothing, or liv'd in Ages that wrote nothing, at least a foul pretermision in the Author of this, whether Story or Fable; himself weary, as seems, of his own tedious Tale.

But to make amends for this silence, Blegabre- 3800. chus next succeeding, is recorded to have excell'd all before him in the Art of Musick; opportunely, had he but left us one Song of his twenty Predecessors doings. Yet after him nine more succeeded in Name; his Brother Archimailus, Eldol, Redion, Rederchius, Samulius, Penissel, Pir, Capvius, * but Clignellius, with the addition of Modest, Wife and Just. His Son Heli reign'd 3818. forty Years, and had three Sons, Lud, Cassibelan and Nennius. This Heli seems to be the same whom Ninnius in his Fragment calls Minocan; for him he writes to be the Father of Cassibelan. Lud was he that enlarg'd and wall'd about Trinovant, there kept his Court, made it the prime City, and call'd it from his own name Caer-Lud, or Lud's Town, now London. Which, as is alledg'd out of Gildas, became matter of great Dissention betwixt him and his Brother Nennius; who took 3878. it hainously that the name of Troy, their ancient Country, should be abolished for any new one. Lud was hardy and bold in War, in Peace a jolly Feaster. He conquer'd many Islands in the Sea, saith Huntingdon, and was bury'd by the Gate 3880. which from thence we call Ludgate. His two Sons, Androgeus and Tenuantius, were left to the tuition of Cassibelan; whose bounty and high demeanor so wrought with the common People, as got him easily the Kingdom transferr'd upon himself. He nevertheless continuing to favour and support his Nephews, confers freely upon Androgeus, London with Kent; upon Tenuantius, Cornwall: Reserving a superiority both over them, and all the other Princes to himself; till the Romans for a while circumscrib'd his Power. Thus far, though leaning only on the Credit of Geoffrey Monmouth, and his Assertors, I yet for the specify'd causes have thought it not beneath my purpose to relate what I found. Whereto I neither oblige the belief of other Person, nor over-hastily subscribe mine own. Nor have I stood with others, computing or collating Years and Chronologies, lest I should be vainly curious about the Time and Circumstances of things whereof the Substance is so much in doubt. By this time, like one who had set out on his way by Night, and travell'd thro' a Rigion of smooth or idle Dreams, our History now arrives on the Confines, where Day-light and Truth meets us with a clear dawn, representing to our view, though at a far distance, true Colours and Shapes. For albeit Cesar, whose Authority we are now first to follow, wanted not who tax'd him of mis-reporting in his Commentaries, yea in his Civil Wars against Pompey, much more may we think in the British Affairs, of whose little skill in writing he did not easily hope to be contradicted, yet now in such variety of good Authors, we hardly can miss from one hand or other to be sufficiently inform'd, as of things past so long ago. But this will better be referr'd to a second Discourse.

* Clignellus or Dinellius, the Son of Capoivre, about eighty Years after the Death of Elidure, in which time there had reign'd thirty Kings, came to the Crown, and is the first of so many Princes that Geoffrey could or would say any thing of.

* 'Tis said, this Nennius wrote the History of Britain, which was turn'd into Latin by another Nennius.

History of ENGLAND,

By Mr. JOHN MILTON. Book II.

I Am now to write of what befel the Britains from fifty and three Years before the Birth of our Saviour, when first the Romans came in, till the decay and ceasing of that Empire; a Story of much Truth, and for the first Hundred Years and somewhat more, collected without much Labour. So many and so prudent were the Writers, which those two, the Civilest, and Wifest of European Nations, both Italy and Greece, afforded to the Actions of that puissant City. For Worthy Deeds are not often destitute of Worthy Relators: As by a certain Fate great Acts and great Eloquence have most commonly gone hand in hand, equalling and honouring each other in the same Ages. 'Tis true, that in obscurest Times, by shallow and unskilful Writers, the indistinct Noise of many Battles, and Devastations of many Kingdoms over-run and lost, hath come to our Ears. For what wonder, if in all Ages, Ambition and the Love of Rapine hath stirr'd up greedy and violent Men to bold Attempts in wasting and ruining Wars, which to Posterity have left the Work of wild Beasts and Destroyers, rather than the Deeds and Monuments of Men and Conquerors? But he whose just and true Valour uses the necessity of War and Dominion, not to destroy but to prevent Destruction, to bring in Liberty against Tyrants, Law and Civility among barbarous Nations, knowing that when he conquers all things else, he cannot conquer Time or Detraction, wisely conscious of this his Wants as well as of his Worth not to be forgotten or conceal'd, honours and hath recourse to the Aid of Eloquence, his friendliest and best Supply; by whose immortal Record his noble Deeds, which else were transitory, becoming fixt and durable against the Force of Years and Generations, he fails not to continue through all Posterity, over Envy, Death, and Time, also victorious. Therefore when the Esteem of Science, and liberal Study waxes low in the Commonwealth, we may presume that also there all civil Vertue, and worthy Action is grown as low to a decline: And then Eloquence, as it were consoled in the same Destiny, with the Decrease and Fall of Virtue corrupts also and fades; at least resigns her Office of relating, to illiterate and frivolous Historians; such as the Persons themselves both deserve, and are best pleas'd with; whilst they want either the Understanding to chuse better, or the Innocence to dare invite the examining and searching Stile of an intelligent and faithful Writer to the Survey of their unsound Exploits, better befriended by Obscurity than Fame. As for these, the only Authors we have of British Matters, while the Power of Rome reach'd hither (for Gildas affirms, that of the Roman Times no British Writer was in his Days extant, or if any ever were, either burnt by Enemies, or transported with such as fled the Pictish and Saxon Invasions) these therefore only Roman Authors there be, who in the English Tongue have laid together, as much, and perhaps more than was requisite to a History of Britain. So that were it not for leaving an unsightly Gap so near to the beginning, I should have judg'd this Labour, wherein so little seems to be requir'd above Transcription, almost superfluous. Notwithstanding since I must through it, if ought by Diligence may be added, or omitted, or by other disposing may be more explain'd, or more express'd, I shall assay.

Julius Caesar (of whom, and of the Roman Free State, more than what appertains, is not here to be discours'd) having subdu'd most part of Gallia, which by a potent Faction, he had obtain'd of the Senate as his Province for many Years, stirr'd up with a Desire of adding still more Glory to his Name, and the whole Roman Empire to his Ambition, some say, with a far meaner and ignobler, the Desire of British Pearls, whose Bigness he delighted to balance in his hand, determines, and that upon no unjust pretended Occasion, to try his Force in the Conquest also of Britain. For he understood that the Britains in most of his Gallian Wars, had sent Supplies against him, had receiv'd Fugitives of the Bellocaci his Enemies, and were call'd over to aid the Cities of Armorica, which had the Year before conspir'd all in a new Rebellion. Therefore Caesar, though now the Summer well nigh ending, and the Season unagreeable to transport a War, yet judg'd it would be great Advantage, only to get entrance into the Isle, Knowledge of the Men, the Places, the Ports, the Accesses, which then, it seems, were even to the Gauls their Neighbours almost unknown. For except Merchants and Traders, it is not oft, saith he, that any use to travel thither; and to those that do, besides the Sea-Coast, and the Ports next to Gallia, nothing else is known. But here I must require, as Pollio did, the Diligence, at least the Memory of Caesar. For if it were true, as they of Rhemes told him, that Divitiacus, not long before, a puissant King of the Soissons, had Britain also under his Command, besides the Belgian Colonies which he affirms to have nam'd and peop'd many Provinces there, if also the Britains had so frequently given them aid in all their Wars; if lastly the Druid Learning, honour'd so much among them, were at first taught them out of Britain, and they who soonest would attain that Discipline, sent hither to learn, it appears not how Britain at that time should be so utterly unknown in Gallia.

lia,

3897. lia, or only known to Merchants, yea to them so little, that being call'd together from all parts, none could be found to inform Cæsar of what bigness the Isle, what Nations, how great, what use of War they had, what Laws, or so much as what commodious Havens for bigger Vessels. Of all which things, as it were then first to make Discovery, he sends Caius Volusenus, in a long Galley, with command to return as soon as this could be effected. He in the mean time with his whole power draws nigh to the *Morine Coast, whence the shortest passage was into Britain. Hither his Navy, which he us'd against the Armoricans, and what else of Shipping can be provided, he draws together. This known in Britain, Ambassadors are sent from many of the States there, who promise Hostages, and Obedience to the Roman Empire. Them, after Audience given, Cæsar as largely promising, and exhorting to continue in that mind, sends home, and with them Comius of Arras, whom he had made King of that Country, and now secretly employ'd to gain a Roman Party among the Britains, in as many Cities as he found inclinable, and to tell them, that he himself was speeding thither. Volusenus, with what discovery of the Island he could make from aboard his Ship, not daring to venture on the shoar, within five Days returns to Cæsar. Who soon after, with two Legions, ordinarily amounting, of Romans and their Allies, to about 25000 Foot, and 4500 Horse, the Foot in 80 Ships of Burthen, the Horse in 18, besides what Gallies were appointed for his chief Commanders, sets off about the third Watch of the Night with a good Gale to Sea; leaving behind him Sulpitius Rufus to make good the Port with a sufficient strength. But the Horse, whose appointed Shipping lay Wind-bound eight Mile upward in another Haven, had much trouble to imbarke. Cæsar now within sight of Britain, beholds on every Hill multitudes of armed Men, ready to forbid his Landing; and

Cicero writes to his Friend Atticus, that the Accesses of the Island were wondrously fortify'd with strong Works or Moles. Here from the fourth to the ninth hour of Day he awaits at Anchor the coming up of his whole Fleet: Mean while with his Legates and Tribunes consulting, and giving order to fit all things for what might happen in such a various and floating Water-fight as was to be expected. This place, which was a narrow Bay, close environ'd with Hills, appearing no way commodious, he removes to a plain and open Shoar eight Mile distant, commonly suppos'd about Deal in Kent. Which when the Britains perceiv'd, their Horse and Chariots, as then they us'd in fight, scowring before, their main Power speeding after, some thick upon the shoar, others not tarrying to be assail'd, ride in among the Waves to encounter and assault the Romans, even under their Ships, with such a bold and free hardihood, that Cæsar himself, between confessing and excusing that his Soldiers were to come down from their Ships, to stand in Water heavy arm'd, and to fight at once, denies not but that the Terror of such new and resolute Opposition made them forget their wonted Valour. To succour which he commands his Gallies, a fight unusual to the Britains, and more apt for motion, drawn from the bigger Vessels, to row against the open side of the Enemy, and thence with Slings, Engines and Darts, to beat them back. But neither yet, though amaz'd at the strangeness of those new Sea Castles, bearing up so near and so swiftly, as almost to overwhelm them, the hurtling of Oars, the battering of fierce Engines against their Bodies barely expos'd, did the Britains give much ground, or the Romans gain, till he who bore the Eagle of the Tenth Legion, yet in the Gallies, first beseeching his Gods, said thus aloud: Leap down, Soldiers, unless ye mean to betray your Ensign; I, for my part, will perform what I owe to the Common-wealth and my General. This utter'd, over-board he leaps, and with his Eagle fiercely advanc'd, runs upon the Enemy, the rest heartning one another not to admit the dishonour of so nigh losing their chief Standard, follow him resolutely. Now was fought eagerly on both sides. Ours, who well knew their own advantages, and expertly us'd them, now in the Shallows, now on the Sand, still as the Romans went trooping to their Ensigns, receiv'd them, dispatch'd them, and with the help of their Horse, put them every where to great disorder. But Cæsar causing all his Boats and Shallops to be fill'd with Soldiers, commanded to ply up and down continually with Relief where they saw need; whereby at length all the Foot now disembark'd, and got together in some order on firm Ground, with a more steady Charge put the Britains to flight: But wanting all their Horse, whom the Winds yet withheld from failing, they were not able to make pursuit. In this confused Fight, Scæva, a Roman Soldier, having press'd too far among the Britains, and beset round, after incredible Valour shewn single against a multitude, swom back safe to his General; and in the place that rung with his Praises, earnestly besought Pardon for his rash adventure against Discipline: Which modest confessing after no bad event, for such a Deed wherein Valour and Ingenuity so much out-weigh'd Transgression, easily made amends, and preferr'd him to be a Centurion. Cæsar also is brought in by Julian, attributing to himself the honour (if it were at all an honour to that Person which he sustain'd) of being the first that left his Ship, and took Land: But this were to make Cæsar less understand what became him than Scæva. The Britains finding themselves master'd in Fight, forthwith send Ambassadors to treat of Peace; promising to give Hostages, and to be at command. With them Comius of Arras also return'd; whom hitherto, since his first coming from Cæsar, they had detain'd in Prison as a Spy; the blame whereof they lay on the common People, for whose violence and their own imprudence they crave pardon. Cæsar complaining they had first sought Peace, and then without cause had begun War, yet content to pardon them, commands Hostages: Whereof part they bring in strait, others far up in the Country to be sent for, they promise in a few Days. Mean while the People disbanded and sent home, many Princes and chief Men from all parts of the Isle submit themselves and their Cities to the dispose of Cæsar, who lay then encamp'd, as is thought, on Barham Down. Thus had the Britains made their Peace, when suddenly an Accident unlook'd for put new Counsels into their Minds. Four Days after the coming of Cæsar, those 18 Ships of Burthen, which from the upper Haven had taken in all

* The Morini inhabited the Province of Picardy.

^b Concerning the Havens from whence Cæsar set sail for Britain, see Mr. Somner's Dissertation, de Portu Ictio, publish'd at Oxford by Mr. Gibson.

3897. the Roman Horse, born with a soft Wind to the very Coast, in sight of the Roman Camp, were by a sudden Tempest scatter'd, and driven back, some to the Port from whence they loos'd, others down into the West Country; who finding there no Safety either to Land, or to cast Anchor, chose rather to commit themselves again to the troubled Sea; and as Orosius reports, were most of them cast away. The same Night, it being full Moon, the Gallies left upon dry Land, were unaware to the Romans cover'd with a Spring-tide, and the greater Ships that lay off at Anchor, torn and beaten with Waves, to the great Perplexity of Cesar and his whole Army; who now had neither Shipping left to convey them back, nor any Provision made to stay here, intending to have winter'd in Gallia. All this the Britains well perceiving, and by the Compass of his Camp, which without Baggage appear'd the smaller, guessing at his Numbers, consult together, and one by one silyly withdrawing from the Camp, where they were waiting the Conclusion of a Peace, resolve to stop all Provisions, and to draw out the Business till Winter. Cesar though ignorant of what they intended, yet from the Condition wherein he was, and their other Hostages not sent, suspecting what was likely, begins to provide apace, all that might be, against what might happen: lays in Corn, and with Materials fetch'd from the Continent, and what was left of those Ships which were past help he repairs the rest. So that now, by the incessant Labour of his Soldiers, all but twelve were again made serviceable. While these things are doing, one of the Legions being sent out to forage, as was accusom'd, and no Suspicion of War, while some of the Britains were remaining in the Country about, others also going and coming freely to the Roman Quarters, they who were in Station at the Camp Gates sent speedy Word to Cesar, that from that part of the Country, to which the Legion went, a greater Dust than usual was seen to rise. Cesar guessing the Matter, commands the Cohorts of Guard to follow him thither, two others to succeed in their stead, the rest all to arm and follow. They had not march'd long, when Cesar discerns his Legion fore over-charg'd: For the Britains not doubting but that their Enemies on the Morrow would be in that place which only they had left unreap'd of all their Harvest, had plac'd an Ambush; and while they were dispers'd and busiest at their Labour, set upon them, kill'd some, and routed the rest. The manner of their Fight was from a kind of * Chariots; wherein riding about, and throwing Darts, with the clutter of their Horse, and of their Wheels, they oft-times broke the Rank of their Enemies; then retreating among the Horse, and quitting their Chariots, they fought on foot. The Charioteers, in the mean while somewhat aside from the Battel, set themselves in such order, that their Masters at any time oppress'd with odds, might retire safely thither, having perform'd with one Person both the nimble Service of a Horse-man, and the steadfast Duty of a Foot Soldier. So much they could with their Chariots by Use, and exercise, as riding on the speed down a steep Hill, to stop suddenly, and with a short Rein turn swiftly, now running on the † Beam, now on the * Yoke, then in the Seat. With this sort of new skirmishing, the Romans now overmatch'd, and terrify'd, Cesar with opportune aid appears;

for then the Britains make a stand: But he considering that now was not fit time to offer Battel, while his Men were scarce recover'd of so late a fear, only keeps his ground, and soon after leads back his Legions to the Camp. Farther Action for many Days following was hinder'd on both sides by foul Weather; in which time the Britains dispatching Messengers round about, to how few the Romans were reduc'd, what hope of Prize and Booty, and now if ever of freeing themselves from the fear of like Invasions hereafter, by making these an example, if they could but now uncamp their Enemies; at this intimation multitudes of Horse and Foot coming down from all parts make towards the Romans. Cesar foreseeing that the Britains, tho' beaten and put to flight, would easily evade his Foot, yet with no more than 30 Horse, which Comius had brought over, draws out his Men to Battel, puts again the Britains to flight, pursues with Slaughter; and returning, burns and lays waste all about. Whereupon Ambassadors the same day being sent from the Britains to desire Peace: Cesar, as his Affairs at present stood, for so great a breach of Faith, only imposes on them double the former Hostages to be sent after him into Gallia: And because September was nigh half spent, a season not fit to tempt the Sea with his Weather-beaten Fleet, the same Night with a fair Wind he departs towards Belgia: Whither two only of the Britain Cities sent Hostages, as they promis'd, the rest neglected. But at Rome, when the news came of Cesar's Acts here, whether it were esteem'd a Conquest, or a fair Escape, Supplication of twenty Days is decreed by the Senate, as either for an Exploit done, or a Discovery made, wherein both Cesar and the Romans gloried not a little, though it brought no Benefit either to him, or the Common-wealth.

The Winter following, Cesar, as his Custom ^{Dish.} was, going into Italy, when as he saw that most of the Britains regarded not to send their Hostages, appoints his Legates whom he left in Belgia, to provide what possible Shipping they ^{Ces. Com.} could either build or repair. Low built they ⁵ were to be, as thereby easier both to freight, and to hale ashore; nor needed to be higher, because the Tide so often changing, was observ'd to make the Billows less in our Sea than those in the Mediterranean: Broader likewise they were made, for the better transporting of Horses, and all other Fraughtage, being intend'd chiefly to that end. These all about 600 in a Readiness, with 28 Ships of Burden, and what with Adventurers, and other Hulks above 200, Cotta, one of the Legates wrote them, as Atkins affirms, in all 1000, Cesar from * Port Iccius, a Passage of some 30 Mile over, leaving behind him Labienus to guard the Haven, and for other Supply at need, with five Legions, though but 2000 Horse, about Sun set hoisting Sail with a slack South-West, at Midnight was becalm'd. And finding when it was light, that the whole Navy lying on the Current, had fallen off from the Isle, which now they could descry on their left hand, by the unwearied Labour of his Soldiers, who refus'd not to tug the Oar, and kept course with Ships under sail, he bore up as near as might be, to the same place where he had landed the Year before; where about Noon arriving, no Enemy could be seen. ^{Before the Birth of} For the Britains, which in great Numbers, ^{as Christ, 52.} was after known, had been there, at sight of so

* This is the same with Gessoriacum, at this Day Bolton; as is prov'd at large by Mr. Somner in his Discourse de Portu Iccio, publish'd by Dr. Gibson, with a Dissertation of Du Fresne on the same Subject.

3898. huge a Fleet durst not abide. Cæsar forthwith landing his Army, and encamping to his best Advantage, some notice being given him by those he took, where to find the Enemy, with his whole Power, five only ten Cohorts, and 300 Horse, left to Quintus Atrius for the Guard of his Ships, about the third Watch of the same Night marches up twelve Mile into the Country^{*}. And at length by a River commonly thought the Stowre in Kent, espies embattel'd the British Forces. They with their Horses and Chariots advancing to the higher Banks, oppose the Romans in their March, and begin the Fight; but repuls'd by the Roman Cavalry give back into the Woods, to a Place notably made strong both by Art and Nature; which, it seems, had been a Fort, or Hold of Strength rais'd heretofore in Times of Wars among themselves. For Entrance and Access on all sides, by the felling of huge Trees overthwart one another, was quite barr'd up; and within these Britains did their utmost to keep out the Enemy. But the Soldiers of the seventh Legion locking all their Shields together like a Roof close over head, and others raising a Mount, without much Loss of Blood took the Place, and drove them all to forsake the Woods. Pursuit they made not long, as being through Ways unknown; and now Evening came on, which they more wisely spent, in chusing out where to pitch and fortifie their Camp that Night. The next Morning Cæsar had but newly sent out his Men in three Bodies to pursue, and the last no further gone than yet in sight, when Horsemen all in post from Quintus Atrius bring word to Cæsar, that almost all his Ships in a Tempest that Night had suffer'd Wrack, and lay broken upon the Shoar. Cæsar at this News recalls his Legions, himself in all hast riding back to the Sea-side, beheld with his own Eyes the ruinous Prospect. About forty Vessels were sunk and lost, the residue so torn, and shaken, as not to be new rigg'd without much Labour. Straight he assembles what Number of Ship-wrights either in his own Legions or from beyond Sea, could be summon'd; appoints Labienus on the Belgian side to build more; and with a dreadful Industry of ten Days, not respiting his Soldiers Day or Night, drew up all his Ships, and entrench'd them round within the Circuit of his Camp. This done, and leaving to their Defence the same Strength as before, he returns with his whole Forces to the same Wood, where he had defeated the Britains: Who preventing him with greater Powers than before, had now repossess'd themselves of that Place, under Cassibelan their chief Leader. Whose Territory from the States bordering on the Sea, was divided by the River Thames about 80 Mile inward. With him formerly other Cities had continual War; but now in the common Danger had all made choice of him to be their General. Here the British Horse and Charioteers meeting with the Roman Cavalry fought stoutly; and at first, something over-match'd, they retreat to the near Advantage of their Woods and Hills, but still follow'd by the Romans, made head again, cut off the forwardest among them, and after some pause, while Cæsar, who thought the Day's Work had been done, was busied about the entrenching of his Camp, march out again, give fierce Assault to the very Stations of his Guards and Senteries; and while the main Cohorts of two Legions that were sent to the Alarm, stood within a small distance of each other, terrify'd at the Newness and Boldness of their Fight, charg'd back again through the midst, without Loss of a Man. Of the Romans that Day was slain Quintus Laberius

Durus, a Tribune: The Britains having fought their fill at the very Entrance of Cæsar's Camp, and sustain'd the Resistance of his whole Army entrench'd, gave over the Assault. Cæsar here acknowledges that the Roman way both of arming and of fighting, was not so well fitted against this kind of Enemy; for that the Foot in heavy Armour could not follow their cunning Flight, and durst not by ancient Discipline stir from their Ensign; and the Horse alone disjoyn'd from the Legions, against a Foe that turn'd suddenly upon them, with a mixt Encounter both of Horse and Foot, were in equal Danger both following and retiring. Besides their Fashion was, not in great Bodies, and close Order, but in small Divisions, and open Distances to make their onset, appointing others at certain Spaces, now to relieve and bring off the weary, now to succeed and renew the Conflict; which argu'd no small Experience, and Use of Arms. Next Day the Britains afar off upon the Hills begin to shew themselves here and there, and though less boldly than before, to skirmish with the Roman Horse. But at Noon Cæsar having sent out three Legions, and all his Horse with Trebonius the Legate, to seek Fodder, suddenly on all sides they set upon the Foragers, and charge up after them to the very Legions, and their Standards. The Romans with great Courage beat them back, and in the Chace, being well seconded by the Legions, not giving them time either to rally, to stand or to descend from their Chariots as they were wont, slew many. From this Overthrow, the Britains that dwelt farther off, betook them home; and came no more after that time with so great a Power against Cæsar. Whereof advertis'd, he marches onward to the Frontiers of Cassibelan, which on this side were bound by the Thames, not passable except in one Place, and that difficult, about Comay-Stakes near Oatlands, as is conjectur'd. Hither coming he descries on the other side great Forces of the Enemy plac'd in good Array; the Bank set all with sharp Stakes, others in the bottom, cover'd with Water; whereof the Marks in Beda's time were to be seen as he relates. This having learnt by such as were taken, or had run to him, he first commands his Horse to pass over, then his Foot, who wading up to the Neck went on so resolutely and so fast, that they on the further side not enduring the Violence, retreated and fled. Cassibelan no more now in hope to contend for Victory, dismissing all but 4000 of those Charioteers, through Woods, and intricate ways attends their Motion; where the Romans are to pass, drives all before him; and with continual Sallies upon the Horse, where they least expected, cutting off some and terrifying others, compels them so close together, as gave them no leave to fetch in Prey or Booty without ill Success. Whereupon Cæsar strictly commanding all not to part from the Legions, had nothing left him in his way but empty Fields and Houses, which he spoil'd and burnt. Mean while the * Trinobantes a State or Kingdom, * They were the Ancient Inhabitants of Essex and Middlesex. and perhaps the greatest then among the Britains, less favouring Cassibelan, send Ambassadors, and yield to Cæsar upon this Reason. Immanuentius had been their King: Him Cassibelan had slain, and purpos'd the like to Mandubratius his Son, whom Orosius calls Androgorius, Beda Androgius; but the Youth escaping by Flight into Gallia, put himself under the Protection of Cæsar. These entreat that Mandubratius may be still defended, and sent home to succeed in his Father's Right. Cæsar sends him, demands forty Hostages and Provision for his Army,

By their Example the ^a Cenimagni, ^b Segontiaci, ^c Ancalites, ^d Bibroci, ^e Cassi (so I write them for the Modern Names are but guess'd) on like Terms make their Peace. By them he learns that the Town of Cassibelan, suppos'd to be Verulam, was not far distant; fenc'd about with Woods and Marshes, well stuff'd with Men and much Cattle. For Towns then in Britain were only Woody Places ditch'd round, and with a Mud Wall encompass'd against the Inroads of Enemies. Thither goes Cesar with his Legions, and though a Place of great Strength both by Art and Nature, assaults it in two Places. The Britains after some Defence, fled out all at another end of the Town; in the Flight many were taken, many slain, and great store of Cattle found there. Cassibelan, for all these Losses, yet deserts not himself; nor was yet his Authority so much impair'd, but that in Kent, though in a manner possess'd by the Enemy, his Messengers and Commands find Obedience enough to raise all the People. By his Direction Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, four ^f Kings reigning in those Countries which lie upon the Sea, lead them on to assault that Camp wherein the Romans had entrench'd their Shipping: But they whom Cesar left there, issuing out slew many, and took Prisoners Cingetorix a noted Leader, without Loss of their own. Cassibelan after so many Defeats, mov'd especially by revolt of the Cities from him, their Inconstancy and Falshood one to another, uses Mediation by Comius of Arras to send Embassadors about Treaty of Yielding. Cesar, who had determin'd to Winter in the Continent, by reason that Gallia was unsettl'd, and not much of the Summer now behind, commands him only Hostages, and what Yearly Tribute the Island should pay to Rome, forbids him to molest the Trinobantes, or Mandubratius; and with his Hostages, and great number of Captives he puts to Sea, having at twice embark'd his whole Army.

Pliny. At his return to Rome, as from a glorious Enterprize, he offers to Venus the Patroness of his Family, a Corslet of British Pearls. Howbeit, other ancient Writers have spoken more doubtfully of Cesar's Victories here; and that in plain Terms he fled from hence; for which the common Verse in Lucan, with divers Passages here and

Oros. lib. 6. there in Tacitus is alledg'd. Paulus Orosius, who

cap. 7. & 9. took what he wrote from a History of Suetonius now lost, writes that Cesar in his first Journey entertain'd with a sharp Fight, lost no small number of his Foot, and by Tempest nigh all his Horse. Dion affirms that once in the second Expedition all his Foot were routed; Orosius that another time all his Horse. The British Author, whom I use only then when others are all silent, hath many trivial Discourses of Cesar's being here, which are best omitted. Nor have we more of Cassibelan than what the same Story tells, how he warr'd soon after with Androgeus, about his Nephew slain by Evelinus Nephew to the other; which Business at length compos'd, Cassibelan dies and was buried in York, if the Monmouth Book fable not. But at Cesar's coming hither, such likeliest were the Britains, as the Writers of those Times and their own Actions represent them, in Courage and warlike Readiness to take Advantage by Ambush or sudden Onset, not inferior to the Romans, nor Cassibelan to Cesar, in Weapons, Arms, and the Skill of Encamping, Embatteling, Fortifying overmatch'd; their Weapons were a short Spear and light Target, a Sword also by their side, their Fight sometimes in Chariots phang'd at the Axle with Iron Sithes, their Bodies most part naked, only painted with Woad in sundry Figures to seem terrible as they thought, but pursu'd by Enemies, not nice of their painting to run into Bogs, worse than wild Irish, up to the Neck, and there to stay many Days, holding a certain Morfel in their Mouths no bigger than a Bean, to suffice Hunger; but that Receipt, and the Temperance it taught, is long since unknown among us: Their Towns and strong Holds were Spaces of Ground fenc'd about with a Ditch, and great Trees fell'd overthwart each other, their Buildings within were thatch'd Houses for themselves and their Cattle: In Peace, the upland Inhabitants, besides hunting, tended their Flocks and Herds, but with little Skill of Country Affairs; the making of Cheese they commonly knew not, Wool or Flax they spun not, garden ing and planting many of them knew not; clothing they had none, but what the Skins of Beasts afforded them, and that not always; yet Gallantry they had, painting their own Skins with several Portraiture of Beast, Bird or Flower, A Vanity which hath not yet left us, remov'd only from the Skin to the Skirt, being now with as many colour'd Ribbons and Goggles: Toward the Sea-side they till'd the Ground, and liv'd much after the manner of the Gauls their Neighbours, or first Planters: Their Money was brazen Pieces or Iron Rings, their best Merchandize Tin, the rest Trifles of Glass, Ivory, and such like; yet Gems and Pearls they had, faith Mela, in some Rivers: Their Ships of light Timber wickered with Osier between, and cover'd over with Leather, serv'd not therefore to transport them far, and their Commodities were fetch'd away by foreign Merchants: Their dealing, faith Diodorus, plain and simple without Fraud; their civil Government under many Princes and States, not confederate or consulting in common, but mistrustful, and oft-times warring one with the other, which gave them up one by one an easie Conquest to the Romans: Their Religion was govern'd by a sort of Priests or Magicians call'd Druides from the Greek Name of an Oak, which Tree they had in great Reverence, and the Mistletoe especially growing thereon; Pliny writes them skill'd in Magick no less than those of Persia: By their abstaining from a Hen, a Hare, and a Goose, from Fish also, faith Dion, and their Opinion of the Soul's passing after Death into other Bodies, they may be thought to have studied Pythagoras; yet Philosophers I cannot call them, reported Men factious and ambitious, contending sometimes about the Arch-priesthood, not without civil War and Slaughter; nor restrain'd they the People under them from a lewd, adulterous and incestuous Life, ten or twelve Men absurdly against Nature, possessing one Woman as their common Wife, though of nearest Kin, Mother, Daughter, or Sister; Progenitors not to be glory'd in. But the Gospel, not long after preach'd here, abolish'd such Impurities, and of the Romans

3918. we have cause not to say much worse, than that they beat us into some Civility; likely else to have continu'd longer in a barbarous and savage manner of Life. After Julius (for Julius before his Death tyrannously had made himself Emperor of the Roman Commonwealth, and was slain in the Senate for so doing) he who next obtain'd the Empire, Octavianus Caesar Augustus, either condemning the Island, as Strabo would have us think, whose neither Benefit was worth the having, nor Enmity worth the fearing; or out of a wholesome State-Maxim, as some say, to moderate and bound the Empire from growing vast and unweildy, made no attempt against the Britains: But the truer Cause was partly civil War among the Romans, partly other Affairs more urging. For about twenty Years after, all which time the Britains had liv'd at their own dispose, Augustus in Imitation of his Uncle Julius, either intending, or seeming to intend an Expedition hither, was come into Gallia, when the News of a Revolt in Pannonia diverted him: About seven Years after in the same Resolution, what with the Unsettledness of Gallia, and what with Embassadors from Britain, which met him there, he proceeded not. The next Year, Difference arising about Covenants, he was again prevented by other new Commotions in Spain. Nevertheless some of the British Potentates omitted not to seek his Friendship by Gifts offer'd in the Capitol, and other obsequious Addresses; insomuch that the whole Island became even in those Days well known to the Romans; too well perhaps for them, who from the Knowledge of us were so like to prove Enemies. But as for Tribute, the Britains paid none to Augustus, except what easie Customs were levy'd on the slight Commodities where-with they traded into Gallia. After Cassibelan, Tenantius the younger Son of Lud, according to the Momonth Story was made King. For Andræus the Elder, conceiving himself generally hated, for siding with the Romans, forsook his Claim here, and follow'd Cæsar's Fortune. This King is recorded Just and Warlike. His Son Kymbeline or Cunobeline succeeding, was brought up, as is said, in the Court of Augustus, and with him held friendly Correspondencies to the end; was a warlike Prince; his chief Seat Camalodunum, or *Maldon, as by certain of his Coins yet to be seen, appears. Tiberius the next Emperor, adhering always to the advice of Augustus, and of himself less caring to extend the Bounds of his Empire, fought not the Britains; and they as little to incite him, sent home courteously the Soldiers of Germanicus, that by Shipwrack had been cast on the Britain Shore. But Caligula his Successor, a wild and dissolute Tyrant, having past the Alps with intent to rob and spoil those Provinces, and stirr'd up by Adrianus the Son of Cunobeline, who by his Father banish'd, with a small number fled thither to him, made Semblance of marching toward Britain; but being come to the Ocean, and there behaving himself madly and ridiculously, went back the same way; yet sent before him boasting Letters to the Senate, as if all Britain had been yielded to him. Cunobeline now dead, Adrianus the Eldest by his Father banish'd from his Country, and by his own Practice against it, from the Crown, though by an old Coin seeming to have also reign'd; Togodumnus, and Cara-

Acus the two younger, uncertain whether equal A.D. 40. or subordinate in Power, were advanc'd into his Place. But through civil Discord, Bericus (what Dien. he was further is not known) with others of his Party flying to Rome, perswaded Claudius the Emperor to an Invasion. Claudius now Consul A.D. 42. the third time, and desirous to do something, whence he might gain the Honour of a Triumph, at the Persuasion of these Fugitives, whom the Britains demanding, he had deny'd to render, Sueton. and they for that Cause had deny'd further Amity with Rome, makes choice of this Island for his Province: And sends before him Aulus Plautius the Prætor, with this Command, if the Business grew difficult to give him notice. Plautius with much ado perswaded the Legions to move out of Gallia, murmuring that now they must be put to make War beyond the World's End; for so they counted Britain; and what welcome Julius the Dictator found there, doubtless they had heard. At last prevail'd with, and hoisting sail from three several Ports, left their landing should in any one place be resisted, meeting cross Winds, they were cast back and dishearten'd: Till in the Night a Meteor shooting Flames from the East, and, as they fanfy'd, directing their Course, they took Heart again to try the Sea, and without Opposition landed. For the Britains having heard of their Unwillingness to come, had been negligent to provide against them; and retiring to the Woods and Moors, intended to frustrate, and wear them out with delays, as they had serv'd Cæsar before. Plautius after much trouble to find them out, encountering first with Caradacus, then with Togodumnus, overthrew them; and receiving into Conditions part of the Bodoni, who then were subject to the Catuellani, and leaving there a Garrison, went on toward a River; where the Britains not imagining that Plautius without a Bridge could pass, lay on the further side careless and secure. But he sending first the Germans, whose Custom was, arm'd as they were, to swim with ease the strongest Current, commands them to strike especially at the Horses, whereby the Chariots, wherein consisted their chief Art of Fight, became unserviceable. To second them, he sent Vespasian, who in his latter Days obtain'd the Empire, and Sabinus his Brother; who unexpectedly assailing those who were least aware, did much Execution. Yet not for this were the Britains dismay'd; but re-uniting the next Day fought with such a Courage, as made it hard to decide which way hung the Victory: Till Caius Silius Geta, at point to have been taken, recover'd himself so valiantly, as brought the Day on his side; for which at Rome he receiv'd high Honours. After this the Britains drew back toward the Mouth of Thames, and acquainted with those Places, cross'd over, where the Romans following them through Bogs and dangerous Flats, hazarded the Loss of all. Yet the Germans getting over, and others by a Bridge at some place above, fell on them again with sundry Alarms and great Slaughter; but in the heat of Pursuit running themselves again into Bogs and Mires, lost as many of their own. Upon which ill Success, and seeing the Britains more enrag'd at the Death of Togodumnus, who in one of these Battles had been slain: Plautius fearing the worst, and glad that he could hold what he held, as was enjoy'd him,

A.D. 43. sends to Claudius. He who waited ready with a huge Preparation, as if not safe enough amidst the Flower of all his Romans, like a great Eastern King with arm'd Elephants, marches through Gallia. So full of peril was this Enterprize esteem'd, as not without all this Equipage, and stranger Terrors than Roman Armies to meet the native and the naked British Valour defending their Country. Join'd with Plautius, who encamping on the Bank of Thames, attended him, he passes the River. The Britains, who had the Courage, but not the wise Conduct of old Cassibelan, laying all Stratagem aside, in downright Manhood scrupled not to affront in open Field almost the whole Power of the Roman Empire. But overcome and vanquish'd, part by force, others by treaty come in and yield. Claudius therefore, who took Camalodunum, the Royal Seat of Cunobeline, was often by his Army saluted Imperator; a Military Title which usually they gave their General after any notable Exploit; but to others not above once in the same War; as if Claudius by these Acts had deserv'd more than the Laws of Rome had provided Honour to reward. Having therefore disarm'd the Britains, but remitted the Confiscation of their Goods, for which they worshipp'd him with Sacrifice and Temple as a God; leaving Plautius to subdue what remain'd, he returns to Rome, from whence he had been absent only six Months, and in Britain but sixteen Days; sending the News before him of his Victories, though in a small part of the Island. To whom the Senate, as for Achievements of highest Merit, decreed excessive Honours; Arches, Triumphs, Annual Solemnities, and the Sirname of Britannicus both to him and his Son. Suetonius writes, that Claudius found here no Resistance, and that all was done without Stroke: But this seems not probable. The Monmouth Writer names these two Sons of Cunobeline, Guiderius and Arviragus; that Guiderius being slain in fight, Arviragus to conceal it put on his Brother's Habillements, and in his Person held up the Battel to a Victory; the rest, as of Hamo the Roman Captain, Genuissa the Emperor's Daughter, and such like stuff, is too palpably untrue to be worth rehearsing in the midst of Truth. Plautius after this, employing his fresh Forces to conquer on, and quiet the rebelling Countries, found work enough to deserve at his return a kind of Triumphant Riding into the Capitol, side by side with the Emperor. Vespasian also under Plautius had thirty Conflicts with the Enemy; in one of which encompass'd, and in great danger, he was valiantly and piously rescu'd by his Son Titus: Two powerful Nations he subdu'd here, above twenty Towns and the Isle of Wight, for which he received at Rome Triumphal Ornaments, and other great Dignities. For that City in reward of Virtue, was ever magnificent; and long after, when true Merit was ceas'd among them, lest any thing resembling Virtue should want Honour, the same Rewards were yet allow'd to the very Shadow and Ostentation of Merit. Ostorius in the room of Plautius Vice-prætor, met with turbulent Affairs; the Britains not ceasing to vex with Inrodes all those Countries that were yielded to the Romans; and now the more eagerly, supposing A.D. 50. that the new General unacquainted with his Army, and on the edge of Winter, would not hastily oppose them. But he weighing that first Events were most available to breed Fear or Contempt, with such cohorts as were next at hand, sets out against them: Whom having routed, so close he follows, as one who meant not to be every Day molested with the Cavils of a slight Peace, or an embolden'd Enemy. Lest they should make head again, he disarms whom he suspects; and to surround them, places many Garrisons upon the Rivers of Antona and Sabrina. But the Icenians, a stout People, untouch'd yet by these Wars, as having before sought Alliance with the Romans, were the first that brook'd not this. By their Example others rise; and in a chosen place, fence'd with high Banks of Earth, and narrow Lanes to prevent the Horse, warily Encamp. Ostorius, though yet not strengthen'd with his Legions, causes the Auxiliar Bands, his Troops also allighting, to assault the Rampart. They within, tho' pester'd with their own number, stood to it like Men resolv'd, and in a narrow compass did remarkable Deeds. But over-power'd at last, and others by their success quieted, who till then wavered, Ostorius next bends his Force upon the Cangians, wafting all even to the Sea of Ireland, without Foe in his way, or them who durst ill handl'd: When the Brigantes attempting new matters, drew him back to settle first what was unsecure behind him. They, of whom the chief were punish'd, the rest forgiven, soon gave over; but the Silures, no way tractable, were not to be repress'd without a set War. To further this, Camalodunum was planted with a Colony of Veteran Soldiers to be a firm and ready Aid against Revolts, and a means to teach the Natives Roman Law and Civility. Cogidunus also a British King, their fast Friend, had to the same intent certain Cities given him: A haughty Craft, which the Romans us'd, to make Kings also the servile Agents of enslaving others. But the Silures, hardy of themselves, rely'd more on the Valour of Caradac; whom many doubtful, many prosperous Successes had made eminent above all that rul'd in Britain. He adding to his Courage Policy; and knowing himself to be of strength inferiour, in other advantages the better; makes the Seat of his War among the Ordovices; a Country wherein all the odds were to his own Party, all the difficulties to his Enemy. The Hills and every Access he fortify'd with Heaps of Stones, and Guards of Men; to come at whom a River of unsafe Passage must be first waded. The place, as Cambden conjectures, had thence the name of Caer-Caradoc, on the West edge of Shropshire. He himself continually went up and down, animating his Officers and Leaders, that This was the Day, This the Field, either to defend their Liberty, or to die free; calling to mind the Names of his glorious Ancestors, who drove Cæsar the Dictator out of Britain, whose Valour hitherto had preserv'd them from bondage, their Wives and Children from dishonour. Inflam'd with these words, they all vow their utmost, with such undaunted Resolution as amaz'd the Romans.

A. D. 50. General; but the Soldier less weighing, because less knowing, clamour'd to be led on against any danger. Ostorius, after wary Circumspection, bids them pass the River: The Britains no sooner had them within reach of their Arrows, Darts and Stones, but slew and wounded largely of the Romans. They on the other side closing their Ranks, and over head closing their Targets, threw down the loose Rampiers of the Britains, and pursue them up the Hills, both light arm'd, and Legions; till what with gauling Darts and heavy Strokes, the Britains who wore neither Helmet nor Cuirass to defend them, were at last overcome. This the Romans thought a famous Victory; wherein the Wife and Daughter of Caratacus were taken, his Brothers also reduc'd to Obedience; himself escaping to Carismandua Queen of the Brigantes, against Faith given, was to the Victors deliver'd bound: Having held out against the Romans nine Years, saith Tacitus; but by truer computation ^b seven. Whereby his Name was up through all the adjoining Provinces, even to Italy and Rome: Many desiring to see who he was that could withstand so many Years the Romans Puissance: And Cæsar, to extol his own Victory, extoll'd the Man whom he had vanquish'd. Being brought to Rome, the People, as to a solemn Spectacle, were call'd together, the Emperor's Guard stood in Arms. In order came first the King's Servants, bearing his Trophies, won in other Wars; next, his Brothers, Wife, and Daughter; last, himself. The Behaviour of others through fear was low and degenerate: He only, neither in Countenance, Word or Action submissive, standing at the Tribunal of Claudius, briefly spake to this purpose: If my Mind, Cæsar, had been as moderate in the height of Fortune, as my Birth and Dignity was eminent, I might have come a Friend rather than a Captive into this City. Nor couldst thou have dislik'd him for a Confederate, so Noble of Descent, and Ruling so many Nations. My present Estate, to me disgraceful, to thee is glorious; I had Riches, Horses, Arms, and Men; no wonder then if I contended, not to lose them. But if by Fate, yours only must be Empire, then of necessity ours among the rest must be Subjection. If I sooner had been brought to yield, my Misfortune had been less notorious, your Conquest had been less renown'd, and in your severest determining of me, both will be soon forgotten. But if you grant that I shall live, by me will live to you for ever that Praise which is so near divine, the Clemency of a Conqueror. Cæsar mov'd at such a Spectacle of Fortune, but especially at the nobleness of his bearing it, gave him pardon, and to all the rest. They all unbound, submissively thank him, and did like reverence to Agrippina the Emperor's Wife, who sat by in State: A new and disdain'd sight to the Manly Eyes of Romans, a Woman sitting publick in her Female Pride among Ensigns and Armed Cohorts. To Ostorius, Triumph is decreed; and his Acts esteem'd equal to theirs that brought in Bonds to Rome famous Kings. But the same prosperity attended not his later Actions here. For the Silures, whether to revenge their loss of Caratacus, or that they saw Ostorius, as if now all were done, less earnest to restrain them, beset the Prefect of his Camp, left there with Legionary Bands to appoint Garrisons: And had not speedy Aid come in from the neighbouring Holds and Castles, had cut them all off; notwithstanding which, the D. D. 50. Prefect with eight Centurions, and many their stoutest Men were slain: And upon the neck of this, meeting first with Roman Foragers, then with other Troops hastening to their relief, utterly foil'd and broke them also. Ostorius sending more after, could hardly stay their flight; till the weighty Legions coming on, at first pois'd the Battel, at length turn'd the Scale; to the Britains without much loss, for by that time it grew Night. Then was the War shiver'd as it were into small Frays and Bickerings, not unlike sometimes to so many Robberies, in Woods, at Waters, as Chance or Valour, Advice or Rashness led them on, commanded or without command. That which most exasperated the Silures, was a Report of certain Words cast out by the Emperor, That he would root them out to the very Name. Therefore two Cohorts more of Auxiliars, by the avarice of their Leaders too securely pillaging, they quite intercepted: And bestowing liberally the Spoils and Captives, whereof they took plenty; drew other Countries to join with them. These Losses falling so thick upon the Romans, Ostorius with the thought and anguish thereof ended his Days: The Britains rejoicing, although no Battel, that yet adverse War had worn out so great a Soldier. Cæsar in his place ordains Aulus Didius: But ere his coming, tho' much hasten'd, that the Province might not want a Governour; the Silures had given an overthrow to Manlius Valens with his Legion, rumour'd on both sides greater than was true; by the Silures to amate the new General; by him in a double respect, of the more praise if he quell'd them, or the more excuse if he fail'd. Mean time, the Silures forget not to infest the Roman Pale with wide Exursions; till Didius marching out, kept them somewhat more within bounds. Nor were they long to seek, who after Caratacus should lead them; for next to him, in Worth and Skill of War, Venutius a Prince of the Brigantes meri-^{Tac. An. 12.} ted to be their chief. He at first faithful to the Romans, and by them protected, was the Husband of Cartismandua Queen of the Brigantes, himself perhaps reigning elsewhere. She who had betray'd Caratacus and her Country to adorn the Triumph of Claudius, thereby grown powerful and gracious with the Romans, presuming on the Hire of her Treason, deserted her Husband; and marrying Vellocatus, one of his Squires, confers on him the Kingdom also. This Deed, so odious and full of Infamy, disturb'd the whole State: Venutius with other Forces, and the help of her own Subjects, who detested the Example of so foul a Fact, and withal the uncomeliness of their Subjection to the Monarchy of a Woman, a piece of Manhood not every Day to be found among Britains, though she had got by subtle train his Brother with many of his Kindred into her hands, brought her soon below the confidence of being able to resist longer. When imploring the Roman Aid, with much ado, and after many a hard encounter, she escap'd the Punishment which was ready to have seiz'd her. Venutius thus debarr'd the Authority of ruling his own Household, justly turns his Anger against the Romans themselves; whose Magnanimity, not wont to undertake dishonourable Causes, had arrogantly intermeddled in his domestick Affairs, to uphold the Rebellion of an Adultress against her Husband.

^a Caratacus King of the Silures was routed by the Romans near Ludlow in Shropshire; Mr. Cambden says this Battel was fought Anno 53. Camb. Tit. Shrop.

^b Tacitus in his Annals, lib. 12. cap. 36. writes, 'twas in the seventh Year after this War began, that Caratacus was taken.

First in a sharp Conflict of uncertain Event, then against the Legion of Cassius Nasica. Inasmuch that Didius growing old, and managing the War by Deputies, had work enough to stand on his defence, with the gaining now and then of a

Isle things continu'd in the same plight to the Reign of Vespasian) was minded but for shame

to have withdrawn the Roman Forces out of Britain:

In other parts whereof, about the same time, other things befel. Verannius, whom Nero

sent hither to succeed Didius, dying in his first Year, save a few Inrodes upon the Silures, left only a great Boast behind him, That in two Years, had he liv'd, he would have Conquer'd all. But Suetonius Paulinus, who next was sent hither, esteem'd a Soldier equal to the best in that Age,

for two Years together went on prosperously;

both confirming what was got, and subduing onward. At last, over-confident of his present Actions, and emulating others, of whose Deeds he heard from abroad, marches up as far as Mona,

the Isle of Anglesey, a populous place. For they,

it seems, had both entertain'd Fugitives, and given good assistance to the rest that withstood

him. He makes him Boats with flat bottoms, fitted to the Shallows which he expected in that narrow Frith: His Foot so pass'd over, his Horse waded or swam. Thick upon shoar stood several gross Bands of Men well weapon'd, many Women like Furies running to and fro in dismal

Habit, with Hair loose about their Shoulders, held Torches in their Hands. The Druids, those were their Priests, of whom more in another place, with Hands lift up to Heaven, uttering direful Prayers, astonish'd the Romans; who, at so strange a sight, stood in amaze, tho' wounded:

At length awak'd, and encourag'd by their General, not to fear a barbarous and lunatick Rout, fall on, and beat them down scor'd and routing in their own Fire. Then were they yoked with Garrisons, and the Places consecrate to their Bloody Superstitions destroy'd. For whom they took in War they held it lawful to Sacrifice; and by the Entrails of Men us'd Divination. While thus Paulinus had his thought still fix'd before, to go on winning, his back lay broad open to occasion of losing more behind. For the Britains urg'd and oppress'd with many unnumberable Injuries, had all banded themselves to a general

Revolt. The particular Causes are not all written by one Author; Tacitus, who liv'd next those times of any to us extant, writes, that Prasuta-

gus King of the Iceni, abounding in Wealth, had left Cesar Coheir with his two Daughters;

thereby hoping to have secur'd from all wrong

both his Kingdom and his House; which fell out far otherwise. For under colour to oversee and of Claudius. Lastly, Seneca, in his Books, a Philosopher, having drawn the Britains unwillingly to borrow of him vast Sums upon fair promises of easie Loan, and for Repayment to take their own time, on a sudden compels them to pay in all at once with great extortion. Thus pro-vok'd by heaviest Sufferings, and thus invited by opportunities in the absence of Paulinus, the Ice- nians, and by their Example the Trinovantes, and as many else as hated Servitude, rise up in Arms.

Of these ensuing Troubles many foregoing Signs

appear'd: The Image of Victory at Camalodunum

fell down of it self, with her Face turn'd as it were to the Britains; certain Women, in a kind of extasie, foretold of Calamities to come; in the

Counsell-house were heard by Night barbarous

Noises; in the Theatre hideous Howlings; in the Creek horrid Sights, betokening the destruction of that Colony; hereto the Ocean seeming of a Bloody Hew, and Humane Shapes, at a low ebb

ains new Courage, in the Romans unwonted

Fears. Camalodunum, where the Romans had seated themselves to dwell pleasantly, rather than defensively, was not fortify'd: Against that therefore the Britains make first Assault. The Soldiers within were not very many. Decianus

the Procurator could send them but two hundred, those ill Arm'd: And through the Treachery of some among them, who secretly favour'd the Insurrection, they had deferr'd both to entrench and to send out such as bore not Arms; such as did, flying to the Temple, which on the second

Day was forcibly taken, were put all to the Sword,

the Temple made a heap, the rest rifled and burnt.

Petilius Cerealis coming to his succour, is in his way met, and overthrown, his whole Legion cut to pieces; he with his Horse hardly escaping to the Roman Camp. Decianus, whose rapine was the cause of all this, fled into Gallia. But Sueton- ius at these tidings not dismay'd, through the midst of his Enemy's Country marches to London

(though not term'd a Colony, yet full of Roman

Inhabitants, and for the frequency of Trade and other Commodities, a Town even then of principal note) with purpose to have made there the Seat of War. But considering the smallness of his numbers, and the late rashness of Petilius, he chooses rather with the loss of one Town to save the rest. Nor was he flexible to any Prayers or Weeping of them that besought him to tarry

there; but taking with him such as were willing,

gave signal to depart; they, who through weakness of Sex or Age, or love of the place, went not along, perish'd by the Enemy; so did Veru- lam, a Roman free Town. For the Britains omitting Forts and Castles, flew thither first where richest Booty, and the hope of pillaging toald them on. In this Massacre, about seventy thousand Romans, and their Associates, in the places

above-mention'd, of a certain, lost their Lives.

None might be spar'd, none ransom'd, but tasted

all either a present or a lingering Death; no Cruelty that either Outrage, or the insolence of Success put into their Heads, was left unacted.

The Roman Wives and Virgins hang'd up all naked, had their Breasts cut off, and sow'd to their Mouths; that in the grimness of Death

they might seem to eat their own Flesh; while the Britains fell to feasting and corousing in the Temple of Andate their Goddess of Victory.

A.D. 63. posing with those not to defer Battel, had chosen a place narrow, and not to be overwing'd on his Rear a Wood; being well inform'd, that his Enemies were all in Front on a Plain unapt for Ambush: The Legionaries stood thick in order, im-pal'd with light armed; the Horse on either Wing. The Britains in Companies and Squadrons were every where shouting and swarming, such a multitude as at other time never; no less reckon'd than two hundred and thirty thousand, so fierce and confident of Victory, that their Wives also came in Waggon to sit and behold the sport, as they made full account, of killing Romans: A Folly doubtless for the serious Romans to smile at, as a sure token of prospering that Day: A Woman also was their Commander in chief. For Boadicea and her Daughters ride about in a Chariot, telling the tall Champions, as a great encouragement, that with the Britains it was usual for Women to be their Leaders. A deal of other fondness they put into her Mouth, not worth recital; how she was lash'd, how her Daughters were handled, things worthier silence, retirement, and a Vail, than for a Woman to repeat, as done to her own Person, or to hear repeated before an Host of Men. The Greek Historian sets her in the Field on a high heap of Turves, in a loose-body'd Gown declaiming, a Spear in her Hand, a Hare in her Bosom, which after a long Circumlocution she was to let slip among them for Luck's sake; then praying to Andate, the British Goddess, to talk again as fondly as before. And this they do out of a vanity, hoping to embellish and set out their History with the strangeness of our Manners; not caring in the mean while to brand us with the rankest note of Barbarism, as if in Britain Women were Men, and Men Women. I affect not set Speeches in a History, unless known for certain to have been so spoken in effect as they were written; nor then, unless worth rehearsal: And to invent such, though eloquently, as some Historians have done, is an abuse of Posterity, raising, in them that read, other Conceptions of those Times and Persons than were true. Much less therefore do I purpose here or elsewhere to copy out tedious Orations without decorum, though in their Authors compos'd ready to my hand. Hitherto what we have heard of Cassibelan, Togadammus, Vemius, and Charactacus, hath been full of Magnanimity, Soberness, and Martial Skill: But the truth is, that in this Battel, and whole business, the Britains never more plainly manifested themselves to be right Barbarians; no Rule, no Forefight, no Forecast, Experience or Estimation, either of themselves, or of their Enemies; such Confusion, such Impotence, as seem'd likest not to a War, but to the wild Hurry of a distracted Woman, with as mad a Crew at her Heels. Therefore Suetonius condemning their unruly Noises, and fierce Looks, heartens his Men but to stand close a while, and strike manfully this headless Rabble that stood nearest, the rest would be a Purchase rather than a Toil. And so it fell out; For the Legion, when they saw their time, bursting out like a violent Wedge, quickly broke and dissipated what oppos'd them; all else held only out their Necks to the Slayer, for their own Carts and Waggon were so plac'd by themselves, as left them but little room to escape between. The Romans slew all; Men, Women, and the very drawing Horses lay heap'd along the Field, in a gory mixture of Slaughter. About fourscore thousand Britains are said to have been A.D. 64. slain on the place; of the Enemy scarce four hundred, and not many more wounded. Boadicea 80000 Britains kill'd poyson'd her self, or, as others say, sicken'd and dy'd. * She was of Stature big and tall, of Visage grim and stern, harsh of Voice, her Hair of bright colour, flowing down to her Hips; she wore a plaited Garment of divers colours, with a great Golden Chain, button'd over all a thick Robe. Gildas calls her the crafty Lioness, and leaves an ill Fame upon her Doings. Dion sets down otherwise the Order of this Fight, and that the Field was not won without much difficulty, nor without intention of the Britains to give another Battel, had not the Death of Boadicea come between. Howbeit Suetonius, to preserve Discipline, and to dispatch the Relicks of War, lodg'd with all his Army in the open Field; which was supply'd out of Germany with a thousand Horse, and ten thousand Foot; thence dispers'd to Winter, and with Incurfions to waste those Countries that stood out. But to the Britains Famine was a worse Affliction; having left off during this Uproar, to till the Ground, and made reckoning to serve themselves on the Provisions of their Enemy. Nevertheless those Nations, that were yet untam'd, hearing of some discord risen between Suetonius and the new Procurator Classicianus, were brought but slowly to terms of Peace; and the rigour us'd by Suetonius on them that yielded, taught them the better course to stand on their defence. For it is certain, that Suetonius, though else a worthy Man, over-proud of his Victory, gave too much way to his Anger against the Britains. Classician therefore sending such word to Rome, that these severe proceedings would beget an endless War; Polycletus, * no Roman, but a Courtier, was sent by Nero to examine how things went. He admonishing Suetonius to use more mildness, aw'd the Army, and to the Britains gave matter of Laughter. Who so much even till then were nurs'd up in their Native Liberty, as to wonder that so great a General with his whole Army should be at the rebuke and ordering of a Court Servitor. But Suetonius a while after having lost a few Gallies on the Shoar, was bid resign his Command to Petronius Turpilianus, who not provoking the Britains, nor by them provok'd, was thought to have pretended the love of Peace to what indeed was his love of Ease and Sloth. Trebellius Maximus follow'd his steps, usurping the Name of gentle Government to any remissions or neglect of Discipline; which brought in first Licence, next Disobedience into his Camp; incens'd against him, partly for his Covetousness, partly by the Incitement of Roscius Calius Legate of a Legion; with whom formerly disagreeing, now that Civil War began in the Empire, he fell to open discord; charging him with Disorder and Sedition, and him Calius with peeling and defrauding the Legions of their pay; inso-much that Trebellius hated, and deserted of the Soldiers, was content a while to govern by a base entreaty, and forc'd at length to flee the Land. Which notwithstanding remain'd in good quiet, govern'd by Calius, and the other Legate of a Legion, both faithful to Vitellius then Emperor, who sent hither Vespius Bolanus; under whose lenity, though not tainted with other fault, against the Britains nothing was done, nor in their own Discipline reform'd. Petilius Cerealis by appointment of Vespasian succeeding, had to do

A.D. 74. with the populous Brigantes in many Battels, and some of those, not unbloody. For as we heard before, it was Venusius who even to these times held them tack, both himself remaining to the end unvanquish'd. and some part of his Country not so much as reach'd. It appears also by several Passages in the Histories of Tacitus, that no small number of British Forces were commanded over Sea the Year before to serve in those bloody Wars between Osbo and Vitellius, Vitellius and Vespasian contending for the Empire. To Cerealis succeeded Julius Frontinus in the Government of Britain, who by taming the Silures, a People warlike and strongly inhabiting, augmented much his Reputation. But Julius Agricola,^a whom Vespasian in his last Year sent hither, train'd up from his Youth in the British Wars, extended with Victories the Roman Limit beyond all his Predecessors. His coming was in the midst of Summer; and the Ordovices to welcome the new General, had hew'n in pieces a whole Squadron of Horse, which lay upon their Bounds, few escaping. Agricola, who perceiv'd that the Noise of this Defeat had also in the Province desirous of Novelty, stir'd up new Expectations, resolves to be before-hand with the Danger: And drawing together the Choice of his Legions with a competent Number of Auxiliars, not being met by the Ordovices, who kept the Hills, himself in the Head of his Men hunts them up and down through difficult Places, almost to the final extirpating of that whole Nation. With the same current of Success, what Paulinus had left unfinished he conquers in the Isle of Mona: For the Islanders altogether fearless of his approach, whom they knew to have no Shipping, when they saw themselves invaded on a sudden by the Auxiliars, whose Country Use had taught them to swim over with Horse and Arms, were compell'd to yield. This gain'd Agricola much Opinion; who at his very Entrance, a time which others bestow'd of course in hearing Complements and Gratulations, had made such early Progress into laborious and hardest Enterprises. But by far not so famous was Agricola in bringing War to a speedy end, as in cutting off the Causes from whence War arises. For he knowing that the end of War was not to make way for Injuries in Peace, began Reformation from his own House; permitted not his Attendants and Followers to sway, or have to do at all in Publick Affairs: Lays on with Equality the Proportions of Corn and Tribute that were impos'd; takes off Exactions and the Fees of encroaching Officers, heavier than the Tribute it self. For the Countries had been compell'd before, to sit and wait the opening of publick Granaries, and both to sell and buy their Corn at what rate the Publicans thought fit; the Purveyers also commanding when they pleas'd to bring it in, not to the nearest, but still to the remotest Places, either by the compounding of such as would be excus'd, or by causing a Dearth, where none was, made a particular Gain. These Grievances and the like, he in the time of Peace removing, brought Peace into some Credit; which before, since the Romans coming, had as ill a Name as War. The Summer following, Titus then Emperor, he so continually with Inroads disquieted the Enemy over all the Isle, and after Terror so allur'd them with his gentle Demeanour, that many Cities which till that time would not bend, gave Hostages, admitted Garrisons, and came in voluntarily. The Winter he spent all in worthy Actions; teaching and promoting like a publick Father, the Institutes and Customs of civil Life. The Inhabitants rude and scatter'd, and by that the prone to War, he so perswaded as to build Houses, Temples, and Seats of Justice; and by praising the forward, quickning the slow, assisting all, turn'd the Name of Necessity into an Emulation. He caus'd moreover the Noblemens Sons to be bred up in Liberal Arts; and by preferring the Wits of Britain, before the Studies of Gallia, brought them to affect the Latin Eloquence, who before hated the Language. Then were the Roman Fashions imitated, and the Gown; after a while the Incitements also and Materials of Vice, and voluptuous Life, proud Buildings, Baths, and the Elegance of Banqueting; which the foolish sort call'd Civility, but was indeed a secret Art to prepare them for Bondage. Spring appearing, he took the Field, and with a prosperous Expedition waded as far Northward as the Frith of Taus all that obey'd not; with such a Terror, as he went, that the Roman Army, though much hinder'd by tempestuous Weather, had the leisure to build Forts and Castles where they pleas'd, none daring to oppose them. Besides, Agricola had this Excellence in him, so providently to chuse his Places where to fortifie, as not another General then alive. No Sconce, or Fortrefs of his raising was ever known either to have been forc'd, or yielded up, or quitted. Out of these impregnable by Siege, or in that case duely reliev'd, with continual Irruptions he so prevail'd, that the Enemy, whose manner was in Winter to regain, what in Summer he had lost, was now alike in both Seasons kept short, and streiten'd. For these Exploits then Titus in whose Reign they were achiev'd, was the fifteenth time saluted Imperator; and of him Agricola receiv'd Triumphal Honours. The fourth Summer, Domitian then ruling the Empire, he spent in settling and confirming what the Year before he had travail'd over with a running Conquest. And had the Valour of his Soldiers been answerable, he had reach'd that Year, as was thought, the utmost Bounds of Britain. For Glota, and Bodotria, now Dunbritton, and the Frith of Edinburgh; two opposite Arms of the Sea, divided only by a Neck of Land, and all the Creeks and Inlets on this side, were held by the Romans, and the Enemy driv'n as it were into another Island. In his fifth Year he pass'd over into the Orcades, as we may probably guess, and other Scotch Isles; discovering and subduing Nations till then unknown. He gain'd also with his Forces that part of Britain which faces Ireland, as aiming also to conquer that Island; where one of the Irish Kings driv'n out by Civil Wars, coming to him, he both gladly receiv'd, and retain'd him as against a fit time. The Summer ensuing on, mistrust that the Nations beyond Bodotria would generally rise, and forelay the Passages by Land, he caus'd his Fleet, making a great shew, to bear along the Coast, and up the Friths and Harbours; joining most commonly at Night on the same Shoar both Land and Sea Forces, with mutual Shouts and loud Greetings. At sight whereof the Britains, not wont to see their Sea so ridden, were much daunted. Howbeit, the Caledonians with great Preparation, and by Rumor, as of things unknown, much greater, taking Arms, and of their own accord beginning War by the Assault of sundry Castles, sent back some of their Fear to the Romans themselves: And there were of the Commanders,

A.D. 84. manders, who cloaking their Fear under shew of sage Advice, counsell'd the General to retreat back on this side Bodotria. He in the mean while having Intelligence, that the Enemy would fall on in many Bodies, divided also his Army into three parts. Which Advantage the Britains quickly spying, and on a sudden uniting what before they had disjoyn'd, assail by Night with all their Forces that part of the Roman Army, which they knew to be the weakest; and breaking in upon the Camp surpriz'd between Sleep and Fear, had begun some Execution. When Agricola, who had learnt what way the Enemies took, and follow'd them with all speed, sending before him the lightest of his Horse and Foot to charge them behind, the rest as they came on to allright them with Clamour, foply'd them without respite, that by approach of Day the Roman Ensigns glittering all about, had encompass'd the Britains: Who now after a sharp Fight in the very Ports of the Camp, betook them to their wonted refuge, the Woods and Fens, pursu'd a while by the Romans, that Day else in all Appearance had ended the War. The Legions reincourag'd by this Event, they also now boasting, who but lately trembl'd, cry all to be led on as far as there was British Ground. The Britains also not acknowledging the Loss of that Day to Roman Valour, but to the Policy of their Captain, abated nothing of their Stoutness, but arming their Youth, conveying their Wives and Children to Places of Safety, in frequent Assemblies, and by solemn Covenants bound themselves to mutual Assistance against the Common Enemy. About the same time a Cohort of Germans having slain their Centurion with other Roman Officers in a Mutiny, and for fear of Punishment fled a Shipboard, launch'd forth in three light Gallies without Pilot: And by Tide or Weather carried round about the Coast, using Piracy where they landed, while their Ships held out, and as their Skill serv'd them, with various Fortune, were the first Discoverers to the Romans that Britain was an Island.

85. The following Summer, Agricola having before sent his Navy to hover on the Coast, and with fundry and uncertain landings to divert and disunite the Britains, himself with a Power best appointed for Expedition, wherein also were many Britains, whom he had long try'd both valiant and faithful, marches onward to the Mountain Grampius^a, where the British, above 20000, were now lodg'd, and still increasing: For neither would their old Men, so many as were yet vigorous and lusty, be left at home, long practis'd in War, and every one adorn'd with some Badge, or Cognifance of his Warlike Deeds long ago. Of whom Galgacus^b, both by Birth and Merit the prime Leader, to their Courage, though of it self hot and violent, is by his rough Oratory, in Detestation of Servitude and the Roman Yoke, said to have added much more Eagerness of Fight; testified by their Shouts and barbarous Applauses. As much did on the other side Agricola exhort his Soldiers to Victory and Glory; as much the Soldiers by his firm and well grounded Exhortations were all on a fire to the onset. But first he orders them in this sort. Of 8000 Auxiliar Foot he makes his middle Ward, on the Wings 3000 Horse, the Legions as a reserve, stood in array before the Camp; either to seize the Victory won without their own Hazard, or to keep up the Battel if it should need. The British Powers on the Hill side, as might best serve for Shew and Terrour, stood in A.D. 85. their Battalions; the first on even Ground, the next rising behind, as the Hill ascended. The Field between rung with the Noise of Horsemen and Chariots ranging up and down. Agricola doubting to be over-wing'd, stretches out his Front, though somewhat with the thinnest, inso-much that many advis'd to bring up the Legions; yet he not altering, alights from his Horse, and stands on foot before the Ensigns. The Fight began aloof, and the Britains had a certain Skill with their broad swathing Swords and short Bucklers either to strike aside, or to bear off the Darts of their Enemies; and withal to send back Showers of their own. Until Agricola discerning that those little Targets and unweildy Glaves ill pointed, would soon become ridiculous against the thrust and close, commanded three Batavian Cohorts, and two of the Tungrians exercis'd and arm'd for close Fight, to draw up, and come to handy Strokes. The Batavians, as they were commanded, running in upon them, now with their long Tucks thrusting at the Face, now their piked Targets bearing them down, had made good riddance of them that stood below; and for hast omitting farther Execution, began apace to advance up Hill, seconded now by all the other Cohorts. Mean while the Horse-men fly, the Charioters mix themselves to fight among the Foot; where many of their Horse also fall'n in disorderly, were now more a Mischief to their own, than before a Terror to their Enemies. The Battel was a confus'd Heap; the Ground unequal; Men, Horses, Chariots crowded pelmel; sometimes in little room, by and by in large, fighting, rushing, felling, over-bearing, over-turning. They on the Hill, which were not yet come to Blows, perceiving the Fewness of their Enemies, came down amain; and had enclos'd the Romans unawares behind, but that Agricola with a strong Body of Horse, which he reserv'd for such a purpose, repell'd them back as fast: And others drawn off the Front, were commanded to wheel about and charge them on the backs. Then were the Romans clearly Masters; they follow, they wound, they take, and to take more, kill whom they take: The Britains in whole Troops with Weapons in their hands, one while flying the Pursuer, anon without Weapons desperately running upon the Slayer. But all of them, when once they got the Woods to their Shelter, with fresh Boldness made head again, and the forwardest on a sudden they turn'd and slew, the rest so hamper'd, as had not Agricola, who was every where at hand, sent out his readiest Cohorts, with part of his Horse to alight and scowr the Woods, they had receiv'd a foil in the midst of Victory; but following with a close and orderly Pursuit, the Britains fled again, and were totally scatter'd; till Night and Weariness ended the Chase. And of them that Day 10000 fell; of the Romans 240, among whom Aulus Atticus the Leader of a Cohort; carried with Heat of Youth and the Fierceness of his Horse too far on. The Romans jocond of this Victory, and the Spoil they got, spent the Night; the vanquished wandring about the Field, both Men and Women, some lamenting, some calling their lost Friends, or carrying off their wounded; others forsaking, some burning their own Houses; and it was certain enough, that there were who with a stern Compassion laid violent hands on their Wives and Children to

A.D. 85. prevent the more violent hands of hostile Injury. Next Day appearing manifested more plainly the greatness of their loss receiv'd; every where Silence, Desolation, Houses burning afar off, not a Man seen, all fled and doubtful whither: Such word the Scouts bringing in from all parts, and the Summer now spent, no fit season to disperse a War, the Roman General leads his Army among the Horestians; by whom Hostages being given, he commands his Admiral with a sufficient Navy to sail round the Coast of Britain: Himself with slow marches, that his delay in pailing might serve to awe those new-conquer'd Nations, bestows his Army in their Winter-Quarters. The Fleet also having fetch'd a prosperous and speedy compass about the Isle, put in at the Haven Trutulensis, now Richborough near Sandwich, from whence it first set out: And now likeliest, if not two Years before, as was mention'd, the Romans might discover and subdue the Isles of Orkney; which others with less reason following Eusebius and Orosius, attribute to the Deeds of Claudius. These perpetual Exploits abroad won him wide Fame; with Domitian, under whom great Virtue was as punishable as open Crime, won him Hatred. For he maligning the Renown of these his Acts, in shew decreed him Honours, in secret devis'd his Ruine. Agricola therefore commanded home for doing too much of what he was sent to do, left the Province to his Successor quiet and secure^b. Whether he, as is conjectured, were Salustius Lucullus, or before him some other, for Suetonius only names him Legate of Britain under Domitian; but farther of him, or ought else done here until the time of Hadrian, is no where plainly to be found. Some gather by a Preface in Tacitus to the Book of his Histories, that what Agricola won here, was soon after by Domitian either through want of Valour lost, or through Envy neglected. And Juvenal^c the Poet speaks of Arviragus^d in these Days, and not before, King of Britain: Who stood so well in his resistance, as not only to be talk'd of at Rome, but to be held matter of a glorious Triumph, if Domitian could take him Captive, or overcome him. Then also Claudia Rufina, the Daughter of a Britain, and Wife of Pudence a Roman Senator, liv'd at Rome; famous by the Verse of Martial for Beauty, Wit and Learning. The next we hear of Britain, is that when Trajan was Emperor, it revolted, and was subdu'd. Under Adrian, Julius Severus, saith Dion, govern'd the Island, a prime Soldier of that Age, but he being call'd away to suppress the Jews then in tumult, left things at such pass, as caus'd the Emperor in Person to take a Journey hither; where many things he reform'd, and, as Augustus and Tiberius counsell'd, to gird the Empire within moderate bounds, he rais'd a Wall with great Stakes driven in deep, and fasten'd together, in manner of a strong Mound, eighty Mile in length, to divide what was Roman from Barbarian: No ancient Author names the place, but old Inscriptions, and Ruine it self yet testifies where it went along between Solway Frith, by Carlisle, and the Mouth of Tine. Hadrian having quieted the Island, took it for honour to be tir'd on his Coin, the Restorer of Britain. In his time also Priscus Licinius, as appears by an old Inscription, was Lieutenant here. Antoninus Pius reigning, the Brigantes ever least patient of foreign Servitude, breaking in upon Genouia (which Cambden guesses to be Guinethia or North-Wales) part of the Roman Province, were with the loss of much territory driven back by Lollius Urbicus, who drew another Wall of Turves, in likelihood much beyond the former, and as Cambden proves, between the Frith of Dunbritton, and of Edenborough, to hedge out Incursions from the North. And Seius Saturninus, as is collected from the Digests, had charge here of the Roman Navy. With like success did Marcus Aurelius next Emperor, by his Legate Calpurnius Agricola, finish here a new War: Commodus after him obtaining the Empire. In his time, as among so many different accounts may seem most probable, Lucius a suppos'd King in some part of Britain, the first of any King in Europe, that we read of, receiv'd the Christian Faith, and this Nation the first by publick Authority profess'd it: A high and singular Grace from above, if sincerity and perseverance went along, otherwise an empty boast, and to be fear'd the verifying of that true Sentence, the first shall be last. And indeed the Praise of this Action is more proper to King Lucius, than common to the Nation; whose first professing by publick Authority was no real commendation of their true Faith; which had appear'd more sincere and praise-worthy, whether in this or other Nation, first profess'd without publick Authority, or against it, might else have been but outward conformity. Lucius in our Monmouth Story is made the second by descent from Marius. Marius, the Son of Arviragus, is there said to have overthrown the Picts, then first coming out of Scythia, slain Rodoric their King; and in sign of Victory to have set up a Monument of Stone in the Country, since call'd Westmaria; but these things have no foundation. Coilus, the Son of Marius, all his Reign, which was just and peaceable, holding great amity with the Romans, left it hereditary to Lucius. He (if Beda err not, living near five hundred Years after, yet our antientest Author of this report) sent to Eleutherius, then Bishop of Rome, an improbable Letter, as some of the Contents discover, desiring that by his appointment he and his People might receive Christianity. From whom

^a These People have been plac'd about Eskdale, but the Name does better answer the Mountaneers, or Highlanders; and Tacitus's Relation of the matters of Fact, agrees best to those People.

^b The Tyrant Domitian was so jealous of Agricola's Glory, that he order'd him to make his Entry into Rome at his Return by Night, that he might not receive those Honours the Citizens were ready to pay him.

^c Salustius Lucullus was kill'd by Domitian, for calling his Spears Lucullians.

^d Regem aliquem capies aut de Temone Britanno Excidet Arviragus

See the Mighty Ocean, see
He cries of some illustrious Victory:
Some Captive King Thee his new Lord shall own,
Or from his British Chariot headlong thrown,
The proud Arviragus come humbling down.

The Poet supposes this Speech made by Frabicius Veien to flatter the Emperor Domit.

^e Arviragus dy'd, says Geoffrey, about the end of Domitian's Reign, and was succeeded by his Son Marius or Meurig, as the British Historians call him. He is mention'd also by William of Malsbury long before Geoffrey wrote.

^f All the Circumstances of that Story are fully discuss'd by the learned Bishop of Worcester, in his Origines Britannicae, p. 67, &c. See also Bishop Usher's Primordia, p. 19, 20, &c.

A. D. 181. two Religious Doctors, nam'd in our Chronicles Faganus and Deruvianus, forthwith sent, are said to have converted and baptiz'd well nigh the whole Nation: Thence Lucius to have had the Surname of Levermaur, that is to say, Great Light. Nor yet then first was the Christian Faith here known, but even from the latter Days of Tiberius, as Gildas confidently affirms, taught and propagated, and that as some say by Simon Zelotes, as others by J. Joseph of Arimathea, Barnabas, Paul, Peter, and their prime Disciples. But of these matters, variously written and believ'd, Ecclesiastick Historians can best determine: As the best of them do, with little credit given to the particulars of such uncertain relations. ^b As for Lucius, they write, that after a long Reign he was buried at Glocester; but dying without Issue, left the Kingdom in great Commotion. Dion. l. 72. By truer testimony we find that the greatest War, which in those days busy'd Commodus, was in this Island. For the Nations Northward, notwithstanding the Wall rais'd to keep them out, breaking in upon the Roman Province, wasted wide; and both the Army, and the Leader that came against them, wholly routed and destroy'd; which put the Emperor in such a fear, as to dispatch hither one of his best Commanders, Ulpus Marcellus. He, a Man endu'd with all Nobleness of Mind, frugal, temperate, mild and magnanimous, in War bold and watchful, invincible against Lucre, and the assault of Bribes, what with his Valour, and these his other Virtues, quickly ended this War that look'd so dangerous, and had himself like to have been ended by the Peace which he brought home, for presuming to be so worthy and so good under the envy of so worthless and so bad an Emperor. After whose departure the Roman Legions fell to Sedition among themselves; 1500 of them went to Rome in name of the rest, and were so terrible to Commodus himself, as that to please them he put to Death Perennius the Captain of his Guard. Notwithstanding which compliance they endeavour'd here to set up another Emperor against him; and Helvius Pertinax who succeeded Governour, found it a work so difficult to appease them, that once in a mutiny he was left for dead among many slain; and was fain at length to seek a dismission from his Charge. After him Clodius Albinus took the Government; but he, for having to the Soldiers made an Oration against Monarchy, by the appointment of Commodus was bid resign to Junius Severus. But Albinus in those troublesome times ensuing under the short Reign of Pertinax and Didius Julianus, found means to keep in his hands the Government of Britain; although Septimius Severus, who next held the Empire, sent hither Heracitus to displace him; but in vain, for Albinus, with all the British Powers, and those of Gallia, met Severus about Lyons in France, and fought a bloody Battel with him for the Empire, though at last vanquish'd and slain^d. The Government of Britain, Severus divided between two Deputies; till then one Le-gate was thought sufficient; the North he committed to Virius Lupus. Where the Meata rising in Arms, and the Caledonians, though they had promis'd the contrary to Lupus, preparing to defend them, so hard beset, he was compell'd to buy his Peace, and a few of Prisoners with great Sums of Money. But hearing that Severus had now brought to an end his other Wars, he writes him plainly the state of things here, that the Britains of the North made War upon him, broke into the Province, and harra's'd all the Countries nigh them, that there needed suddenly either more aid, or himself in person. Severus, though now much weaken'd with Age and the Gout, yet desirous to leave some Memorial of his Warlike Achievements here, as he had done in other places, and besides to withdraw by this means his two Sons^e from the pleasures of Rome, and his Soldiers from idleness, with a Mighty Power, far sooner than could be expected, arrives in Britain. The Northern People much daunted with the report of so great Forces brought over with him, and yet more preparing, send Ambassadors to treat of Peace, and to excuse their former doings. The Emperor now loth to return home without some memorable thing, whereby he might assume to his other Titles the addition of Britannicus, delays his answer, and quickens his preparations; till in the end, when all things were in readiness to follow them, they are dismiss'd without effect. His principal care was to have many Bridges laid over Bogs and rotten Moars, that his Soldiers might have to fight on sure footing. For it seems, through lack of tillage, the Northern parts were then, as Ireland is at this day; and the Inhabitants in like manner wonted to retire, and defend themselves in such watry places half naked. He also being past Adrian's Wall, cut down Woods, made way through Hills, fasten'd and fill'd up unbound and plashy Fens. Notwithstanding all this industry us'd, the Enemy kept himself so cunningly within his best advantages, and seldom appearing, so opportunely found his times to make irruption upon the Romans, when they were most in straights and difficulties, sometimes training them on with a few Cattel turn'd out, and drawn within ambush, cruelly handling them, that many a time enclos'd in the midst of Sloughs and Quagmires, they chose rather themselves to kill such as were faint and could not shift away, than leave them there a prey to the Caledonians. Thus lost Severus, and by Sicknefs in those noisome places, no less than 50000 Men: And yet desisted not, though for weakness carry'd in a Litter, till he had march'd through with his Army to the utmost Northern verge of the Isle; and the Britains offering Peace were compell'd to lose much of their Country, not before subject to the Romans. Severus on the Frontiers of what he had firmly conquer'd builds a Wall cross the Island from Sea to Sea; which one Author judges the most magnificent of all his other Deeds; and that he thence receiv'd the Stile of Britannicus; in length^f 132

^a Bishop Stillingfleet has made it very probable, that a Church was planted here in the Apostles times, by St. Paul himself. Vid. p. 35. Orig. Brit.

^b Archbishop Usher in his Eccl. Brit. Antiq. and Bishop Stillingfleet in his Orig. Brit. allow the Tradition of King Lucius; the Archbishop says, that he had seen two Coins, one of Gold, and the other of Silver, with the Image of a King on them, and the Letters LUC, with a Cross: Which is plain proof, that there was such a King, and that he was a Christian; but over what part of Britain he reign'd, is uncertain.

^c Pertinax was afterwards Emperor.

^d His Body was sent to Rome by Severus's Order, to be set over the place of publick Execution; and afterwards 'twas suffer'd to lie before the Pretorium till it stunk, and was devour'd by Dogs.

While Peace held, the Empress Julia meeting on a time certain British Ladies, and discoursing with the Wife of Argentocoxus a Caledonian, cast out a scoff against the Looseness of our Island Women; whose manner then was to use promiscuously the Company of divers Men. Whom straight the British Woman boldly thus answer'd: Much better do we Britains fulfil the Work of Nature, than you Romans; we with the best men accustom openly; you with the basest commit private Adulteries. Whether she thought this Answer might serve to justify the Practice of her Country, as when Vices are compar'd, the greater seems to justify the less, or whether the Law and Custom wherein she was bred, had wip'd out of her Conscience the better Dictate of Nature, and not convinc'd her of the Shame; certain it is, that whereas other Nations us'd a Liberty not unnatural for one Man to have many Wives, the Brit- ains altogether as licentious, but more absurd and preposterous in their Licence, had one or many Wives in common among ten or twelve Husbands; and those for the most part incestu-ously. But no sooner was Severus return'd into the Province, than the Britains take Arms again.
Against whom Severus worn out with Labours and Infirmary, sends Antoninus his eldest Son; expressly commanding him to spare neither Sex nor Age. But Antoninus who had his wicked Thoughts taken up with the contriving of his Father's Death, a safer Enemy than a Son, did the Britains not much Detriment. Whereat Se- verus more overcome with Grief than any other Malady, ended his Life at Tork. After whose decease Antoninus Caracalla his impious Son concluding Peace with the Britains, took Hostages and departed to Rome. The Conductor of all this Northern War Scottish Writers Name Donaldus, he of Monmouth Fulgenius, in the rest of his Relation nothing worth. From hence the Roman Empire declining apace, good Historians growing scarce, or lost, have left us little else but Fragments for many Years ensuing. Under Gor- dian the Emperor we find by the Inscription of an Altar stone, that Nomius Philippus govern'd here. Under Galiemus we read there was a 242. strong and general Revolt from the Roman Le-Cambd. gate. Of the thirty Tyrants which not long Cumber. after took upon them the Stile of Emperor, by 259. many Coins found among us, Lollius, Victo- Eumen. Pa- rinus, Posthumus, the Tetrici and Marius are conneg. Const. jectured to have risen or born great sway in this 267. Island. Whence Porphyrius, a Philosopher, then Cambd. living, said that Britain was a Soil fruitful of Gildas. Tyrants; and is noted to be the first Author Hieronym. that makes mention of the Scottish Nation.
282. While Probus was Emperor, Bonofus the Son of a Vopisc. in Rhetorician, bred up a Spaniard, though by de-Bonof. scent a Britain, and a matchless Drinker, nor much to be blam'd, if, as they write, he were still wisest in his Cups, having attained in Warfare to high Honours, and lastly in his Charge over the German Shipping, willingly, as was thought, miscarried, trusting on his Power with the Western Armies, and join'd with Proculus, A. D. bore himself a while for Emperor; but after a 282.

long and bloody Fight at Cullen vanquish'd by Probus, he hang'd himself, and gave occasion of a ready Jest made on him for his much drinking; Here hangs a Tankard not a Man. After this, Probus with much Wisdom prevented a new Rising here in Britain, by the severe Loyalty of Victorinus a Moor, at whose Entreaty he had plac'd here that Governour which rebelled. For the Emperor upbraiding him with the Disloyalty of whom he had commended, Victorinus undertaking to set all right again, hastes hither, and finding indeed the Governor to intend Sedition, by some Contrivance not mention'd in the Story, slew him, whose Name some imagine to be Cornelius Lelianus. They write also that Probus Cambd.
gave leave to the Spaniards, Gauls, and Britains to plant Vines, and to make Wine; and having subdu'd the Vandals, and Burgundians in a great Battel, sent over many of them hither to inhabit, where they did good Service to the Romans
when any Insurrection happen'd in the Isle. After whom Carus Emperor going against the Per- 282.
sians, left Carinus, one of his Sons, to govern Carin.
among other Western Provinces this Island with Imperial Authority; but him Dioclesian, saluted Emperor by the Eastern Armies, overcame and slew. About which time Carusius a Man of low

Franks and Saxons, what he took from the Pirates, neither restoring to the Owners, nor accounting to the Publick, but enriching himself, 285.
and yet not scowring the Seas, but conniving rather at those Sea Robbers, was grown at length too great a Delinquent to be less than an Emperor: For Fear and Guiltiness in those Days made Emperors offer than Merit: And understanding that Maximianus Hercules, Dioclesian's adopted Son, was come against him into Gallia, pass'd over with the Navy which he had made his own, into Britain, and possess'd the Island. 286.
Where he built a new Fleet after the Roman Fashion, got into his Power the Legion that was left here in Garrison, other Outlandish Cohorts detain'd, list'd the very Merchants and Factors of Gallia, and with the Allurement of Spoil invited great Numbers of other barbarous Nations to his Part, and train'd them to Sea-service, wherein the Romans at that time were grown so out of Skill, that Carausius with his Navy did at Sea what he list'd, robbing on every Coast; whereby Maximian, able to come no nearer than the Shoar of Boloigne, was forc'd to conclude a Peace with Carausius, and yield him Britain; Victor. Eu- as one fittest to guard the Province there against Inroads from the North. But not long after having assum'd Constantius Chlorus to the Dignity of Cesar, sent him against Carausius; who in the mean while had made himself strong both within the Land and without. Galsfrid of Mon- Buchanan.
mouth writes that he made the Picts his Confe-derates; to whom lately come out of Scythia he gave Albany to dwell in: And it is observ'd that before his time the Picts are not known to have been any where mention'd, and then first by Eumen- Paneg. 2.
ius a Rhetorician. He repair'd and fortifi'd the Wall of Severus with seven Castles, and a round House of smooth Stone on the Bank of Carron, which River, saith Ninnius, was of his Name so

A. D. 291. call'd; he built also a Triumphal Arch in Remembrance of some Victory there obtain'd. In France he held Gessoriacum, or Boloinne; and all the Franks which had by his Permission seated themselves in Belgia, were at his Devotion. But Constantinus hasting into Gallia, besieges Boloinne, and with Stones and Timber obstructing the Port, keeps out all Relief that could be sent in by Carausius. Who, e're Constantinus with the great Fleet which he had prepar'd, could arrive hither^a, was slain treacherously by Alektus, one of his Friends, who long'd to step into his Place; when he seven Years, and worthily, as some say, as others, tyrannically, had rul'd the Island. So much the more did Constantinus prosecute that Opportunity, before Alektus could well strengthen his Affairs: and though in ill Weather, putting to Sea with all Urgency from several Havens to spread the Terror of his landing, and the Doubt where to expect him, in a Mist passing the British Fleet unseen, that lay scouting near the Isle of Wight, no sooner got ashore, but fires his own Ships, to leave no hope of Refuge but in Victory. Alektus also, though now much dismay'd, transfers his Fortune to a Battel on the Shoar; but encountred by Afclepiodorus Captain of the Prætorian Bands, and desperately rushing on, unmindful both of ordering his Men, or bringing them all to fight, save the Accessories of his Treason, and his Outlandish Hirelings, is overthrown, and slain with little or no Loss to the Romans, but great Execution on the Franks. His Body was found almost naked in the Field, for his Purple Robe he had thrown aside, lest it should defcry him, unwilling to be found. The rest taking flight to London, and purposing with the Pillage of that City to escape by Sea, are met by another of the Roman Army, whom the Mist at Sea disjoining had by chance brought thither, and with a new Slaughter chas'd through all the Streets. The Britains, their Wives also and Children, with great Joy go out to meet Constantinus, as one whom they acknowledge their Deliverer from Bondage and Insolence. All this seems by Eumenius, who then liv'd, and was of Constantinus's Household, to have been done in the Course of one continu'd Action; so also thinks Sigonius a learned Writer: Though all other allow three Years to the Tyranny of Alektus^b. In these Days were great Store of Workmen, and excellent Builders in this Island, whom after the Alteration of things here, the Aduans in Burgundy entertain'd to build their Temples and publick Edifices. Dioclesian having hitherto successfully us'd his Valour against the Enemies of his Empire, uses now his Rage in a bloody Persecution against his obedient and harmless Christian Subjects: From the feeling whereof neither was this Island, though most remote, far enough remov'd. Among them here who suffer'd gloriously^c, Aron, and Julius of

Caer-leon upon Usk, but chiefly Alban of Verulam, were most renown'd: The Story of whose Martyrdom soil'd, and worse martyr'd with the fabling Zeal of some idle Fancies, more fond of Miracles, than apprehensive of Truth, deserves not longer Digression. Constantinus after Dioclesian, dividing the Empire with Galerius, had Britain among his other Provinces; where either preparing or returning with Victory from an Expedition against the Caledonians, he dy'd at Tork. His Son Constantine, who happily came Post from Rome to Boloinne just about the time, saith Eumenius, that his Father was setting sail his last time hither, and not long before his Death, was by him on his Death-bed nam'd, and after his Funeral, by the whole Army saluted Emperor^d. There goes a Fame, and that seconded by^e most of our own Historians, though not those the ancientest, that Constantine was born in this Island, his Mother Helena the Daughter of Coilus a British Prince, not sure the Father of King Lucius, whose Sister she must then be, for that would detect her too old by an Hundred Years to be the Mother of Constantine. But to salve this Incoherence, another Coilus is feign'd to be then Earl of Colchester. To this therefore the Roman Authors give no Testimony, except a Passage or two in the Panegyrics, about the Sense whereof much is argu'd: Others nearest to those times clear the Doubt, and write him certainly born of Helena, a mean Woman at Naissus in Dardania. Howbeit, e're his Departure hence he seems to have had some Bickerings in the North, which by reason of more urgent Affairs compos'd, he passes into Gallia; and after four Years returns either to settle or to alter the State of things here; until a new War against Maxentius call'd him back, leaving Vita Constantianus his Vicegerent^f. He deceasing, Constantine his eldest Son enjoy'd for his Part of the Empire, with all the Provinces that lay on this side the Alps, this Island also. But falling to Civil War with Constans his Brother, was by him slain; who with his third Brother Constantinus coming into Britain, seiz'd it as Victor. Against him rose Magnentius, one of his chief Commanders, by some affirm'd the Son of a British, he having gain'd on his side great Forces, contested with Constantinus in many Battels for the sole Empire; but vanquish'd, in the end slew himself. Somewhat before this time Gratianus Funarius, the Father of Valentinian, afterwards Emperor, had chief Command of those Armies which the Romans kept here. And the Arrian Doctrine which then divided Christendom, wrought also in this Island no small Disturbance: A Land, saith Gildas, greedy of every thing new, stedfast in nothing. At last Constantinus appointed a Synod of more than 400 Bishops to assemble at Ariminum on the Emperor's charges, which the rest all refusing, three only of the British^g, Poverty

^a Cambden in his Brit. Tit. Buckinghamshire, says Alektus kill'd him in Battel, and thinks Caversfield to be the Place where they fought. Caversfield stands on the Ouse, not far from Buckingham.

A. D. 353. constringing them, accepted; though the other Bishops among them offer'd to have born their Charges: Esteeming it more honourable to live on the Publick, than to be obnoxious to any private Purse. Doubtless an ingenious Mind, and far above the Presbyters of our Age; who like well to sit in Assembly on the publick Stipend, but like not the Poverty that caus'd these to do so. After this Martinus was Deputy of the Province; who being offended with the Cruelty which Paulus, an Inquisitor sent from Constantius, exercis'd in his enquiry after those Military Officers, who had conspir'd with Magnentius, was himself laid hold on as an accessory; at which enrag'd, he runs at Paulus with his drawn Sword; but failing to kill him, turns it on himself. Next to whom, as may be guess'd, Alipius was made Deputy. In the mean time Julian, whom Constantius had made Cæsar, having recover'd much Territory about Rhine, where the German inrodes before had long insulted, to relieve those Countries almost ruin'd, causes 800 Pinaces to be built; and with them by frequent Voyages, plenty of Corn to be fetch'd in from Britain; which even then was the usual bounty of this Soil to those parts, as oft as French and Saxon Pirates hinder'd not the transportation. While Constantius yet reign'd, the Scots and Picts breaking in upon the Northern Confines, Julian being at Paris sends over Lupicinus, a well try'd Soldier, but a proud and covetous Man; who with a Power of light-arm'd Herulians, Batarians, and Mæsians, in the midst of Winter sailing from Boloigne, arrives at Rutupia, seated on the opposite shoar, and comes to London, to consult there about the War; but soon after was recall'd by Julian, then chosen Emperor. Under whom we read not of ought happening here; only that Palladius, one of his great Officers, was hither banish'd. This Year, Valentinian being Emperor, the Attacots, Picts, and Scots roaving up and down; and last the Saxons, with perpetual Landings and Invasions, harry'd the South Coast of Britain; slew Nectarius, who govern'd the Sea Borders, and Bulcobandes with his Forces by an ambush. With which News Valentinian, not a little perplex'd, sends first Severus, High Steward of his House, and soon recalls him; then Jovinus, who intimating the necessity of greater Supplies, he sends at length Theodocius, a Man of try'd Valour and Experience, Father to the first Emperor of that Name. He with selected Numbers out of the Legions and Cohorts, crosses the Sea from Boloigne to Rutupia; from whence with the Batarians, Herulians,^a and other Legions that arriv'd soon after, he marches to London; and dividing his Forces into several Bodies, sets upon the dispers'd and plundering Enemy, laden with spoil; from whom recovering the Booty which they led away, and were forc'd to leave there with their Lives, he restores all to the right Owners, save a small portion to his wearied Soldiers, and enters London victoriously; which, before in many straights and difficulties, was now reviv'd as with a great deliverance. The numerous Enemy, with whom he had to deal, was of different Nations, and the War scatter'd: Which Theodocius, getting daily some intelligence from Fugitives and Prisoners, resolves to carry on by sudden Parties and Surprisals, rather than set Battels; nor omits he to proclaim Indemnity to such as would lay down Arms, and accept of Peace, which brought in many. Yet all this not ending the work, he requires that Civilis, a Man of much uprightness, might be sent him, to be as Deputy of the Island, and Dulcitius a famous Captain. Thus was Theodocius busy'd, besetting with Ambushes the roving Enemy, repressing his Roads, restoring Cities and Castles to their former safety and defence, laying every where the firm foundation of a long Peace, when Valentius^c a Pannonian for some great offence banish'd into Britain, conspiring with certain Exiles and Soldiers against Theodocius, whose Worth he dreaded as the only obstacle to his greater design of gaining the Isle into his power, is discover'd, and with his chief accomplices deliver'd over to condign Punishment: Against the rest, Theodocius with a wise lenity suffer'd not inquisition to proceed too rigorously, lest the fear thereof appertaining to so many, occasion might arise of new trouble in a time so unsettled. This done, he applies himself to reform things out of order, raises on the Confines many strong Holds; and in them appoints due and diligent Watches; and so reduc'd all things out of danger, that the Province, which but lately was under command of the Enemy, became now wholly Roman, new nam'd Valentia of Valentinian, and the City of London, Augusta. Thus Theodocius nobly acquitting himself in all Affairs, with general applause of the whole Province, accompanied to the Sea-side, returns to Valentinian. Who about five Years after sent hither Fraomarius, a King of the Almans, with authority of a Tribune over his own Country Forces, which then both for number and good service were in high esteem. Against Gratian, who succeeded in the Western Empire, Maximus a Spaniard, and one who had serv'd in the British Wars with younger Theodocius (for he also, either with his Father, or not long after him, seems to have done something in this Island) and now General of the Roman Armies here, either discontented that Theodocius was preferr'd before him to the Empire, or constrain'd by the Soldiers who hated Gratian, assumes the Imperial Purple, and having attain'd Victory against the Scots and Picts, with the Flower and Strength of Britain, passes into France; there slays Gratian, and without much difficulty, the space of five Years, obtains his part of the Empire, overthrown at length and slain by Theodocius. With whom perishing most of his followers, or not returning out of Armorica,^e which Maximus had given them to possess, the South of Britain by this means exhausted of her Youth, and what there was of Roman Soldiers on the Confines drawn off, became a prey to savage Invasions;

^a This Paulus was burnt alive afterwads by order of Julian the Apostate. Mr. Milton places Paul the Notary's coming into England five Years after the time.

^f Geoffrey relates, that Maximus bestow'd Armorica, the Province of Bretagne in France, on Conan a Britain, Lord of Denbysire, whom he made Duke of it; as also that Dionotus, Duke of Cornwall, sent his own Daughter Ursula 11000 Noble Virgins, and 60000 others to Duke Conan, for Wives for himself and his Britains; of whom part perish'd in a Storm, the rest by the Kings of the Huns and the Picts, who either kill'd them, or made them Slaves. These Virgins are esteem'd Martyrs in the Roman Legends; and Card. Baronius, from no better Authority than Geoffrey of Monmouth, reports the same Story, as if it had been Matter of Fact, though it carries so many Improbabilities with it.

A. D. of Scots from the Iris Seas, of Saxons from the German, of Picts from the North. Against them, first Chrysanthus the Son of Marcian a Novatian Bishop, made Deputy of Britain by Theodosius, demean'd himself worthily: Then Stilicho, a Man of great Power, whom Theodosius dying left Protector of his Son Honorius, either came in Person, or sending over sufficient aid, repress'd them, and as it seems new fortify'd the Wall against them. But that Legion being call'd away, when the Roman Armies from all parts hasten to relieve Honorius, then besieg'd in Alea of Piemont, by Alaric the Goth, Britain was left expos'd as before to those barbarous Robbers. Left any wonder how the Scots came to infect Britain from the Iris Sea, it must be understood, that the Scots not many Years before had been driven all out of Britain by Maximus; and their King Eugenius slain in fight, as their own Annals report: Whereby, it seems, wandering up and down, without certain feat, they liv'd by scumming those Seas and Shoars as Pirates. But more Authentick Writers confirm us, that the Scots, whoever they be originally, came first into Ireland, and dwelt there, and nam'd it Scotia, long before the North of Britain took that Name. About this time, though troublesome, Pelagius a Britain found the leisure to bring new and dangerous Opinions into the Church, and is largely writ against by St. Austin. But the Roman Powers which were call'd into Italy, when once the fear of Alaric was over, made return into several Provinces: And perhaps Victorinus of Tolosa, whom Rutilius the Poet much commends, might be then Prefect of the Island; if it were not he whom Stilicho sent hither^b. Buchanan writes, that endeavouring to reduce the Picts into a Province, he gave the occasion of their calling back Fergusius and the Scots, whom Maximus with their help had quite driven out of the Island: And indeed the Verses of that Poet speak him to have been active in those parts. But the time which is assign'd him later Buchanan after Gratianus Municeps, by Cambden after Constantine the Tyrant, accords not with that which follows in the plain course of History. For the Vandals having broke in and wasted all Belgia, even to those places from whence easiest passage is into Britain, the Roman Forces here, doubting to be suddenly invaded, were all in uproar, and in tumultuous manner set up Marcus, who it may seem was then Deputy. But him not found agreeable to their heady courses, they as hastily kill: For the giddy favour of a mutining rout is as dangerous as their fury. The like they do by Gratian a British Roman, in four Months advanc'd, ador'd, and destroy'd. There was among them a common Soldier, whose name was Constantine, with him on a sudden so taken they are, upon the conceit put in them of a Luckiness in his Name, as without other visible merit to create him Emperor^c. It fortun'd that the Man had not his Name for nought; so well he knew to lay hold, and make good use of an unexpected offer. He therefore with a waken'd Spirit, to the extent of his Fortune dilating his Mind, which in his mean condition before lay contracted and shrunk up, orders with good advice his Military Affairs: And with the whole Force of the Province, and what of British was able to bear Arms, he passes into France, aspiring at least to an equal share with Honorius in the Empire. Where by the valour of Edobecus a Franck, and Gerontius a Britain, and partly by persuasion gaining all in his way, he comes to Arles. With like felicity by his Son Constans, whom of a Monk he had made a Cesar, and by the conduct of Gerontius he reduces all Spain to his obedience. But Constans after this displacing Gerontius, the Affairs of Constantine soon went to wrack: For he by this means alienated, set up Maximus one of his Friends against him in Spain; and passing into France took Vienna by assault, and having slain Constans in that City, calls on the Vandals against Constantine; who by him incited, as by him before they had been repress'd, breaking forward, over-run most part of France. But when Constantine comes, the Emperor's General, with a strong Power came out of Italy, Gerontius deserted by his own Forces, retires into Spain; where also growing into contempt with the Soldiers, after his flight out of France, by whom his House in the night was beset, having first with a few of his Servants defended himself valiantly, and slain above 300, though when his Darts and other Weapons were spent, he might have escap'd at a private door, as all his Servants did, not enduring to leave his Wife Nonnicbia, whom he lov'd, to the violence of an enraged Crew, he first cuts off the Head of his Friend Alanus, as were agreed; next his Wife, though loth and delaying, yet by her entreated and importun'd, refusing to out-live her Husband, he dispatches: For which her Resolution, Sozomenus an Ecclesiastick Writer gives her high praise, both as a Wife and as a Christian. Last of all, against himself he turns his Sword; but missing the mortal place, with his Ponyard finishes the work. Thus far is pursu'd the Story of a famous Britain, related negligently by our other Historians. As for Constantine, his ending was not answerable to his setting out: For he with his other Son Julian besieg'd by Constantine in Arles, and mistrusting the change of his wonted success, to save his Head, poorly turns Priest; but that not availing him, is carry'd into Italy, and there put to death; having four Years acted the Emperor. While these things were doing, the Britains at home destitute of Roman aid, and the chief strength of their own Youth, that went first with Maximus, then with Constantine, not returning home, vex'd and harass'd by their wonted Enemies, had sent Messages to Honorius; but he at that time not being able to defend Rome it self, which the same Year was taken by Alaric, advises them by his Letter to consult how best they

^a Cambden calls the Roman General Victorinus, Broetius and Buchanan say his Name was Maximinian.

^b Claudius in his Panegyrick on Stilicho's first Consulship introduces Britannia speaking thus in his praise:

Prospicerem dulcis Venientem Saxona Ventis:
The Scots and Picts alike now dreadless are;
No longer on the Coasts I quivering stand,
Nor fear a Fleet of Saxons on the Strand.*

^c Stilicho's Succours were sent in his first Consulship, Anno 395. and the Vandals did not break into the Empire till the Year 407. when Marcus was proclaim'd Emperor in Britain. Which very well agrees with the plain Course of History. Dr. Howell's Vol. II.

They therefore thus relinquish'd, and by all Right the Government relapsing into their own hands, thenceforth betook themselves to live after their own Laws, defending their Bounds as well as they were able, and the Armoricans, who not long after were call'd the Britains of France, follow'd their Example. Thus expir'd this great Empire of the Romans; first in Britain, soon after in Italy it self: Having born chief Sway in this Island, though never throughly subdu'd, or all at once in Subjection, if we reckon from the coming in of Julius to the taking of Rome by Alaric, in which Year Honorius wrote those Letters of Discharge into Britain, the space of 462 Years*. And with the Empire fell also what before in this Western World was chiefly Roman; Learning, Valour, Eloquence, History, Civility, and even Language it self, all these together, as it were, with equal pace diminishing, and decaying. Henceforth we are to steer by another fort of Authors; near enough to the things they write, as in their own Country, if that would serve; in time not much belated, some of equal Age; in Expression barbarous; and to say how judicious, I suspend a while: This we must expect; in civil Matters to find them dubious Relaters, and still to the best Advantage of what they term Holy Church, meaning indeed themselves: In most other Matters of Religion, blind, astonish'd, and struck with Superstition, as with a Planet; in one word, Monks. Yet these Guides, where can be had no better, must be follow'd; in gross it may be true enough; in Circumstance each Man as his Judgment gives him, may reserve his Faith, or bestow it. But so different a State of things requires a several Relation.

* Julius Caesar landed in Britain 53 Years before our Saviour's Birth, and in the Year 437. according to Mr. Speed, the Romans hid their Treasures in Britain, and despair'd of being able to defend it against the Scots and Picts. By this Calculation, their Dominion over the Britains lasted 490 Years; and we read in the same Mr. Speed's Chronicle, that the Britains ten Years afterwards wrote to Aetius in his third Consulate to assist them. Cambden in his Britannia, Tit. The Romans in Britain, says the Roman Empire expir'd here 475 Years after Caesar's first Invasion. For Attila, the Hun, was so terrible at that time to the Romans, that they could not spare any of their Forces to succour the Britains.

THE History of ENGLAND,

Continu'd to the NORMAN CONQUEST.

By Mr. JOHN MILTON. Book III.

A. D. 416. THis Third Book having to tell of Accidents as various and exemplary, as the Intermillion or Change of Government hath any where brought forth, may deserve Attention more than common, and repay it with like Benefit to them who can judiciously read: Considering especially that the late Civil Broils had cast us into a Condition not much unlike to what the Britains then were in, when the Imperial Jurisdiction departing hence, left them to the sway of their own Councils; which Times by comparing seriously with these later, and that confused Anarchy with this interregn, we may be able from two such remarkable Turns of State, producing like Events among us, to raise a Knowledge of our selves both great and weighty, by judging hence what kind of Men the Britains generally are in Matters of so high Enterprize, how by Nature, Industry, or Custom fitted to attempt or undergo Matters of so main Consequence: For if it be a high Point of Wisdom in every private Man, much more is it in a Nation to know it self; rather than puffed up with vulgar Flatteries, and Encomiums, for want self-knowledge, to enterprise rashly, and come off miserably in great Undertakings. The Britains, thus as we heard, being left without Protection from the Empire, and the Land in a manner emptied of all her Youth, consumed in Wars abroad, or not caring to return Home, themselves through long Subjection, servile in Mind, slothful of Body, and with the Use of Arms unacquainted, sustain'd but ill for many Years the Violence of those barbarous Invaders, who now daily grew upon them. For although at first greedy of Change, and to be thought the leading Nation to Freedom from the Empire, they seem'd a while to bestir them with a Shew of Diligence in their new Affairs, some secretly aspiring to Rule, others adoring the Name of Liberty, yet so soon as they felt by Proof the Weight of what it was to govern well themselves, and what was wanting within them, not Stomach or the Love of Licence, but the Wisdom, the Virtue, the Labour, to use and maintain true Liberty, they soon remitted their Heat, and shrunk more wretchedly under the Burden of their own Liberty, than before under a Foreign Yoke. Infomuch that the residue of those Romans which had planted themselves here, despairing of their ill Deportment at Home, and weak Resistance in the Field, by those few who had the Courage, or the Strength to bear Arms, nine Years after the sacking of Rome remov'd out of Britain into France, hiding for haste great part of their Treasure, which was never after found. And now again the Britains, no longer able to support themselves against the prevailing Enemy, solicit Honorius to their Aid, with mournful Letters, Embassages and Vows of perpetual Subjection to Rome, if the Northern Foe were but repuls'd. He at their request spares them

D. 422. them one Legion, which with great Slaughter of the Scots and Picts drove them beyond the Borders, rescu'd the Britains, and advis'd them to build a Wall cross the Island, between Sea and Sea, from the Place where Edenburgh now stands to the Frith of Dunbritton, by the City Alcluth. But the Material being only Turf, and by the rude Multitude unartificially built up without better Direction, avail'd them little. For no sooner was the Legion departed, but the greedy Spoilers returning, land in great Numbers from their Boats and Pinaces, wasting, slaying, and treading down all before them. Then are Messengers again posted to Rome in lamentable sort, beseeching that they would not suffer a whole Province to be destroy'd, and the Roman Name, so honourable yet among them, to become the Subject of Barbarian Scorn and Insolence. The Emperor, at their sad Complaint, with what speed was possible sends to their Succour. Who coming suddenly on those ravenous Multitudes that minded only Spoil, surprize them with a terrible Slaughter. They who escap'd, fled back to those Seas, from whence yearly they were wont to arrive, and return laden with Booties. But the Romans, who came not now to rule, but charitably to aid, declaring that it stood not longer with the Ease of their Affairs to make such laborious Voyages in pursuit of so base and vagabond Robbers, of whom neither Glory was to be got, nor gain, exhorted them to manage their own Warfare; and to defend like Men their Country, their Wives, their Children, and what was to be dearer than Life, their Liberty, against an Enemy not stronger than themselves, if their own Sloth and Cowardice had not made them so; if they would but only find hands to grasp defensive Arms, rather than basely stretch them out to receive Bonds. They gave them also their Help to build a new Wall, not of Earth as the former, but of Stone (both at the publick Cost, and by particular Contributions) traversing the Isle in direct Line from East to West, between certain Cities placed there as Frontiers to bear off the Enemy, where Severus had wall'd once before. They rais'd it twelve Foot high, eight broad. Along the South Shoar^a, because from thence also like Hostility was fear'd, they place Towers by the Sea-side at certain Distances, for Safety of the Coast. Withal, they instruct them in the Art of War, leaving Patterns of their Arms and Weapons behind them; and with animating words, and many Lessons of Valour to a faint-hearted Audience, bid them finally farewell, without purpose to return. And these two friendly Expeditions, the last of any hither by the Romans, were perform'd, as may be gather'd out of Beda, and Diaconus, the two last Years of Honorius. Their Leader, as some modernly write, was Gallio of Ravenna; Buchanan, who departs not much from the Fables of his Predecessor Boethius, names him Maximianus, and brings against him to this Battel Fergus first King of Scots after their second suppos'd coming into Scotland, Durstus King of Picts, both there slain, and Dioneth an imaginary King of Britain, or Duke of Cornwall, who improbably sided with them against his own Country, hardly escaping. With no less Exactness of particular Circumstances, he takes upon him to relate all those tumultuary Inrodes of the Scots and Picts into Britain, as if they had but Yesterday happen'd, their Order of Battel, manner of Fight, Number of

Slain, Articles of Peace, things whereof Gildas and Beda are utterly silent, Authors to whom the Scotch Writers have none to cite comparable in Antiquity; no more therefore to be believ'd for bare Assertions, however quaintly drest, than our Geoffrey of Monmouth when he varies most from Authentick Story. But either the inbred Vanity of some, in that respect unworthily call'd Historians, or the fond Zeal of praising their Nations above Truth hath so far transported them, that where they find nothing faithfully to relate, they fall confidently to invent what they think may either best set off their History, or magnifie their Country. The Scots and Picts in Manners differing somewhat from each other, but still unanimous to rob and spoil, hearing that the Romans intended not to return, from the Gorroghs, or Leathern Frigats pour out themselves in Swarms upon the Land, more confident than ever: And from the North end of the Isle to the very Wall side, then first took Possession as Inhabitants; while the Britains with idle Weapons in their hands stand trembling on the Battlements, till the half-naked Barbarians with their long and formidable Iron Hooks pull them down headlong. The rest not only quitting the Wall but Towns and Cities, leave them to the bloody Pursuer, who follows killing, wasting, and destroying all in his way. From these Confusions arose a Famine, and from thence Discord and Civil Commotion among the Britains: Each Man living by what he robb'd or took violently from his Neighbour. When all Stores were consumed and spent where Men inhabited, they betook them to the Woods, and liv'd by hunting, which was their only Sustainment. To the Heaps of these Evils from without, were added new Divisions within the Church. For Agricola the Son of Severianus, a Pelagian Bishop, had spread his Doctrine wide among the Britains not uninfected before. The founder part neither willing to embrace his Opinion to the overthrow of Divine Grace, not able to refute him, crave Assistance from the Churches of France: Who send them Germanus Bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus of Troyes. They by continual preaching in Churches, in Streets, in Fields, and not without Miracles, as is written, confirm'd some, regain'd others, and at Verulam in a publick Disputation put to silence their Chief Adversaries. This Reformation in the Church was believ'd to be the Cause of their Success a while after in the Field. For the Saxons and Picts with joynt Force, which was no new thing before the Saxons at least had any dwelling in this Island, during this abode of Germanus here, had made a strong Impression from the North. The Britains marching out against them, and mistrusting their own Power, send to Germanus and his Colleague, reposing more in the spiritual Strength of those two Men, than in their own Thousands arm'd. They came, and their Presence in the Camp was not less than if a whole Army had come to second them. It was then the time of Lent, and the People instructed by the daily Sermons of these two Pastors, came flocking to receive Baptism. There was a Place in the Camp set apart as a Church, and trick'd up with Boughs upon Easter-Day. The Enemy understanding this, and that the Britains were taken up with Religion more than with Feats of Arms, advances, after the Paschal Feast, as to a certain Victory. Germanus, who also had Intelligence of their Approach, undertakes to be Captain that Day; and riding out with selected

A. D. 430. Troops to discover what Advantages the Place might offer, lights on a Valley compass'd about with Hills, by which the Enemy was to pass. And placing there his Ambush, warns them that what Word they heard him pronounce aloud, the same they should repeat with universal Shout. The Enemy passes on securely, and German thrice aloud cries Halleluia; which answered by the Soldiers with a sudden burst of clamour, is from the Hills and Valleys redoubled. The Saxons and Picts on a sudden supposing it the noise of a huge Host, throw themselves into flight, casting down their Arms, and great numbers of them are drown'd in the River which they had newly pass'd. This Victory, thus won without hands, left to the Britains plenty of Spoil, and to the Person and the Preaching of Germanus greater Authority and Reverence than before. And the exploit might pass for current, if Constantius, the Writer of his Life in the next Age, had resolv'd us how the British Army came to want baptizing; for of any Paganism at that time, or long before in the Land, we read not, or that Pelagianism was re-baptiz'd. The place of this Victory, as is reported, was in Flintshire, by a Town call'd Guid-cruck, and the River Allen, where a Field retains the name of Maes German to this day. But so soon as Germanus was return'd home, the Scots and Picts, though now so many of them Christians, that Palladius a Deacon was ordain'd and sent by Celestine the Pope to be a Bishop over them, were not so well reclaim'd, or not so many of them as to cease from doing mischief to their Neighbours, where they found no impeachment to fall in yearly as they were wont. They therefore of the Britains, who perhaps were not yet wholly ruin'd, in the strongest and South-west parts of the Isle, send Letters to Aëtius, then third time Consul of Rome, with this superscription; To Aëtius thrice Consul, the Groans of the Britains. And after a few words thus, The Barbarians drive us to the Sea, the Sea drives us back to the Barbarians; thus bandied up and down between two deaths we perish, either by the Sword or by the Sea. But the Empire at that time overspread with Huns and Vandals, was not in condition to lend them aid. Thus rejected and wearied out with continual flying from place to place, but more afflicted with Famine, which then grew outrageous among them, many for hunger yielded to the Enemy, others either more resolute, or less expos'd to wants, keeping within Woods and Mountainous places, not only defended themselves, but falling out at length gave a stop to the insulting Foe with many seasonable defeats; led by some eminent Person, as may be thought, who exhorted them not to trust in their own strength, but in Divine Assistance. And perhaps no other here is meant than the foresaid deliverance by Germanus, if computation would permit, which Gildas either not much regarded, or might mistake; but that he tarried so long here, the Writers of his Life assent not. Finding therefore such opposition, the Scots or Irish Robbers, for so they are indifferently term'd, without delay get them home. The Picts, as before was mention'd, then first began to settle in the utmost parts of the Island, using now and then to make inroads upon the Britains. But they in the mean while thus rid of their Enemies, begin afresh to till the Ground; which after cessation yields her fruit in such abundance, as had not formerly been known for many Ages. But Wantonness and Luxury, the wonted companions of A. D. Plenty, grow up as fast; and with them, if Gildas deserve belief, all other Vices incident to Humane Corruption. That which he notes especially to be the chief perverting of all good in the Land, and so continued in his days, was the hatred of Truth, and all such as durst appear to vindicate and maintain it. Against them, as against the only disturbers, all the Malice of the Land was bent. Lyes and Falsties, and such as could best invent them, were only in request. Evil was embrac'd for Good, Wickedness honour'd and esteem'd as Virtue. And this Quality their Valour had against a foreign Enemy to be ever backward and heartless; to Civil Broils eager and prompt. In matters of Government, and the search of Truth, weak and shallow; in Falshood and wicked Deeds pregnant and industrious. Pleasing to God, or not pleasing, with them weigh'd alike; and the worse, most an end, was the weightier. All things were done contrary to publick Welfare and Safety; nor only by secular Men, for the Clergy also, whose Example should have guided others, were as vicious and corrupt. Many of them besotted with continual Drunkenness; or swell'd with Pride and Wilfulness, full of Contention, full of Envy, indiscreet, incompetent Judges to determine what in the practice of Life is good or evil, what lawful or unlawful. Thus furnish'd with Judgment, and for Manners thus qualify'd both Priest and Lay, they agree to choose them several Kings of their own, as near as might be, likest themselves; and the words of my Author import as much. Kings were anointed, saith he, not of God's Anointing, but such as were cruellest, and soon after as inconsiderately, without examining the Truth, put to Death by their Anointers, to set up others more fierce and proud. As for the Election of their Kings (and that they had not all one Monarch, appears both in Ages past and by the sequel) it began, as nigh as may be guess'd, either this Year or the following, when they saw the Romans had quite deserted their Claim. About which time also Pelagianism again prevailing by means of some few, the British Clergy too weak it seems at dispute, intreat the second time, Germanus to their assistance. Who coming with Severus a Disciple of Lupus that was his former associate, stands not now to argue, for the People generally continu'd right; but enquiring those Authors of new disturbance, adjudges them to Banishment. They therefore by consent of all were deliver'd to Germanus, who carrying them over with him, dispos'd of them in such place, where neither they could infect others, and were themselves under cure of better instruction. But Germanus the same Year dy'd in Italy; and the Britains not long after found themselves again in much perplexity, with no slight rumour that their old troublers the Scots and Picts had prepar'd a strong Invasion, purposing to kill all, and dwell themselves in the Land from end to end. But ere their coming in, as if the instruments of Divine Justice had been at strife, which of them first should destroy a wicked Nation, the Pestilence forestalling the Sword, left scarce alive whom to bury the dead; and for that time, as one Extremity keeps off another, preserv'd the Land from a worse incumbrance of those barbarous Disposseffors, whom the Contagion gave not leave now to enter far. And yet the Britains nothing better'd by these heavy Judgments, the one threaten'd, the other

A. D. 448. felt, instead of acknowledging the Hand of Heaven, run to the Palace of their King Vortigern^a with Complaints and Cries of what they suddenly fear'd from the Pictish Invasion. Vortigern, who at that time was chief rather than sole King, unless the rest had perhaps left their Dominions to the common Enemy, is said by him of Monmouth to have procur'd the Death first of Constantine, then of Constantine his Son, who of a Monk was made King, and by that means to have usurp'd the Crown. But they who can remember how Constantine with his Son Constantine the Monk, the one made Emperor, the other Cæsar, perish'd in France, may discern the simple fraud of this Fable. But Vortigern however coming to reign, is decipher'd by truer Stories a proud unfortunate Tyrant, and yet of the People much belov'd, because his Vices sort'd so well with theirs. For neither was he skill'd in War, nor wise in Council, but covetous, lustful, luxurious, and prone to all Vice; wasting the publick Treasure in Gluttony and Riot, careless of the common Danger, and through a haughty Ignorance, unapprehensive of his own. Nevertheless importun'd and awak'd at length, by unusual clamours of the People, he summons a General Council, to provide some better means than heretofore had been us'd against these continual Annoyances from the North. Wherein by advice of all it was determin'd, that the Saxons be invited into Britain against the Scots and Picts; whose breaking in they either shortly expected, or already found they had not strength enough to oppose. The Saxons were a barbarous and heathen Nation, famous for nothing else but Robberies and Cruelties done to all their Neighbours both by Sea and Land; in particular to this Island, witness that military Force which the Roman Emperors maintain'd here purposely against them, under a special Commander, whose Title, as is found on good record, was Count of the Saxon-shoar in Britain; and the many Mischiefes done by their landing here, both alone and with the Picts, as above hath been related, witness as much. They were a People thought by good Writers to be descended of the Sacæ, a kind of Scythian in the North of Asia, thence call'd Sacæ, or Sons of Sacæ, who with a Flood of other Northern Nations came into Europe, toward the declining of the Roman Empire; and using Piracy from Denmark all along these Seas, possess'd at length by intrusion all that Coast of Germany and the Netherlands, which took thence the name of Old Saxony, lying between the Rhine and Elbe, and from thence North as far as Fidora, the River bounding Holfatia, tho' not so firmly or so largely, but that their multitude wander'd yet uncertain of habitation. Such Guests as these the Britains resolve now to send for, and entreat into their Houses and Possessions, at whose very Name heretofore they trembled afar off. So much do Men through impatience count ever that the heaviest which they bear at present, and to remove the evil which they suffer, care not to pull on a greater; as if variety and change in Evil also were acceptable. Or whether it be that Men in the despair of better, imagine fondly a kind of Refuge from one Misery to another. The Britains therefore, with Vortigern, who was then accounted King over them all, resolve in full Council to send Ambassadors to their choicest Men with great Gifts, and faith a Saxon Writer in these words, desiring their aid: *Worthy Saxons, bearing the Fame of your Promises, the distressed Britains wearied out, and overpress'd by a continual invading Enemy, have sent us to beseech your aid. They have a Land fertile and spacious, which to your Commands they bid us surrender. Heretofore we have liv'd with freedom under the obedience and protection of the Roman Empire. Next to them we know none worthier than your selves; and therefore become Suppliants to your Valour. Leave us not below our present Enemies, and to ought by you impos'd, willingly we shall submit. Yet Ethelward writes not that they promis'd Subjection, but only Amity and League. They therefore who had chief rule among them, hearing themselves entreated by the Britains to that which gladly they would have wish'd to obtain of them by entreating, to the British Embassy return this answer: Be assur'd henceforth of the Saxons, as of faithful Friends to the Britains, no less ready to stand by them in their Need, than in their best of Fortune. The Ambassadors return joyful, and with News as welcome to their Country, whose sinister Fate had now blinded them for destruction. The Saxons, consulting first their Gods, Gildas. (for they had answer, that the Land whereto they went, they should hold 300 Years, half that time conquering, and half quietly possessing) furnish out three long Gallies, or Kyules, with a chosen Company of Warlike Youth, under the Conduct of two Brothers, Hengist and Horsa, descended in the fourth degree from Woden; of whom, deify'd for the fame of his Acts, most Kings of those Nations derive their Pedigree. These, and either mix'd with these, or soon after by themselves, two other Tribes, or neighbouring People, Jutes and Angles, the one from Futland, the other from Anglen by the City of Sleswich, both Provinces of Denmark, arrive in the first Year of Martian the Greek Emperor, from the Birth of Christ 450, receiv'd with much good will of the People first, then of the King, who after some assurances given and taken, bestows on them the Isle of Tanet, where they first landed, hoping they might be made hereby more eager against the Picts, when they fought as for their own Country, and more loyal to the Britains, from whom they had receiv'd a place to dwell in, which before they wanted. The British Nennius writes, that these Brethren were driven into* ^a Vortigern was chosen King in the Year 447.

^b The Bishop of Worcester will not agree with this Opinion, because no Rational Account can be given how the Sacæ left their own Country to people Saxony. Orig. Britann. p. 306. See also Cambden, English Edit. p. 124, and Sheringham, De Anglorum Gentis Origine: Cambden derives them from the Saci, a People of Scythia, Sarmatia or Asiatica; Sheringham does the same. Bishop Stillingfleet thinks they took their Name from their Seaxes, or short Swords. Julius Scaliger observes, that Fader, Moder, Broder, &c. are us'd in the same sense in the Persian Language as in the Saxon. And Busbequius in his Epistles writes, that the Inhabitants of the Tawrick Chersonese have these words, Wind, Silver, Corn, Salt, Fish, Son, Apple; and forty others in the same signification as they are now in with us. From whence Mr. Cambden in his Remains, p. 22. argues, that our Saxon Progenitors planted their Colonies in the East as well as the West.

^c I know not how Liberal the Britains might be in this Distress; but if they made such a frank Surrender, 'tis strange why the Saxons (designing to make themselves Masters of the Kingdom) should insult upon the poor pretence of short Diet and bad Pay; and not rather urge the express promise of the Saxon-Ambassadors.

^e See Cambden's Britannia, Engl. p. 125. The Jutes so call'd from the Gutes, Getes or Goths, Inhabiting the Cimbrica Chersonesus, which the Danes to this day call Futland. The Angles, says Beda, lib. 1. cap. 15. came out of the Country call'd Angulus, which is said to lie between the Jutes and the Saxons. Holfstein was the ancient Seat of the Saxons, and in the Country between Holfstein and Futland there is now a small Province call'd Angel, under the Jurisdiction of the City of Flensberg.

A. D. 450. Malm. exile out of Germany, and to Vortigern who reign'd in much fear, one while of the Picts, then of the Romans, and Ambrosius came opportunely into the Haven. For it was the custom in old Saxony, when their numerous Offspring overflow'd the narrowness of their bounds, to send them out by lot into new Dwellings, where-ever they found room, either vacant or to be forc'd. But whether sought, or unsought, they dwelt not here long without Employment. For the Scots and Picts were now come down, some say, as far Stamford in Lincolnshire^a, whom, perhaps not imagining to meet new Opposition, the Saxons, though not till after a sharp Encounter, put to flight; and that more than once: Slaying in Fight, as some Scotch Writers affirm, their King Eugenius the Son of Fergus, Hengist perceiving the Island to be rich and fruitful, but her Princes and other Inhabitants given to vicious Ease, sends word home, inviting others to a Share of his good Success. Who returning with seventeen Ships, were grown up now to a sufficient Army, and entertain'd without Suspicion on these Terms, that they should bear the brunt of War against the Picts, receiving Stipend and some Place to inhabit. With these was brought over the Daughter of Hengist, a Virgin wondrous fair, as is reported, Rowena the British call her: She by Commandment of her Father, who had invited the King to a Banquet, coming in Presence with a Bowl of Wine to welcome him, and to attend on his Cup till the Feast ended, won so much upon his Fancy, though already wiv'd, as to demand her in Marriage upon any Conditions. Hengist at first, though it fell out perhaps according to the drift, held off, excusing his Meanness; then obscurely intimating a Desire and almost a Necessity, by reason of his augmented Numbers, to have his narrow Bounds of Tanet enlarg'd to the Circuit of Kent^b, had it frait by Donation: Though Guoragonus till then was King of that Place: And so, as it were overcome by the great Munificence of Vortigern, gave his Daughter. And still encroaching on the King's Favour, got farther leave to call over Ossa and Ebissa, his own and his Brother's Son; pretending that they, if the North were given them, would sit there as a continual Defence against the Scots, while himself guarded the East. They therefore sailing with forty Ships even to the Orcades, and every way curbing the Scots and Picts, possess'd that part of the Isle which is now Northumberland. Notwithstanding this they complain, that their Monthly Pay was grown much into Arrear; which when the Britains found means to satisfy, though alledging withal, that they to whom Promise was made of Wages, were nothing so many in number, quieted with this a while, but still seeking Occasion to fall off, they find fault next, that their Pay is too small for the Danger they undergo, threatening open War unless it be augmented. Guortimer, the King's Son, perceiving his Father and the Kingdom thus betray'd, from that time bends his utmost Endeavour to drive them out. They on the other side making League with the Picts and Scots, and issuing out of Kent, waisted without Resistence almost the whole Land even to the Western Sea, with such a horrid Devastation, that Towns and Colonies overturn'd, Priests and People slain, Temples and Palaces, what with Fire and Sword, lay altogether heap'd in one mixt Ruin. Of all which Multitude, so great was the Sinfulness that brought this upon them, Gildas adds that few or none were likely to be other than lew'd and wicked Persons. The residue of these, part overtaken in the Mountains, were slain; others subdu'd with Hunger prefer'd Slavery before instant Death; some getting to Rocks, Hills and Woods inaccessible, prefer'd the Fear and Danger of any Death before the Shame of a secure Slavery; many fled over Sea into other Countries; some into Holland, where yet remain the Ruines of Brittenburgh, Primord. an old Castle on the Sea, to be seen at low Water not far from Leiden; either built, as Writers of their own affirm, or seiz'd on by those Britains in their Escape from Hengist: Others into Armerica, peopl'd, as some think, with Britains long before; either by Gift of Constantine, the Great, or else of Maximus to those British Forces which had serv'd them in Foreign Wars; to whom those also that miscarried not with the latter Constantine at Arles: And lastly, these Exiles driven out by Saxons, fled for Refuge. But the ancient Chronicles of those Provinces attest their coming thither to be then first when they fled the Saxons, and indeed the Name of Britain in France is not read till after that time^c. Yet how a sort of Fugitives, who had quitted without Stroke their own Country, should so soon win another, appears not; unless joyn'd to some part of their own settl'd there before. Vortigern nothing better'd by these Calamities, grew at last so obdurate as to commit Incest with his Daughter, tempted or tempting him out of an Ambition to the Crown. For which being censur'd and condemn'd in a great Synod of Clerks and Laicks, and partly for fear of the Saxons, according to the Counsel of his Peers he retir'd into Wales, and built him there a strong Castle in Radnorshire, by the Advice of Ambrosius a young Prophet, whom others call Merlin. Nevertheless Faustus, who was the Son thus incestuously begotten, under the Instructions of German, or some of his Disciples, for German was dead before, prov'd a Religious Man, and liv'd in Devotion by the River Remnis in Glamorganshire. But the Saxons, though finding it so easie to subdue the Isle, with most of their Forces, uncertain for what Cause, return'd home: When as the Easiness of their Conquest might seem rather likely to have call'd in more. Which makes more probable that which the British write of Guortimer. For he coming to Reign, instead of his Father depos'd for Incest, is said to have thrice driv'n and besieg'd the Saxons in the Isle of Taneth; and when they issu'd out with powerful Supplies sent from Saxony, to have fought with them four other Battels, whereof three are nam'd; the first on the River Darwent, the second at Episford, wherein Horsa the Brother of Hengist fell, and on the British part Catigern;

^a Hengist, in this County, vanquish'd the Scots and Picts, and obtain'd of Vortigern as much Land as he cou'd encompass with an Ox's Hide cut into very small thongs; from which Treaty, the Town of Thongastet in Lincolnshire was so call'd.

^b This, we know, is the common Story: But the Saxon Annals, as they say nothing of Rowena, so they seem to intimate that Hengist got it by Force of Arms; telling us, that he worsted the Britains in two pitch'd Battels; and that, upon this, they quitted Kent, and betook themselves to London.

^c Mr. Milton calls the Name of this King of Kent, Guoragonus: Whereas Cambden in his Brit. says, The Person who then govern'd Kent, was Vortigern's Vice-Roy, or Guorag.

^d Bishop Stillingfleet proves the contrary from several ancient Authors, in his Antiquities of the Brit. Church, cap. 5.

The third in a Field by Stonar^b, then call'd Lapis tituli in Tanet, where he beat them into their Ships that bore them home, glad to have escap'd, and not venturing to Land again for five Years after. In the space whereof Guortemir dying, commanded they should bury him in the Port of Stonar; perswaded that his Bones lying there would be Terrour enough to keep the Saxons from ever landing in that place: They, faith Nennius, neglecting his Command, buried him in Lincoln. But concerning these times, antientest Annals of the Saxons relate in this manner. In the Year

After this first Battel and the Death of his Brother, Hengist with his Son Efca took on him Kingly Title, and peopl'd Kent with Futes; who also then or not long after possess'd the Isle of Wight, and part of Hampshire lying opposite. Two Years after in a Fight at Creganford, or Craford, Hengist and his Son slew of the Britains four Chief Commanders; and as many thousand Men: The rest in great Disorder flying to London, with the total Loss of Kent. And eight Years palling between, he made new War on the Britains; of whom in a Battel at Weped-fleet, twelve Princes were slain, and Wipped the Saxon Earl, who left his Name to that Place, though not sufficient to direct us where it now stands. His last Encounter was at a Place not mention'd, where he gave them such an Overthrow, that flying in great Fear they left the Spoil of all to their Enemies. And these perhaps are the four Battels, according to Nennius, fought by Guortemir, though by these Writers far differently related; and happening, besides many other Bickerings, in the Space of twenty Years, as Malmsh. reckons. Nevertheless it plainly appears that the Saxons, by whomsoever, were put to hard Shifts, being all this while fought withal in Kent, their own allotted Dwelling, and sometimes on the very edge of the Sea, which the word Wippeds-fleet seems to intimate. But Guortemir now dead^c, and none of Courage left to defend the Land, Vortigern, either by the Power of his Faction, or by consent of all, reassumes the Government: And Hengist thus rid of his grand Opposer, hearing gladly the Restoremment of his old Favourer, returns again with great Forces; but to Vortigern whom he well knew how to handle without warring, as to his Son-in-Law, now that the only Author of Dissention between them was remov'd by Death, offers nothing but all Terms of new League and Amity. The King, both for his Wife's Sake and his own Sottishness, consulting also with his Peers not unlike himself, readily yields; and the Place of Parly is agreed on; to which either side was to repair without Weapons. Hengist, whose meaning was not Peace but Treachery, appointed his Men to be secretly arm'd, and acquainted them to what intent. The Watch-word was Nemet eour Saxes, that is, Draw your Daggers; which they observing, when the Britains were thoroughly heated with Wine (for the Treaty it seems was not without Cups) and provok'd, as was plotted, by some Affront, dispatch'd with those Poinards every one his next Man, to the number of 200, the chief of those that could do ought against him either in Counfel or in Field. Vortigern they only bound and kept in Custody, until he granted them for his Ransom three Provinces, which were called afterward Essex, Sussex, and Middlesex^e. Who thus dismiss'd, retiring again to his solitary abode in his Country of Guorthigirni-aun^f, so call'd by his Name, from thence to the Castle of his own building in North-Wales by the River Tiebi; and living there obscurely among his Wives, was at length burnt in his Tower by Fire from Heaven, at the Prayer, as some say, of German, but that coheres not; as others, by Ambrosius Aurelianus; of whom as we have heard at first, he stood in great Fear, and partly for that Cause invited in the Saxons. Who whether by constraint, or of their own accord, after much Mischief done, most of them returning back into their own Country, left a fair Opportunity to the Britains of revenging themselves the easier on those that staid behind. Repenting therefore, and with earnest Supplication imploring divine Help to prevent their final rooting out, they gather from all parts, and under the leading of Ambrosius Aurelianus, a virtuous and modest Man, the last here of Roman Stock, advancing now onward against the late Victors, defeat them in a memorable Battel. Common Opinion, but grounded chiefly on the British Fables, makes this Ambrosius to be a younger Son of that Constantine, whose eldest, as we heard, was Constance the Monk: Who both lost their Lives abroad usurping the Empire. But the express Words both of Gildas and Bede, assures us that the Parents of this Ambrosius having here born Regal Dignity, were slain in these Pictish Wars and Commotions in the Island. And if the Fear of Ambrose induc'd Vortigern to call in the Saxons, it seems Vortigern usurp'd his Right. I perceive not that Nennius makes any Difference between him and Merlin: For that Child without Father that prophecy'd to Vortigern, he names not Merlin but Ambrose, makes him the Son of a Roman Consul; but conceal'd by his Mother, as fearing that the King therefore sought his Life; yet the Youth no sooner had confess'd his Parentage, but Vortigern either in Reward of his Predictions, or as his right, bestow'd upon him all the West of Britain; himself retiring to a solitary Life. Whose ever Son he was, he was the first, according to surest Authors, that led against the Saxons, and overthrew them; but whether before this time or after, none have written. This is certain, that in a time when most of the Saxon Forces were departed home, the Britains gather'd Strength; and either against those who were left remaining, or against their whole Powers, the second time returning obtain'd this Victory^g. Thus Ambrose as Chief Monarch

^e The Return of Hengist, and the Murder of the British Nobles happened according to Mr. Tallent's Chronology, Anno 461. no Authentick Author places it so late as the Year 473.

^f Ambrosius commanded the Britains Twenty Years as their General, and Anno 485. was chosen King. Vid. Dr. Powell's Catalogue of the Kings of Wales.

A. D. 466. of the Isle succeeded Vortigern; to whose third Son Pascentius he permitted the Rule of two Regions in Wales,^a Buelth and Guorthgirnian. In his days, saith Nennius, the Saxons prevail'd not much: Against whom Arthur, as being then Chief General for the British Kings, made great War; but more renown'd in Songs and Romances, than in true Stories. And the Sequel it self declares as much. For in the Year 477, Ella the Saxon, with his three Sons, Cymen, Pleting, and Cissa, at a place in Sussex, call'd Cymensbore, arrive in three Ships, kill many of the Britains, chasing them that remain'd into the Wood^b Andreds-League. Another Battel was fought at Mercreds-Burnamsted, wherein Ella had by far the Victory; but Huntingdon make it so doubtful, that the Saxons were constrain'd to send home for Supplies. Four Year after dy'd Hengist, the first Saxon King of Kent; noted to have attain'd that Dignity by Craft as much as Valour, and giving scope to his own cruel Nature, rather than proceeding by Mildness or Civility. His Son Oeric, surnam'd Oisc, of whom the Kentish Kings were call'd Oiscings, succeeded him, and sat content with his Father's winnings; more desirous to settle and defend, than to enlarge his bounds: He reign'd twenty four Years. By this time Ella and his Son Cissa besieging Andredchester,^c suppos'd now to be Newenden in Kent, take it by force, and all within it put to the Sword. Thus Ella, three Years after the death of Hengist, began his Kingdom of the South-Saxons; peopling it with new Inhabitants, from the Country which was then Old Saxony, at this day Holstein in Denmark, and had besides at his command all those Provinces which the Saxons had won on this side Humber. Animated with these good Successes, as if Britain were become now the Field of Fortune, Kerdic another Saxon Prince, the tenth by Lineage from Woden, an old and practis'd Soldier, who in many prosperous Conflicts against the Enemy in those parts, had nurs'd up a Spirit too big to live at home with Equals, coming to a certain place which from thence took the name of Kerdic-sfoar, with five Ships, and Kenric his Son, the very same day overthrew the Britains that oppos'd him; and so effectually, that smaller Skirmishes after that day were sufficient to drive them still farther off, leaving him a large Territory: After him Porta another Saxon, with his two Sons Bida and Megla, in two Ships arrive at Portsmouth^d thence call'd, and at their landing slew a young British Nobleman, with many others who unadvisedly set upon them. The Britains, to recover what they had lost, draw together all their Forces, led by Natanleod, or Nazaleod, a certain King in Britain, and the greatest, saith one; but him with 5000 of his Men Kerdic puts to rout and slays. From whence the place in Hampshire, as far as Kirdicford, now Chardford, was call'd of old Nazaleod, Who this King should be, hath bred much question; some think it to be the British Name of Ambrose; others to be the right Name of his Brother, who for the terror of his eagerness in fight, became more known by the Sirname of Uther, which in the Welsh Tongue signifies Dreadful. And if ever such a King in Britain there were as Uther Pendragon,^e for so also the Monmouth Book surnames him, this in all likelihood must be he: Kerdic by so great a blow given to the Britains had made large room about him; not only for the Men he brought with him, but for such also of his Friends as he desir'd to make great; for which cause, and withal the more to strengthen himself, his two Nephews, Stuf and Witgar, in three Vessels bring him new Levies to Kerdic-sfoar. Who, that they might not come sluggishly to possess what others had won for them, either by their own seeking, or by appointment, are set in place where they could not but at their first coming give proof of themselves upon the Enemy: And so well they did it, that the Britains after a hard encounter left them Masters of the Field. About the same time, Ella the first South-Saxon King dy'd; whom Cissa his youngest succeeded; the other two failing before him. Nor can it be much more or less than about this time, for it was before the West-Saxon Kingdom, that Uffa the eighth from Woden made himself King of the East-Angles, who by their Name testify the Country above-mention'd; from whence they came in such multitudes, that their native Soil is said to have remain'd in the Days of Beala uninhabited. Huntingdon defers the time of their coming in to the ninth Year of Kerdic's Reign: For, saith he, at first many of them strove for Principality, seizing every one his Province, and for some while so continu'd, making petty Wars among themselves; till in the end Uffa, of whom those Kings were call'd Uffings, overtop'd them all in the Year 571, then Titilus his Son, the Father of Redwald, who became potent. And not much after the East-Angles, began also the East-Saxons to erect a Kingdom under Sleda the tenth from Woden. But Huntingdon, as before, will have it later by eleven Years, and Ercherwin to be the first King. Kerdic, the same in Power, though not so fond of Title, forbore the name twenty four Years after his arrival; but then founded so firmly the Kingdom of West-Saxons, that it subjected all the rest at length, and became the sole Monarchy of England. The same Year he had a Victory against the Britains at Kerdics-Ford, by the River Aven; and after eight Years, another great Fight at Kerdics-League,^f but which won the day is not by any set down. Hitherto hath been collected what there is of certainty, with circumstance of Time and Place, to be found register'd, and no more than barely register'd in Annals of best Note; without describing after Huntingdon the manner of those Battels and Encounters, which they who compare and can judge of Books, may be confident he never found in any current Author whom he had to follow. But this Disease hath been incident to many more Historians: And the Age whereof we now write hath had the ill hap, more than any since the first fabulous times, to be furcharg'd with all the idle fancies of Posterity. Yet that we may not rely altogether on Saxon Relaters, Gildas, in Antiquity far before these, and every way more credible, speaks of these Wars in such a manner, though nothing conceited of the British Valour, as declares the Saxons in his time and before to have been foil'd

^g Suppos'd to be Cherdsley in Buckinghamshire.

A. D. not feldomer than the Britains. For besides 527. that first Victory of Ambrose, and the interchangeable success long after, he tells that the last overthrow which they receiv'd at Badon- Hill was not the least; which they in their oldest Annals mention not at all. And because the time of this Battel, by any who could do more than guess, is not set down, or any foundation given from whence to draw a solid compute, it cannot be much wide to insert it in this place.
 For such Authors as we have to follow give the Conduct and Praise of this Exploit to Arthur; and that this was the last of twelve great Battels which he fought victoriously against the Saxons.
 The several places written by Nennius in their Welsh Names, were many hundred Years ago unknown, and so here omitted. But who Arthur was, and whether ever any such reign'd in Brit- tain, hath been doubted heretofore, and may again with good reason^a. For the Monk of Malmesbury, and others whose Credit hath sway'd most with the learner sort, we may well perceive to have known no more of this Arthur five hundred Years past, nor of his Doings, than we now living: And what they had to say, transscrib'd out of Nennius, a very trivial Writer yet extant, which hath already been related. Or out of a British Book, the same which he of Mon- mouth set forth, utterly unknown to the World till more than six hundred Years after the Days of Arthur, of whom (as Sigebert in his Chronicle confesses) all other Histories were silent, both foreign and domestick, except only that fabulous Book. Others of later time have sought to assert him by old Legends and Cathedral Regefts.
 But he who can accept of Legends for good Story, may quickly swell a Volume with Trash, and had need be furnish'd with two only necessities, Leisure and Belief, whether it be the Writer, or he that shall read. As to Arthur, no less is in doubt who was his Father; for if it be true, as Nennius or his Notist avers, that Arthur was call'd Mab-Uther, that is to say, a cruel Son, for the fierceness that Men saw in him of a Child, and the intent of his name Arturus imports as much, it might well be that some in after-Ages, who sought to turn him into a Fable, wrested the word Uther into a proper Name, and so fain'd him the Son of Uther; since we read not in any certain Story, that ever such Person liv'd, till Geoffrey of Monmouth set him off with the surname of Pendragon. And as we doubted of his Parentage, so may we also of his Puissance; for whether that Victory at Baden-Hill were his or no, is uncertain; Gildas not naming him, as he did Ambrose in the former. Next, if it be true as Caradoc relates, that Melwas King of that Country, which is now Summerfet, kept from him Gueniver his Wife a whole Year in the Town of Glaston, and restor'd her at the entreaty of Gil- das, rather than for any enforcement that Arthur with all his Chivalry could make against a small Town, defended only by a moory situation; had either his knowledge in War, or the force he had to make, been answerable to the fame they bear, that petty King had neither dar'd such an affront,
 nor he been so long, and at last without effect,

in revenging it. Considering, lastly, how the A. D.
Saxons gain'd upon him every where all the 527.
 time of his suppos'd Reign, which began, as some write, in the tenth Year of Kerdic, who wrung from him by long War the Countries of Summerfet and Hampshire; there will remain neither Place nor Circumstance in Story, which may administer any likelihood of those great Acts that are ascribed him. This only is alledg'd by Nennius in Arthur's behalf, that the Saxons, tho' vanquish'd never so oft, grew still more numerous upon him by continual supplies out of Germany. And the truth is, that Valour may be over-toil'd, and overcome at last with endless overcoming. But as for this Battel of Mount Baden, where the Saxons were hemm'd in, or besieg'd, whether by Arthur won, or whensoever, it seems indeed to have given a most undoubted and important blow to the Saxons, and to have stopp'd their proceedings for a good while after. Gildas himself witnessing that the Britains having thus compell'd them to sit down with peace, fell thereupon to civil discord among themselves. Which words may seem to let in some light toward the searching out when this Battel was fought. And we shall find no time since the first Saxon War, from whence a longer Peace ensu'd, than from the Fight of Kerdics-League in the Year 527. which all the Chronicles mention, without Victory to Kerdic; and gave us argument, from the custom they have of magnifying their own Deeds upon all occasions, to presume here his ill speeding.
 And if we look still onward, even to the 44th
 Year after, wherein Gildas wrote, if his obscure utterance be understood, we shall meet with very little War between the Britains and Saxons.
 This only remains difficult, that the Victory first won by Ambrose was not so long before this at Baden Siege, but that the same Men living might be Eye-witnesses of both; and by this rate hardly can the latter be thought won by Arthur, unless we reckon him a grown Youth at least in the days of Ambrose, and much more than a Youth, if Malmesbury be heard, who affirms all the Exploits of Ambrose to have been done chiefly by Arthur as his General, which will add much unbelief to the common assertion of his reigning after Ambrose and Uther, especially the Fight at Badon being the last of his twelve Battels^b. But to prove by that which follows, that the Fight at Kerdics-League, though it differ in name from that of Badon, may be thought the same by all effects; Kerdic three Years after, not proceeding onward, as his manner was, on the Continent, turns back his Forces on the Isle of Wight, which with the slaying of a few only in Withgarburgh, he soon masters; and not long surviving, left it to his Nephews by the Mother's side, Stuff and Withgar; the rest of what he had subdu'd, Kenric his Son held, and reign'd 26 Years, in whose tenth Year Withgar was bury'd in the Town of that Island which bore his Name. Notwithstanding all these unlikelihoods of Arthur's Reign and great Atchievements, in a narration crept in I know not how among the Laws of Edward the Confessor, Arthur the famous King of Britains, is said not only to have expell'd hence the Saracens

^a Bishop Stillingfleet, in his Vth Chapter of his Antiquities of the British Churches, justifies the History of King Arthur. He was born at Camelford, and dy'd at Tindagel in Cornwall. Camb. Brit. Tit. Corn. The Story of this British Hero is confirm'd by the Inscription on his Coffin, which was dug up by command of Henry the Second, who had learn'd by the Songs of the British Bards, that he was bury'd at Glastonbury in Somersetshire, between two Pyramids; where nine Foot deep a Coffin made of the Trunk of an Oak was found, with this Inscription on it in Gothick Characters:

Cambd. Tit. Somersetsh.

^b This Fight was fought, according to the best British Manuscripts, Anno 520.

A. D. 544. who were not then known in Europe, but to have conquer'd Freeſland, and all the North-Eaſt Iſles as far as Ruſſia, to have made Lapland the Eaſtern bound of his Empire, and Norway the Chamber of Britain. When ſhould this be done? From the Saxons, till after twelve Battels, he had no reſt at home; after thoſe, the Britains contented with the Quiet they had from the Saxon Enemies, were ſo far from ſeeking Conqueſts abroad, that by report of Gildas above cited, they fell to Civil Wars at home. Surely Artur much better had made War in old Saxony, to repreſs their flowing hither, than to have won Kingdoms as far as Ruſſia, ſcarce able here to defend his own. Buchanan our Neighbour Hiſtorian reprehends him of Monmouth and others for fabling in the Deeds of Artur, yet what he writes thereof himſelf, as of better Credit, ſhews not whence he had but from thoſe Fables; which he ſeems content to believe in part, on condition that the Scots and Picts may be thought to have aſſiſted Artur in all his Wars and Atchievements, whereof appears as little Ground by any credible Story, as of that which he moſt counts Fabulous. But not farther to conteſt about ſuch Uncertainties. In the Year

547. Ida the Saxon, ſprung alſo from Woden in the tenth Degree, began the Kingdom of Bernicia in Northumberland; built the Town * Bebbanburg, which was after wall'd; and had twelve Sons, half by Wives, and half by Concubines. Hengiſt by leave of Vortigern, we may remember, had ſent Oſta and Ebiſſa to ſeek them Seats in the North, and there by warring on the Picts, to ſecure the Southern Parts. Which they ſo prudently effected, that what by Force and fair Proceeding, they well quieted thoſe Countries; and though ſo far diſtant from Kent, nor without Power in their hands, yet kept themſelves nigh 180 Years within Moderation; and as Inferiour Governours, they and their Off-ſpring gave Obedience to the Kings of Kent, as to the Elder Family. Till at length, following the Example of that Age; when no leſs than Kingdoms were the Prize of every fortunate Commander, they thought it but reaſon, as well as others of their Nation, to aſſume Royalty. Of whom Ida was the firſt, a Man in the prime of his Years, and of Parentage as we heard; but how he came to wear the Crown, aſpiring or by free Choice, is not ſaid. Certain enough it is, that his Vertues made him not leſs Noble than his Birth, in War undaunted, and unſoil'd; in Peace temp'ring the Awe of Magiſtracy, with a natural Mildneſs: He reign'd about twelve Years.

552. In the mean while Kenric in a Fight at Seareſbirig, now Salisbury, kill'd and put to flight many of the Britains; and the fourth Year after at Beranvirig, now Banbury, as ſome think, with Keaulin his Son put them again to flight. Keaulin ſhortly after ſucceeded his Father in the West-Saxons. And Alla deſcended alſo of Woden, but by another Line, ſet up a ſecond Kingdom in Deira the South part of Northumberland, and held it thirty Years; while Adda the Son of Ida, and five more after him reign'd without other Memory in Bernicia: And in Kent, Ethelbert the next Year began. For Eſca the Son of Hengiſt had left Oſta, and he Emeric to Rule after him; both which without adding to their Bounds, kept what they had in Peace fifty three Years. But Ethelbert in length of Reign equall'd both his Progenitors, and as Beda counts, three Years exceeded. Young at his firſt Entrance, and un-experienc'd, he was the firſt Raiſer of Civil War among the Saxons; claiming from the Priority of time wherein Hengiſt took Poſſeſſion here, a kind of Right over the later Kingdoms;

and thereupon was troubleſome to their Confines: But by them twice defeated, he who but now thought to ſeem dreadful, became almoſt and Cnebban. By this means the Britains, but in Surcy chiefly by this Victory at Badon, for the ſpace of forty four Years ending in 571, receiv'd no great Annoyance from the Saxons: But the Peace they enjoy'd, by ill uſing it, prov'd more de-ſtructive to them than War. For being rais'd on a ſudden by two ſuch eminent Succesſes, from the loweſt Condition of Thralldom, they whoſe Eyes had beheld both thoſe Deliverances, that by Ambroſe, and this at Badon, were taught by the Experience of either Fortune, both Kings, Magiſtrates, Priests, and private Men, to live orderly. But when the next Age, unacquainted with paſt Evils, and only ſenſible of their preſent Eaſe and Quiet, ſucceeded, ſtrait follow'd ſible in a general Corruption: which grew in ſhort ſpace not only manifeſt, but odious to all the Neighbour Nations. And firſt their Kings, among whom alſo, the Sons or Grand-Children of Ambroſe, were foully degenerated to all Tyranny and Vitious Life. Whereof to hear ſome Particulars out of Gildas will not be impertinent.

They avenge, ſaith he, and they protect; not

A. D. 571. nay forbidding and silencing them that know; but in Worldly Matters, practis'd and cunning Shifters; in that only Art and Simony, great Clerks and Masters, bearing their Heads high, but their Thoughts abject and low. He taxes them also as gluttonous, incontinent, and daily Drunkards. And what shouldst thou expect from these, poor Laity, so he goes on, these Beasts, all Belly? Shall these amend thee, who are themselves laborious in evil Doings? Shalt thou see with their Eyes, who see right forward nothing but Gain? Leave them rather, as bids our Saviour, lest ye fall both blind-fold into the same Perdition. Are all thus? Perhaps not all, or not so grossly. But what avail'd it Eli to be himself blameless, while he conniv'd at others that were abominable? Who of them hath been envy'd for his better Life? Who of them hath hated to consort with these, or withstood their entering the Ministry, or endeavour'd zealously their casting out? Yet some of these perhaps by others are legended for great Saints. This was the State of Government, this of Religion among the Britains, in that long Calm of Peace, which the Fight at Badon Hill had brought forth. Whereby it came to pass, that so fair a Victory came to nothing. Towns and Cities were not reinhabited, but lay ruin'd and waste; nor was it long e're Domestic War breaking out, wasted them more. For Britain, as at other times, had then also several Kings. Five of whom Gildas living then in Armorica, at a safe Distance, boldly reproves by Name; First Constantine (fabl'd the Son of Cador, Duke of Cornwall, Artur's half Brother by the Mother's Side) who then reign'd in Cornwall and Devon, a Tyrannical and Bloody King, polluted also with many Adulteries: He got into his Power, two young Princes of the Blood Royal, uncertain whether before him in Right, or otherwise suspected: And after solemn Oath given of their Safety, the Year that Gildas wrote, slew them with their two Governours in the Church, and in their Mother's Arms, through the Abbot's Cope, which he had thrown over them, thinking by the Reverence of his Vesture to have with-held the Murderer. These are commonly suppos'd to be the Sons of Mordred, Artur's Nephew, said to have revolted from his Uncle, given him in a Battel his Death's Wound, and by him after to have been slain. Which things were they true, would much diminish the Blame of Cruelty in Constantine, revenging Artur on the Sons of so false a Mordred. In another part, but not express'd where, Aurelius Co-nanus was King: Him he charges also with Adulteries, and Parricide; Cruelties worse than the former; to be a Hater of his Countries Peace, thirsting after Civil War and Prey: His Condition, it seems, was not very prosperous; for Gildas wishes him, being now left alone, like a Tree withering in the midst of a barren Field, to remember the Vanity, and Arrogance of his Father, and elder Brethren, who came all to untimely Death in their Youth. The third reigning in Demetia, or South Wales, was Vortipor, the Son of a good Father; he was when Gildas wrote, grown old, not in Years only, but in Adulteries, and in governing full of Falshood, and cruel Actions. In his latter Days, putting away his Wife, who dy'd in Divorce, he became,

if we mistake not Gildas, incestuous with his Daughter. The fourth was Cuneglas, imbrud in Civil War; he also had divorc'd his Wife, and taken her Sister, who had vow'd Widowhood: He was a great Enemy to the Clergy, high-minded, and trusting to his Wealth. The last but greatest of all in Power, was Maglocune, and greatest also in Wickedness; he had driv'n out or slain many other Kings, or Tyrants; and was called the Island Dragon, perhaps having his Seat in Anglesey; a profuse Giver, a great Warrior, and of a goodly Stature. While he was yet young, he overthrew his Uncle, though in the Head of a compleat Army, and took from him the Kingdom: Then touch'd with Remorse of his Doings, not without Deliberation took upon him the Profession of a Monk; but soon forsook his Vow, and his Wife also, which for that Vow he had left, making Love to the Wife of his Brother's Son then living. Who not refusing the Offer, if she were not rather the first that entic'd, found means both to dispatch her own Husband, and the former Wife of Maglocune, to make her Marriage with him the more unquestionable. Neither did he this for want of better Instructions, having had the learnedest and wisest Man reputed of all Britain, the Instructor of his Youth. Thus much, the utmost that can be learnt by truer Story, of what pass'd among the Britains from the time of their useless Victory at Badon, to the time that Gildas wrote, that is to say, as may be guess'd, from 527 to 571, is here set down all together; not to be reduc'd under any Certainty of Years. But now the Saxons, who for the most part all this while had been still, unless among themselves, began afresh to assault them, and e're long to drive them out of all which they yet maintain'd on this side Wales. For Cuthulf the Brother of Keaulin, by a Victory obtain'd at Bedanford, now Camden. Bedford took from them four good Towns, * Li-ganburgh, * Eglesburgh, Befington, now Benson in * Alesbury. Oxfordshire, and † Ignesham; but outliv'd not many † Ensham, Months his good Success^b. And after six Years in Oxfordshire, more, Keaulin, and Cuthwin his Son, gave them a great Overthrow at Deorrbam in Glocestershire, 577. Deorrbam. Deorrbam slew three of their Kings, Comail, Condidan, and Farinmail, and took three of their chief Cities; Glocester, Cirencester, and Badencester. The Britains notwithstanding, after some space of time, judging to have out-grown their Losses, gather to a head, and encounter Keaulin with Cutha his Son, at Fethanleage; whom valiantly fighting, they slew among the thickest, and as is said, forc'd the Saxons to retire. But Keaulin reinforcing the Fight, put them to a main Rout, and following his Advantage, took many Towns, and return'd laden with rich Booty. The last of those Saxons who rais'd their own Achievements to a Monarchy, was Crida, much about this time^c, first Founder of the Mercian Kingdom, drawing also his Pedigree from Woden. Of whom all to write the several Genealogies, though it might be done without long search, were, in my Opinion, to encumber the Story with a sort of barbarous Names, to little purpose. This may suffice, that of Woden's three Sons, from the Eldest issu'd Hengist, and his Succession; from the second, the Kings of Mercia; from the third, all that Reign'd in West-Saxon, and most of the Northumbers, of whom

^b Some Authors place the founding of the Kingdom of the East Angles by Uffa at this time, Anno 575. Mr. Tallent is of this Opinion in his Chronological Tables.

^c Henry of Huntington and Matt. Westmister, write that Crida founded the Kingdom of Mercia in the Year 585.

A. D. 584. Alla was one, the first King of Deira; which after his Death, the Race of Ida seiz'd, and made it one Kingdom with Bernicia, usurping on the Childhood of Edwin, Alla's Son, whom Ethelric the Son of Ida expell'd. Notwithstanding others write of him; that from a poor Life, and beyond hope in his old Age, coming to the Crown, he could hardly by the access of a Kingdom, have overcome his former obscurity, had not the fame of his Son preserv'd him. Once more the Britains, e're they quitted all on this side the Mountains, forgot not to shew some Manhood; for meeting Keaulin at Wodens Beorth, that is to say, Wodens Mount in Wiltshire, whether it were by their own Forces, or assisted by the Angles, whose hatred Keaulin had incurr'd, they ruin'd his whole Army, and chas'd him out of his Kingdom, from whence flying, he dy'd the next Year in Poverty, who a little before was the most Potent and indeed Sole King of all the Saxons on this side Humber. But who was chief among the Britains in this Exploit had been worth remembering, whether it were Maglocune, of whose Prowess hath been spoken, or Teudric King of Glamorgan, whom the Regest of Landaff recounts to have been always Victorious in Fight; to have Reign'd about this time, and at length to have exchanged his Crown for a Hermitage; till in the aid of his Son Mauric, whom the Saxons had reduc'd to extremes, taking Arms again, he defeated them at Tinterno by the River Wye; but himself receiv'd a mortal wound. The same Year with Keaulin, whom Keola the Son of Crithulf, Keaulin's Brother succeeded, Crida also the Mercian King deceas'd, in whose room Wibba succeeded; and in Northumberland, Ethelfred in the room of Ethelric, Reigning twenty four Years. Thus omitting Fables, we have the view of what with reason can be rely'd on for truth, done in Britain, since the Romans forsook it. Wherein we have heard the many Miseries and Desolations brought by Divine Hand on a perverse Nation; driven, when nothing else would reform them, out of a fair Country, into a Mountainous and Barren Corner^b, by Strangers and Pagans. So much more tolerable in the Eye of Heaven, is Infidelity profess'd, than Christian Faith and Religion dishonoured by unchristian works. Yet they also at length renounc'd their Heathenism; which how it came to pass, will be the matter next related.

THE History of ENGLAND,

By Mr. JOHN MILTON. Book IV.

A. D. 593. THE Saxons grown up now to seven Absolute Kingdoms, and the latest of them establish'd by Succession, finding their Power arrive well nigh at the utmost of what was to be gain'd upon the Britains, and as little fearing to be displaced by them, had time now to survey at leisure one another's Greatness. Which quickly bred among them either Envy or mutual Jealousies; till the West Kingdom at length grown over-powerful, put an end to all the rest. Mean while, above others, Ethelbert of Kent, who by this time had well ripen'd his young Ambition, with more ability of Years and experience in War, what before he attempted to his loss, now successfully attains; and by degrees brought all the other Monarchies between Kent and Humber, to be at his devotion. To which design the Kingdom of West-Saxons, being the firmest of them all, at that time sore shaken by their overthrow at Wodens-beorth, and the Death of Keaulin, gave him no doubt a main advantage; the rest yielded not subjection, but as he earn'd it by continual Victories. And to win him the more regard abroad, he marries Bertha the French King's Daughter, though a Christian, and with this condition, to have the free exercise of her Faith, under the care and instruction of Letardus a Bishop, sent by her Parents along with her; the King notwithstanding and his People retaining their own Religion. Beda out of Gildas lays it sadly to the Britains charge, that they never would vouchsafe their Saxon Neighbours the means of Conversion: But how far to blame they were, and what hope there was of converting in the midst of so much hostility, at least fallhood from their first arrival, is not now easie to determine. Howbeit not long after, they had the Christian Faith preach'd to them by a Nation more remote, and (as report went, accounted old in Beda's time) upon this occasion. The Northumbrians had a custom at that time, and many hundred Years after not abolish'd, to sell their Children for a small value into any foreign Land. Of which number, two comely Youths were brought to Rome, whose fair and honest Countenance invited Gregory Arch-Deacon of that City, among others that beheld them, pitying their condition, to demand whence they were; it was answer'd by some who stood by, that they were Angli of the Province of Deira, Subjects to Alla King of Northumberland, and by Religion Pagans. Which last Gregory deploring

^a 'Tis probably the same place with Wanburrow, on the borders of Wilts and Berks; or rather a little Village between Marlborough and the Devises, near Wansdike.

^b The British Chronicles put the total Retreat of the Welsh into Wales, Anno 517.

A. D. 593. fram'd on a sudden this allusion to the three Names he heard; that the Angli, so like to Angels, should be snatch'd de ira; that is, from the Wrath of God, to sing Hallelujah: And forthwith obtaining licence of Benedict the Pope, had come and preach'd here among them, had not the Roman People, whose love endur'd not the absence of so vigilant a Pastor over them, recall'd him, then on his Journey, though but deferr'd his pious intention. For a while after, succeeding in the Papal Seat, and now in his fourth Year, admonish'd, saith Beda, by divine Instinct, he sent Augustine, whom he had design'd for Bishop of the Englisch Nation, and other zealous Monks with him, to preach to them the Gospel. Who being now on their way, discouraged by some reports, or their own carnal fear, sent back Austin, in the name of all, to beseech Gregory they might return home, and not be sent a Journey so full of hazard, to a fierce and infidel Nation, whose Tongue they understood not. Gregory with Pious and Apostolick Persuasions exhorts them not to shrink back from so good a work, but cheerfully to go on in the strength of Divine Assistance. The Letter itself yet extant among our Writers of Ecclesiastick Story, I omit here, as not professing to relate of those Matters more than what mixes aptly with Civil Affairs. The Abbot Austin, for so he was ordain'd over the rest, reincurag'd by the Exhortations of Gregory, and his Fellows, by the Letter which he brought them, came safe to the Isle of Tanet, in number about forty, besides some of the French Nation, whom they took along as Interpreters. Ethelbert the King, to whom Austin at his landing had sent a new and wondrous Message, that he came from Rome to proffer Heaven and Eternal Happiness in the knowledge of another God than the Saxons knew, appoints them to remain where they landed, and Necessaries to be provided them, consulting in the mean time what was to be done. And after certain days coming into the Island, chose a place to meet them under the open Sky, possess'd with an old persuasion, that all Spells, if they should use any to deceive him, so it were not within doors, would be unavailable. They on the other side, call'd to his presence, advancing for their Standard a Silver Cross, and the painted Image of our Saviour, came slowly forward singing their Solemn Letanies: Which wrought in Ethelbert more suspicion perhaps that they us'd Enchantments; till sitting down as the King will'd them, they there preach'd to him, and all in that Assembly, the tidings of Salvation. Whom having heard attentively, the King thus answer'd: Fair indeed and ample are the promises which ye bring, and such things as have the appearance in them of much good; yet such as being new and uncertain, I cannot hastily assent to, quitting the Religion which from my Ancestors, with all the Englisch Nation, so many Years I have retain'd. Nevertheless because ye are Strangers, and have endured so long a journey, to impart us the knowledge of things, which I persuade me you believe to be the truest and the best, ye may be sure we shall not recompence you with any molestation, but shall provide rather how we may friendliest entertain ye; nor do we forbid whom ye can by preaching gain to your belief. And accordingly their Residence he allotted them in Doroverne or Canterbury his chief City, and made provision for their Maintenance, with free leave to preach their Doctrine where they pleased. By which, and by the example of their holy Life, spent in Prayer, Fasting, and continual labour in the Conversion of Souls, they won many; on whose bounty and the King's, receiving only what was necessary, they subsisted. There stood without the City, on the East-side, an ancient Church built in honour of St. Martin, while yet the Romans remain'd here: In which Bertha the Queen went out usually to pray. Here they also began first to preach, baptize, and openly to exercise Divine Worship. But when the King himself, convinc'd by their good Life and Miracles, became Christian, and was baptiz'd, which came to pass in the very first Year of their arrival; then Multitudes daily, conforming to their Prince, thought it honour to be reckon'd among those of his Faith: To whom Ethelbert indeed principally shewed his favour, but compell'd none. For so he had been taught by them, who were both the Instructors and the Authors of his Faith, that Christian Religion ought to be voluntary, not compell'd. About this time Kelwulf the Son of Cutha, Keaulin's Brother, reign'd over the West-Saxons, after his Brother Keola or Kelric, and had continual War either with Englisch, Welsh, Picts, or Scots. But Austin, whom with his Fellows, Ethelbert now had endow'd with a better place for their abode in the City, and other possessions necessary to livelihood, crossing into France, was by the Archbishop of Arles, at the appointment of Pope Gregory, ordain'd Archbishop of the Englisch: And returning, sent to Rome Laurence and Peter, two of his Associates, to acquaint the Pope of his good success in England, and to be resolv'd of certain Theological, or rather Levitical Questions: With answers to which, not proper in this place, Gregory sends also to the great Work of Converting, that went on so happily, a supply of Labourers, Mellitus, Justus, Paulinus, Rufinian, and many others; who what they were may be guess'd by the stuff which they brought with them, Vessels and Vestments for the Altar, Copes, Relicks, and for the Archbishop Austin a Pall to say Mass in: To such a rank Superstition that Age was grown, though some of them yet retaining an emulation of Apostolick Zeal. Lastly, to Ethelbert they brought a Letter with many Presents. Austin thus exalted to Archiepiscopal Authority, recover'd from the ruins and other profane uses, a Christian Church in Canterbury, built of old by the Romans; which he dedicated by the Name of Christ's Church, and joining to it built a Seat for himself and his Successors; a Monastery also near the City Eastward, where Ethelbert at his motion built St. Peter's, the Apostle and enrich'd it with great Endowments, to be of the place of burial for the Archbishops and Kings of Kent: So quickly they stept up into fellowship of Pomp with Kings. While thus Ethelbert and his People had their Minds intent, Ethelfrid the Northumbrian King was not less busied in far different affairs: For being altogether Warlike, and covetous of Fame, he more wasted the Britains than any Saxon King before him; winning from them large Territories, which either he made tributary, or planted with his own Subjects. Whence Edan King of those Scots that dwelt in Britain, jealous of his successes, came against him with a mighty Army, to a place call'd Degfastan; but in the Fight losing most of his Men, himself with a few escap'd: Only Theobald the King's Brother, and the whole Wing which he commanded, unfortunately cut off, made the Victory to Ethelfrid less intire. Yet from that time no King of Scots in hostile manner durst pass into Britain for a hundred and more Years after:

A. D. 603. and what some Years before, Kelwulf the West-Saxon is annal'd to have done against the Scots and Picts, passing through the Land of Ethelfrid a King so Potent, unless in his Aid and Alliance, is not likely. Buchanan writes as if Ethelfrid, assisted by Keaulin, whom he mis-titles King of East-Saxons, had before this time a Battel with Aidan, wherein Cutha Keaulin's Son was slain. But Cutha, as is above written from better Authority, was slain in Fight against the Welch twenty Years before. The Number of Christians began now to increase so fast, that Augustine ordaining Bishops under him, two of his Assistants Mellitus and Justus, sent them out both to the Work of their Ministry. And Mellitus by preaching converted the East-Saxons, over whom Sebert the Son of Sleda, by Permission of Ethelbert, being born of his Sister Ricula, then reign'd. Whole Conversion Ethelbert to gratulate, built them the great Church of St. Paul in London to be their Bishop's Cathedral; as Justus also had his built at Rocheſter, and both gifted by the same King with fair Possessions. Hitherto Austin laboured well among Infidels, but not with like Commendation soon after among Christians. For by means of Ethelbert summoning the Britain Bishops to a place ^b on the Edge of Worcestershire, call'd from that time Augustine's Oak, he requires them to conform with him in the same Day of celebrating Easter, and many other Points wherein they differ'd from the Rites of Rome: Which when they refus'd to do, not prevailing by Dispute, he appeals to a Miracle, restoring to sight a blind Man whom the Britains could not cure. At this something mov'd, though not minded to recede from their own Opinions, without farther Consultation, they request a second Meeting: To which came seven Britain Bishops, with many other learned Men, especially from the famous Monastery of Bangor, in which were said to be so many Monks, living all by their own Labour, that being divided under seven Rectors, none had fewer than three hundred. One Man there was who staid behind, a Hermit by the Life he led, who by his Wisdom effected more than all the rest who went: Being demanded, for they held him as an Oracle, how they might know Austin to be a Man from God, that they might follow him, he answer'd, that if they found him meek and humble, they should be taught by him, for it was likeliest to be the Yoke of Christ, both what he bore himself, and would have them bear; but if he bore himself proudly, that they should not regard him, for he was then certainly not of God. They took his Advice, and hasted to the Place of Meeting. Whom Austin, being already there before them, neither arose to meet, nor receiv'd in any Brotherly sort, but sat all the while pontifically in his Chair. Whereat the Britains, as they were counsell'd by the Holy Man, neglected him, and neither hearken'd to his Proposals of Conformity, nor would acknowledge him for an Arch-bishop: And in Name of the rest, Dimorbus then Abbot of Bangor, is said, thus sagely to have answer'd him. As to the Subjection which you require, be thus perfwaded of us, that in the Bond of Love and Charity

we are all Subjects and Servants to the Church of God, yea to the Pope of Rome, and every good Christian to help them forward, both by Word and Deed, to be the Children of God: Other Obedience than this we know not to be due to him whom you term the Pope; and this Obedience we are ready to give both to him and to every Christian continually. Besides, we are govern'd under God by the Bishop of Caerleon^{*}, who is to oversee us in Spiritual Matters. To which Austin thus prefaging, some say menacing, replies, Since ye refuse to accept of Peace with your Brethren, ye shall have War from your Enemies; and since ye will not with us preach the Word of Life, to whom ye ought, from their hands ye shall receive Death. This, though Writers agree not whether Austin spake it as his Prophecy, or as his Plot against the Britains, fell out accordingly. For many Years were not past, when Ethelfrid, whether of his own accord, or at the request of Ethelbert, incens'd by Austin, with a powerful Host came to Westchester, then Caer-legion. Where being met by the British Forces, and both sides in readiness to give the Onset, he discerns a Company of Men, not habited for War, standing together in a place of some Safety; and by them a Squadron arm'd. Whom having learn'd upon some Enquiry to be Priests and Monks, assembl'd thither after three Days fasting to pray for the good Success of their Forces against him, therefore they first, faith he, shall feel our Swords; for they who pray against us, fight heaviest against us by their Prayers, and are our dangerouſest Enemies. And with that turns his first Charge upon the Monks: Brocmil, the Captain, set to guard them, quickly turns his back, and leaves above 1200 Monks to a sudden Massacre, whereof scarce fifty escap'd: But not so easie Work found Ethelfrid against another part of Britains that stood in Arms, whom though at last he overthrew, yet with Slaughter nigh as great to his own Soldiers. To excuse Austin of this Bloodshed, lest some might think it his revengeful Policy, Beda writes that he was dead long before, although if the time of his sitting Arch-bishop be right computed sixteen Years, he must survive this Action. Other just Ground of charging him with this Imputation appears not, save what evidently we have from Geoffrey Monmouth, whose weight we know. The same Year Kelwulf made War on the South-Saxons, bloody, faith Huntingdon, to both sides, but most to them of the South: And four Years after dying left the Government of West-Saxons to Kineglis and Cuicelm the Sons of his Brother Keola. Others, as Florent of Worcester, and Matthew of Westminster, will have Cuicelm Son of Kineglis, but admitted to reign with his Father, in whose third Year they are recorded with joynt Forces or Conduct to have fought against the Britains in Beandune, now Bindon in Dorsetshire, and to have slain of them above two Thousand. More memorable was the second Year following, by the Death of Ethelbert the first Christian King of Saxons, and no less a Favourer of all Civility in that rude Age. He gave Laws and Statutes after the Example of Roman Emperors, written with the Advice of ^c In this Year 611. Sebert King of the East-Saxons founded St. Peter's Church and Abbey at Weſtminſter, which was conſecrated by Mellitus firſt Biſhop of London.

^d The Saxon Chronicle calls it Beandune: And it is not unlikely, that 'twas Bampton in Devonſhire, where it borders upon Somerſetſhire, tho' Camden in his Brit. Tit. Dorſetſhire, ſays Beandune is Byndon near Wareham in that County.

A. D. 616. his sagest Counsellors, but in the English Tongue, and observ'd long after. Wherein his special Care was to punish those who had stoll'n ought from Church or Churchman, thereby shewing how gratefully he receiv'd at their hands the Christian Faith, Which, he no sooner dead, but his Son Eadbald took the Course as fast to extinguish; not only falling back to Heathenism, but that which Heathenism was wont to abhor, marrying his Father's second Wife. Then soon was perceiv'd what Multitudes for Fear or Countenance of the King had profess'd Christianity, returning now as eagerly to their old Religion. Nor staid the Apostasy within one Province, but quickly spread over to the East-Saxons; occasion'd there likewise, or set forward by the Death of their Christian King Sebert: Whose three Sons, of whom two are nam'd, Sexted and Seward, neither in his Life-time would be brought to Baptism, and after his Decease re-establish'd the free Exercise of Idolatry; nor so content, they set themselves in Despight to do some open Profanation against the other Sacrament. Coming therefore into the Church, where Mellitus the Bishop was ministering, they requir'd him in Abuse and Scorn to deliver to them unbaptiz'd the consecrated Bread; and him refusing, drove disgracefully out of their Dominion. Who cross'd forthwith into Kent, where things were in the same plight, and thence into France, with Justus Bishop of Rocheſter. But Divine Vengeance deferr'd not long the Punishment of Men so impious; for Eadbald, vext with an evil Spirit, fell often into foul Fits of Distraction; and the Sons of Sebert, in a Fight against the West-Saxons perish'd, with their whole Army. But Eadbald, within the Year, by an extraordinary means became penitent. For when Lawrence the Archbishop and Successor of Austin was preparing to ship for France, after Justus and Mellitus, the Story goes, if it be worth believing^a, that St. Peter, in whose Church he spent the Night before in watching and praying, appear'd to him, and to make the Vision more sensible, gave him many Stripes for offering to desert his Flock; at sight whereof the King (to whom next Morning he shewed the Marks of what he had suffer'd, by whom and for what Cause) relenting and in great Fear dissolv'd his incestuous Marriage, and apply'd himself to the Christian Faith more sincerely than before, with all his People. But the Londoners, addicted still to Paganism, would not be perswaded to receive again Mellitus their Bishop, and to compel them was not in his Power.

617. Thus much through all the South was troubl'd in Religion, as much were the North Parts disquieted through Ambition. For Ethelfrid of Bernicia, as was touch'd before, having thrown Edwin out of Deira, and joyn'd that Kingdom to his own, not content to have bereav'd him of his Right, whose known Vertues and high Parts gave cause of Suspicion to his Enemies, sends Messengers to demand him of Redwald King of East-Angles; under whose Protection, after many Years wandring obscurely through all the Island, he had plac'd his Safety. Redwald, though having promis'd all Defence to Edwin as to his Suppliant, yet tempted with continual and large Offers of Gold, and not contemning the Puissance of Ethelfrid, yielded at length, either to dispatch him, or to give him into their hands: But earnestly exhorted by his Wife, not to betray the Faith and inviolable Law of Hospitality and Refuge given, prefers his first Promise as the more Religious; nor only refuses to deliver him; but since War was thereupon denounc'd, determines to be beforehand with the Danger; and with a sudden Army rais'd, surprizes Ethelfrid, little dreaming an Invasion, and in a Fight near to the East-side of the River Idle, on the Mercian Border, now Nottinghamshire^b, slays him, dissipating easily those few Forces which he had got to march out over-hastily with him; who yet as a Testimony of his Fortune, not his Valour to be blam'd, slew first with his own hands Reiner the King's Son. His two Sons Oswald, and Oswi, by Acca, Edwin's Sister, escap'd into Scotland. By this Victory, Redwald became so far Superiour to the other Saxon Kings, that Beda reckons him the next after Ella and Ethelbert; who besides this Conquest of the North, had likewise all on the hither-side Humber at his Obedience. He had formerly in Kent receiv'd Baptism, but coming home, and perswaded by his Wife, who still it seems, was his chief Counsellor to good or bad alike, relaps'd into his old Religion; yet not willing to forego his new, thought it not the worst way, lest perhaps he might err in either, for more Assurance to keep them both; and in the same Temple erected one Altar to Christ, another to his Idols. But Edwin, as with more Deliberation he undertook, and with more Sincerity retain'd the Christian Profession, so also in Power and Extent of Dominion far exceeded all before him; subduing all, saith Beda, English or British, even to the Isles, then call'd Mevanian, Anglesey, and Man; settl'd in his Kingdom by Redwald, he sought in Marriage Edelburga, whom others call'd Tate, the Daughter of Ethelbert. To whose Embassadors, Eadbald her Brother made answer, That to wed their Daughter to a Pagan, was not the Christian Law. Edwin reply'd, that to her Religion he would be no Hindrance, which with her whole Household she might freely exercise. And moreover, that if examin'd it were found the better, he would imbrace it. These ingenuous Offers, opening so fair a way to the Advancement of Truth, are accepted, and Paulinus as a spiritual Guardian sent along with the Virgin. He being to that purpose made Bishop by Justus, omitted no Occasion to plant the Gospel in those Parts, but with small Success, till the next Year, Cuichelm, at that time one of the two West-Saxon Kings, envious of the Greatness which he saw Edwin growing up to, sent privily Eumerus a hir'd Sword-man to assassinate him; who under Pretence of doing a Message from his Master, with a poison'd Weapon, stabs at Edwin, conferring with him in his House, by the River Derwent in Yorkshire, on an Easter-day; which Lilla, one of the King's Attendants, at the instant perceiving, with a Loyalty that stood not then to deliberate, abandon'd his whole Body to the Blow; which notwithstanding made Passage through to the King's Person, with a Wound not to be slighted. The Murtherer encompass'd now with Swords, and desperate, fore-revenges his own Fall with the Death of another, whom his Poinard reach'd home. Paulinus omitting no Opportunity to win the King from Mis-belief, obtain'd at length this Promise from him; that if Christ, whom he so magnifi'd, would give him to recover of his Wound, and Victory of his Enemies who had thus assaulted him, he would then become Christian, in Pledge whereof he gave his young Daughter Eanfled to be bred up in Religion;

A. D. 626. who with twelve others of his Family, on the Day of Pentecost was baptiz'd. And by that time well recover'd of his wound, to punish the Authers of so foul a fact, he went with an Army against the West-Saxons: Whom having quell'd by War, and of such as had conspir'd against him, put some to death, others pardon'd, he return'd home victorious; and from that time worshipp'd no more his Idols, yet ventur'd not rashly into Baptism, but first took care to be instructed rightly, what he learnt, examining and still considering with himself and others, whom he held wisest; though Boniface the Pope, by large Letters of Exhortation, both to him and his Queen, was not wanting to quicken his belief. But while he still deferr'd, and his deferring might seem now to have past the maturity of Wisdom to a faulty lingring. Paulinus by Revelation, as was believ'd, coming to the knowledge of a Secret, which befel him strangely in the time of his troubles, on a certain day went in boldly to him, and laying his right hand on the head of the King, ask'd him if he remembered what that sign meant? The King trembling, and in amaze rising up, straight fell at his Feet: Behold, saith Paulinus, raising him from the ground, God hath deliver'd you from your Enemies, and given you the Kingdom, as you desir'd: Perform now what long since you promis'd him, to receive his Doctrine which I now bring you, and the Faith, which if you accept, shall to your Temporal Felicity add Eternal. The promise claim'd of him by Paulinus, how and wherefore made, though favouring much of Legend, is thus related: Redwald, as we heard before, dazled with the Gold of Erbelfrid, or by his threatening over-aw'd, having promis'd to yield up Edwin, one of his faithful Companions, of which he had some few with him in the Court of Redwald, that never shrunk from his adversity, about the first hour of night comes in haste to his Chamber, and calling him forth for better security, reveals to him his danger, offers him his aid to make escape; but that course not approv'd, as seeming dishonourable without more manifest cause to begin distrust towards one who had so long been his only refuge, the Friend departs. Edwin left alone without the Palace-Gate, full of sadness and perplex thoughts, discerns about the dead of night a Man, neither by Countenance nor by Habit to him known, approaching towards him: Who, after salutation, ask'd him, why at this hour, when all others were at rest, he alone so sadly sat waking on a cold Stone? Edwin, not a little misdoubting who he might be, ask'd him again, What his sitting within doors or without concern'd him to know? To whom he again, Think not that who thou art, or why sitting here, or what danger hangs over thee, is to me unknown: But what would you promise to that Man, who ever would befriend you out of all these troubles, and persuade Redwald to the like? All that I am able, answer'd Edwin. And he, What if the same Man should promise to make you greater than any Englisch King hath been before you? I should not doubt, quoth Edwin, to be answerably grateful. And what if to all this he would inform you, said the other, in a way to Happiness, beyond what any of your Ancestors hath known? would you hearken to his Counsel? Edwin, without stopping, promis'd he would. And the other,

laying his right Hand on Edwin's Head, When A. D. this sign, saith he, shall next befall thee, remember this time of night, and this discourse, to perform what thou hast promis'd; and with these words disappearing, left Edwin much reviv'd, but not less fill'd with wonder, who this unknown should be. When suddenly the Friend who had been gone all this while to listen farther what was like to be decreed of Edwin, comes back, and joyfully bids him rise to his repose, for that the King's Mind, tho' for a while drawn aside, was now fully resolv'd not only not to betray him, but to defend him against all Enemies, as he had promis'd. This was said to be the cause why Edwin admonish'd by the Bishop of a sign which had befallen him so strangely, and as he thought so secretly, arose to him with that Reverence and Amazement, as to one sent from Heaven, to claim that promise of him which he perceiv'd well was due to a Divine Power that had assisted him in his troubles. To Paulinus therefore he makes answer, That the Christian Belief he himself ought by promise, and intended to receive; but would confer first with his chief Peers and Counsellors, that if they likewise could be won, all at once might be baptiz'd. They therefore being ask'd in Counsel what their Opinion was concerning this new Doctrine, and well perceiving which way the King inclin'd, every one hereafter shap'd his reply. The Chief Priest speaking first, discover'd an old Grudge he had against his Gods, for advancing others in the King's Favour above him their Chief Priest: Another hiding his Court-compliance with a grave sentence, commended the choice of certain, before uncertain, upon due examination; to like purpose answer'd all the rest of his Sages, none openly dissenting from what was likely to be the King's Creed: Whereas the Preaching of Paulinus could work no such effect upon them, toiling till that time without success. Whereupon Edwin renouncing Heathenism, became Christian: And the Pagan Priest offering himself freely to demolish the Altars of his former Gods, made some amends for his teaching to adore them. With Edwin, his two Sons, Osfrid and Eanfrid, born to him by Queenburga, Daughter, as saith Beda, of Kearle King of Mercia, in the time of his banishment, and with them most of the People, both Nobles and Commons, easily converted, were baptized^b; he with his whole Family at York, in a Church hastily built up of Wood, the multitude most part in Rivers. Northumberland thus christen'd, Paulinus crossing Humber, converted also the Province of Linsey, and Blecca the Governour of Lincoln, with his Household and most of that City; wherein he built a Church of Stone, curiously wrought, but of small continuance; for the Roof in Beda's time^c, uncertain whether by Neglect or Enemies, was down, the Walls only standing. Mean while in Mercia, Kearle a Kinsman of Wibba, saith Huntingdon, not a Son, having long withheld the Kingdom from Penda, Wibba's Son, left it now at length to the fiftieth Year of his Age: With whom Kineglis and Cuthelm, the West-Saxon Kings, two Year after, having by that time it seems recover'd strength, since the Inroad made upon them by Edwin, fought at Cirencester, then made Truce. But Edwin seeking every way to propagate the Faith, which with so much deliberation he had receiv'd, persuaded^d Eorpwald the Son of Redwald, King

^c On the Death of Redwald the East-Angles would have bestow'd their Kingdom on Edwin, but he out of Gratitude to his Benefactor Redwald permitted his Son Eorpwald to Reign as his Tributary. Beda, ch. 15.

A. D. 632. of East-Angles, to embrace the same Belief; willingly or in awe, is not known, retaining under Edwin the Name only of a King. But Eorpwald not long surviv'd his Conversion, slain in Fight by Richbert a Pagan: Whereby the People having lightly follow'd the Religion of their King, as lightly fell back to their old Superstitions for above three Years after: Edwin in the mean while, to his Faith adding Virtue, by the due administration of Justice, wrought such peace over all his Territories, that from Sea to Sea, Man or Woman might have travell'd in safety. His care also was of Fountains by the way-side, to make them fittest for the use of Travellers. And not unmindful of Regal State, whether in War or Peace, he had a Royal Banner carry'd before him. But having Reign'd with much Honour seventeen Years, he was at length by Kedwalla, or Cadwallo, King of the Britains, who with aid of the Mercian Pinda^a, had rebell'd against him, slain in a Battel with his Son Oswald, at a place call'd Hethfield^b, and his whole Army overthrown or dispers'd in the Year 633, and the 47th of his Age, in the Eye of Man worthy a more peaceful end. His Head brought to York, was there bury'd in the Church by him begun. Sad was this overthrow both to Church and State of the Northumbrians: For Penda being a Heathen, and the British King, though in name a Christian, yet in deeds more bloody than the Pagan, nothing was omitted of barbarous Cruelty in the slaughter of Sex or Age; Kedwalla threatening to root out the whole Nation, though then newly Christian. For the Britains, and, as Beda saith, even to his Days, accounted Saxon Christianity no better than Paganism, and with them held as little Communion. From these Calamities no refuge being left but flight, Paulinus taking with him Ethelburga the Queen and her Children, aided by Bassus, one of Edwin's Captains, made escape by Sea to Eadbald King of Kent: Who receiving his Sister with all kindness, made Paulinus Bishop of Rocheſter, where he ended his Days. After Edwin, the Kingdom of Northumberland became divided as before, each rightful Heir seizing his part; in Deira, Oswic the Son of Elfric, Edwin's Uncle, by profession a Christian, and baptiz'd by Paulinus; in Fernicia, Eanfrid the Son of Ethelfrid; who all the time of Edwin, with his Brother Oswald, and many of the young Nobility, liv'd in Scotland exil'd, and had been there taught and baptiz'd. No sooner had they gotten each a Kingdom, but both turn'd recreant, sliding back into their old Religion, and both were the same Year slain; Oswic by a sudden eruption of Kedwalla, whom he in a strong Town had unadvisedly besieg'd; Eanfrid seeking Peace, and inconsiderately with a few surrendering himself. Kedwalla now rang'd at will through both those Provinces, using cruelly his Conquest; when Oswald,^c the Brother of Eanfrid, with a small but Christian Army, unexpectedly coming on, defeated and destroy'd both him and his huge Forces, which he boasted to be invincible, by a little River running into Tine, near the antient Roman Wall then call'd Denisburn^d, the place afterwards Heaven-field, from the Croſs reported miraculous for Cures, which Oswald there erected before the Battel, in token of his Faith against the great number of his Enemies. Obtaining the Kingdom, he took care to instruct again the People in Christianity. Sending therefore to the Scotiſh Elders, Beda so terms them, among whom he had receiv'd Baptism, requested of them some faithful Teacher, who might again settle Religion in his Realm, which the late Troubles had impair'd; they as readily hearkning to his request, send Aidan, a Scotch Monk and Bishop, but of singular Zeal and Meekness, with others to assist him, whom at their own desire he seated in Lindisfarne, as the Episcopal Seat, now Holy Island: And being the Son of Ethelfrid, by the Sister of Edwin, as right Heir, others failing, easily reduc'd both Kingdoms of Northumberland as before into one; nor of Edwin's Dominion lost any part, but enlarg'd it rather, over all the four British Nations, Angles, Britains, Picts and Scots, exercising Regal Authority. Of his Devotion, Humility and Almshouses, much is spoken; that he disdain'd not to be the Interpreter of Aidan, preaching in Scotch or bad English, to his Nobles and Household Servants; and had the Poor continually serv'd at his Gate, after the promiscuous manner of those times: His Meaning might be upright, but the Manner more antient of Private or of Church Contribution, is doubtless more Evangelical. About this time the West-Saxons, antiently call'd Geiſſi, by the Preaching of Bevinus a Bishop, whom Pope Honorius had sent, were converted to the Faith with Kineglis their King: Him Oswald receiv'd out of the Font, and his Daughter in Marriage. The next Year Cuicelm was baptiz'd in Dorchester^e, but liv'd not to the Year's end. The East-Angles also this Year were reclaim'd to the Faith of Christ, which for some Years past they had thrown off. But Sigbert the Brother of Eorpwald now succeeded in that Kingdom, prais'd for a most Christian and Learned Man: Who while his Brother yet reign'd, living in France an exile for some Displeasure conceiv'd against him by Redwald his Father, learn'd there the Christian Faith; and reigning soon after, in the same instructed his People, by the Preaching of Felix^f a Burgundian Bishop. In the Year 640, Eadbald deceaſing, left to Ercombert his Son by Emma the French King's Daughter, the Kingdom of Kent; recorded the first of English Kings, who commanded through his Limits the destroy'ing of Idols; laudably, if all Idols to be without exception; and the first to have establish'd Lent among us, under strict penalty, not worth remembring, but only to inform us, that no Lent was observ'd here till his time by compulsion; especially being noted by some to have fraudulently usurp'd upon his Elder Brother Ermenred, whose right was Precedent to the Crown. Oswald having Reign'd eight Years, worthy also as might seem of longer Life^g, fell into the same Fate with Edwin, and from the same Hand, in a great Battel overcome and slain by Penda, at a place call'd Maserfeld, now Oswestre in Sbrop-Cambden shire, miraculous, as saith Beda, after his Death. His Brother Oswi succeeded him, Reigning, tho' in much trouble, twenty eight Years; oppos'd either by Penda, or his own Son Alfred, or his

About this time Sigebert, King of East-Angles, having learn'd in France, e're his coming to reign, the manner of their Schools, with the Assistance of some Teachers out of Kent, instituted a School here after the same Discipline, thought to be the University of Cambridge then first founded*: And at length weary of his Kingly Office, betook him to a Monastical Life; commending the Care of Government to his Kinsman Egric, who had sustain'd with him part of that Burthen before. It happen'd some Years after, that Penda made War on the East-Angles: They expecting a sharp Encounter, besought Sigebert, whom they esteem'd an expert Leader, with his Presence to confirm the Soldierly: And him refusing carried by force out of the Monastery into the Camp; where acting the Monk rather than the Captain, with a single Wand in his hand, he was slain with Egric, and his whole Army put to flight. Anna of the Royal Stock, as next in Right, succeeded; and hath the Praise of a vertuous and most Christian Prince. But Kenwalk the West-Saxon having married the Sister of Penda, and divorc'd her, was by him with more Appearance of a just Cause vanquish'd in Fight, and depriv'd of his Crown: Whence retiring to Anna King of the East-Angles, after three Years abode in his Court, he there became Christian, and afterwards regain'd his Kingdom. Oswi in the former Years of his Reign, had Sharer with him, Oswin Nephew of Edwin, who rul'd in Deira seven Years, commended much for his Zeal in Religion, and for Comeliness of Person, with other Princely Qualities, belov'd of all. Notwithstanding which, Dissentions growing between them, it came to Arms. Oswin seeing himself much exceeded in Numbers, thought it more Prudence, dismissing his Army, to reserve himself for some better Occasion. But committing his Person with one faithful Attendant to the Loyalty of Hunwald an Earl, his imagin'd Friend, he was by him treacherously discover'd and by Command of Oswi slain. After whom within twelve Days, and for Grief of him whose Death he foretold, dy'd Bishop Aidan, famous for his Charity, Meekness, and labour in the Gospel. The Fact of Oswi was detestable to all; which therefore to expiate, a Monastery was built in the Place where it was done, and Prayers there daily offer'd up for the Souls of both Kings, the slain and the Slayer. Kenwalk by this time re-install'd in his Kingdom, kept it long, but with various Fortune; for Beda relates him oft-times afflicted by his Enemies with great Losses: And in 652 by the Annals, fought a Battel (Civil War Ethelwerd calls it) at Bradanford by the River Asene; against whom, and for what Cause, or who had the Victory, they write not. Cambden names the Place Bradford in Wiltshire, by the River Avon, and Cuthred his near Kinsman, against whom he fought, but cites no Authority; certain it is, that Kenwalk four Years before had given large Possessions to his Nephew Cuthred, the more unlikely therefore now to have rebell'd. The next Year Peada, whom his Father Penda, though a Heathen, had for his Princely Vertues made Prince of Middle Angles, belonging to the Mercians, was with that People converted to the Faith. For coming to Oswi with Request to have in Marriage Alfreda his Daughter, he was deny'd her but on Condition, that he with all his People should receive Christianity. Hearing therefore not unwillingly what was preach'd to him of Resurrection and Eternal Life, much perswaded also by Alfrid the King's Son, who had his Sister Kyniburg to Wife, he easily assented, for the Truth's sake only, as he profess'd, whether he obtain'd the Virgin or no, and was baptiz'd with all his Followers. Returning, he took with him four Presbyters to teach the People of his Province; who by their daily preaching won many. Neither did Penda, though himself no Believer, prohibit any in his Kingdom to hear or believe the Gospel, but rather hated and despis'd those, who professing to believe, attested not their Faith by good Works; condemning them for miserable and justly to be despis'd, who obey not that God in whom they chuse to believe. How well might Penda, this Heathen, rise up in Judgment against many pretending Christians, both of his own and these Days! Yet being a Man bred up to War (as no less were others then reigning, and oft-times one against another, though both Christians) he warr'd on Anna, King of the East-Angles, perhaps without Cause, for Anna was esteem'd a just Man, and at length slew him. About this time the East-Saxons, who as above hath been said, had expell'd their Bishop Mellitus, and renounc'd the Faith, were by the means of Oswi thus reconverted. Sigebert, surnam'd the Small, being the Son of Seward, without other Memory of his Reign, left his Son King of that Province, after him Sigebert the Second, who coming often to visit Oswi his great Friend, was by him at several times fervently dissuaded from Idolatry, and convinc'd at length to forsake it, was there baptiz'd; on his return home, taking with him Kedda a laborious Preacher, afterwards made Bishop; by whose teaching with some help of others, the People were again recover'd from Misbelief. But Sigebert some Years* after, though standing fast in Religion, was by the Conspiracy of two Brethren in place near about him, wickedly murder'd; who being ask'd what mov'd them to do a Deed so heinous, gave no other than this barbarous Answer; That they were angry with him for being so gentle to his Enemies, as to forgive them their Injuries whenever they besought him. Yet his Death seems to have happen'd not without some Cause by him given of Divine Displeasure. For one of those Earls who slew him, living in unlawful Wedlock, and therefore excommunicated so severely by the Bishop, that no Man might presume to enter into his House, much less to sit at Meat with him, the King not regarding this Church Censure, went to feast with him at his Invitation. Whom the Bishop meeting in his return, though penitent for what he had done, and fall'n at his Feet, touch'd with the Rod in his Hand, and angerly thus foretold: Because thou hast neglected to abstain from the House of that Excommunicate, in that House thou shalt die: And so it fell out, perhaps from that Prediction, God bearing Witness to his Minister in the Power of Church Discipline, spiritually executed, not juridically on the Contemner thereof. This Year 655 prov'd fortunate to Oswi, and fatal to Penda, for Oswi by the continual Inroads of Penda, having long endur'd much Devastation, to the endangering once by Assault and Fire Bebbanburg, his strongest City, now Banborrow Castle, unable to resist

* Beda says, 'twas a little desolate City in his time, and takes no notice of it as an University, Anno 700. Robert of Remington writes, that in the Reign of Edward the First, Grants-Bridge or Cambridge, from a School was made an University like Oxford. Cambd. Tit. Cambr.

Which not accepted by the Pagan, who intended nothing but Destruction to that King, though more than once in Affinity with him, turning Gifts into Vows, he implores Divine Assistance, devoting, if he were deliver'd from his Enemy, a Child of one Year old, his Daughter to be a Nun, and twelve Portions of Land whereon to build Monasteries. His Vows, as may be thought, found better Success than his proffer'd Gifts; for hereupon with his Son Alfrid, gathering a small Power, he encounter'd and discomfited the Mercians, thirty times exceeding his in Number, and led on by expert Captains; at a Place call'd Loydes, now Leeds in Yorkshire. Besides this Ethelwald, the Son of Ofwald, who rul'd in Deira, took part with the Mercians, but in the Fight withdrew his Forces, and in a safe Place expected the Event: With which unseasonable retreat, the Mercians perhaps terrifi'd and misdoubting more Danger, fled; their Commanders, with Penda himself, most being slain, among whom Edelbere the Brother of Anna, who rul'd after him the East-Angles, and was the Author of this War; many more flying were drown'd in the River, which Beda calls Winwed, then swell'n above his Banks. The Death of Penda, who had been the Death of so many good Kings, made general rejoicing, as the Song witness'd. At the River Winwed, Anna was aveng'd. To Edelbere succeeded Ethelwald his Brother, in the East-Angles; to Sigebert in the East-Saxons, Suidhelm the Son of Sexbald, faith Beda, the Brother of Sigebert, faith Malmsbury; he was baptiz'd by Kedda, then residing in the East-Angles, and by Ethelwald the King, receiv'd out of the Font. But Ofwi in the Strength of his late Victory, within three Years after subdu'd all Mercia, and of the Pictish Nation greatest part, at which time he gave to Penda his Son-in-Law the Kingdom of South-Mercia, divided from the Northern by Trent. But Penda the Spring following, as was said, by the Treason of his Wife the Daughter of Ofwi, married by him for a special Christian, on the Feast of Easter, not protected by the holy time, was slain. The Mercian Nobles, Immin, Eaba, and Eadbert, throwing off the Government of Ofwi, set up Wulfer the other Son of Penda to be their King, whom till then they had kept hid, and with him adhered to the Christian Faith. Kenwalk the West-Saxon, now settl'd at home, and desirous to enlarge his Dominion, prepares against the Britains, joins Battel with them at Pen in Somersetshire, and overcoming pursues them to Pedridan. Another Fight he had with them before, at a Place call'd Witgeornesbrug, barely mention'd by the Monk of Malmsbury. Nor was it long ere he fell at Variance with Wulfer the Son of Penda, his old Enemy, scarce yet warm in his Throne, fought with him at Possentesburg, on the Easter Holydays, and as Ethelwerd faith, took him Prisoner; but the Saxon Annals, quite otherwise, that Wulfer winning the Field, wasted the West-Saxon Country as far as Eskefdun; nor staying there, took and wasted the Isle of Wight, but causing the Inhabitants to be baptiz'd, till then Unbelievers, gave the Island to Ethelwald King of the South-Saxons, whom he had receiv'd out of the Font^a. The Year 664. a Synod of Scotch and English Bishops, in the Presence of Ofwi and Alfred his Son, was held at a Monastery in those Parts*, to debate upon what Day Easter should be kept; a Controversie which long before had disturb'd the Greek and Latin Churches: Wherein the Scots not agreeing with the way of Rome, nor yielding to the Disputants on that side, to whom the King most inclin'd, such as were Bishops here, resign'd, and return'd home with their Disciples. Another Clerical Question was there also much controverted, not so superstitious in my Opinion as ridiculous, about the right shav- ing of Crowns. The same Year was seen an Eclipse of the Sun in May, followed by a fore Pe- stilence beginning in the South, but spreading to the North, and over all Ireland with great Mor- tality. In which time the East-Saxons after Sni- thelm's decease, being govern'd by Siger the Son of Sigebert the Small, and Sebbi of Seward, though both subject to the Mercians. Siger and his Peo- ple unsteady of Faith, supposing that this Plague was come upon them for renouncing their old Religion, fell off the second time to Infidelity. Which the Mercian King Wulfer understanding, sent Jerumannus a faithful Bishop, who with other his Fellow Labourers, by sound Doctrine and gentle dealing, soon recur'd them of their second Relapse. In Kent, Ercombert expiring, was succeeded by his Son Ecbert. In whose fourth Year by means of Theodore, a Learned Greekish Monk of Tarsus, whom Pope Vitalian had ordain'd Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Greek and Latin Tongue, with other Liberal Arts, Arith- metick, Musick, Astronomy, and the like; be- gan first to flourish among the Saxons; as did also the whole Land, under Potent and Religi- ous Kings, more than ever before, as Beda af- firms, till his own Days. Two Years after, in Northumberland dy'd Ofwi, much addicted to Romish Rites, and resolv'd, had his Disease re- leas'd him, to have ended his Days at Rome: Ecfred the eldest of his Sons begot in Wedlock, succeeded him. After other three Years, Ecbert in Kent deceasing, left nothing memorable be- hind him, but the general Suspicion to have slain or conniv'd at the Slaughter of his Un- cles: two Sons, Elbert, and Egelbright. In Re- compence whereof, he gave to the Mother of them part of Tanet, wherein to build an Abbey; the Kingdom fell to his Brother Lorbair. And much about this time, by best Account it should be, however plac'd in Beda, that Ecfred of Northumberland, having War with the Mercian Wulfer, won from him Lindsey, and the Country there- about. Sebbi having reign'd over the East-Sax- ons thirty Years, not long before his Death, though long before desiring, took on him the Habit of a Monk; and drew his Wife at length, though unwilling, to the same Devotion. Ken- walk also dying, left the Government to Sex- burga his Wife, who out-liv'd him in it but one Year, driven out, faith Mat. West. by the No- bles, disdaining Female Government. After whom several petty Kings, as Beda calls them, for ten Years space divided the West-Saxons; others name two, Efscwin the Nephew of Kini- gils, and Kentwin the Son, not petty by their Deeds: For Efscwin fought a Battel with Wulfer, at Bedanbasde, and about a Year after both deceas'd; but Wulfer not without a Stain left be- hind him, of selling the Bishoprick of London, to Wini the first Simonist we read of in this Sto- ry; Kenwalk had before expell'd him from his Chair at Winchester; Ethelfred the Brother of Wulfer obtaining next the Kingdom of Mercia,

A. D. 676. not only recover'd Lindsey, and what besides in those Parts Wulfer had lost to Ecfrið some Years before, but found himself strong enough to extend his Arms another way, as far as Kent, wasting that Country without respect to Church or Monastery, much also endamaging the City of Rocheſter: Notwithstanding what Resistance Lothair could make against him. In August 678. was seen a Morning Comet for three Months following, in manner of a fiery Pillar. And the South-Saxons about this time were converted to the Christian Faith, upon this Occasion. Wilfrid Bishop of the Northumbrians entring into Contention with Ecfrið the King, was by him depriv'd of his Bishoprick, and long wandering up and down as far as Rome, return'd at length into England, but not daring to approach the North, whence he was banish'd, bethought him where he might to best purpose elsewhere exercise his Ministry. The South of all other Saxons remain'd yet Heathen; but Edelwalk their King not long before had been baptiz'd in Mercia, persuaded by Wulfer, and by him, as hath been said, receiv'd out of the Font. For which Relation's sake he had the Isle of Wight, and a Province of the Meauuari adjoining, given him on the Continent about Meaneſborow in Hantsſhire, which Wulfer had a little before gotten from Kenwalk. Thither Wilfrid takes his Journey, and with the help of other Spiritual Labourers about him, in short time planted there the Gospel. It had not rain'd, as is said, of three Years before in that Country, whence many of the People daily perish'd by Famine; till on the first Day of their publick Baptism, soft and plentiful Showers descending, restor'd all Abundance to the Summer following. Two Years after this, Kentwin the other West-Saxon King above-nam'd, chac'd the Welch-Britains, as is Chronicl'd without Circumstance, to the very Sea Shoar. But in the Year, by Beda's reck'ning, 682, Kedwalla a West-Saxon of the Royal Line (whom the Welch will have to be Cadwallader, last King of the Britains) thrown out by Faction, return'd from Banishment, and invaded both Kentwin, if then living, or whoever else had divided the Succession of Kenwalk, slaying in Fight Edelwalk the South-Saxon, who oppos'd him in their Aid; but soon after was repuls'd by two of his Captains, Bertune, and Andune, who for a while held the Province in their Power. But Kedwalla gathering new Force, with the Slaughter of Bertune, and also of Edric the Successor of Edelwalk, won the Kingdom: But reduc'd the People to heavy Thralldom. Then addressing to conquer the Isle of Wight, till that time Pagan, saith Beda (others otherwise, as above hath been related) made a Vow, though himself yet unbaptiz'd, to devote the fourth part of that Island, and the Spoils thereof, to holy Uses. Conquest obtain'd, paying his Vow as then was the Belief, he gave his fourth to Bishop Wilfrid, by chance there present; and he to Bertwin a Priest, his Sister's Son, with Commission to baptize all the vanquish'd, who meant to save their Lives. But the two young Sons of Arnald, King of that Island, met with much more Hostility; for they at the Enemies approach flying out of the Isle, and betray'd where they were hid not far from thence, were led to Kedwalla, who lay then under Cure of some Wounds receiv'd, and by his Appointment, after Instruction and Baptism, first given them, harshly put to Death, which the Youths are said above their Age to have Christianly suffer'd. In Kent, Lothair dy'd this Year of his Wounds receiv'd in Fight against the South-Saxons, led on by Edric, who descending from Ermenred, it seems challeng'd the Crown; and wore it, though not commendably, one Year and a half: But coming to a violent Death, left the Land expos'd a Prey either to home-bred Usurpers, or Neighbouring Invaders. Among whom Kedwalla, taking Advantage from their Civil Distempers, and marching easily through the South-Saxons, whom he had subdu'd, sorely harraſs'd the Country, untouch'd of long time by any Hostile Incursion. But the Kentish Men, all Parties uniting against a Common Enemy, with joyn't Power so oppos'd him, that he was constrain'd to retire back; his Brother Mollo in the Fight with twelve Men of his Company, seeking Shelter in a House, was beset and therein burnt by the Pursuers: Kedwalla much troubl'd at so great a Loss, recalling and soon rallying his disordered Forces, return'd fiercely upon the chafing Enemy; nor could be got out of the Province, till both by Fire and Sword, he had aveng'd the Death of his Brother. At length Vitred the Son of Ecbert, attaining the Kingdom, both settl'd at home all things in Peace, and secur'd his Borders from all outward Hostility. While thus Kedwalla disquieted both West and East, after his winning the Crown, Ecfrið the Northumbrian, and Ethelfied the Mercian, fought a fore Battel by the River Trent; wherein Elfwine Brother to Ecfrið, a Youth of eighteen Years, much belov'd, was slain; and the Accident likely to occasion much more shedding of Blood, Peace was happily made by the grave Exhortation of Arch-bishop Theodore, a Pecuniary Fine only paid to Ecfrið, as some Satisfaction for the Loss of his Brother's Life. Another Adversity befel Ecfrið in his Family, by means of Etheldrith his Wife, King Anna's Daughter, who having taken him for her Husband, and professing to love him above all other Men, persisted twelve Years in the obstinate Refusal of his Bed, thereby thinking to live the purer Life. So perversly then was Chastity instructed against the Apostles Rule. At length obtaining of him with much Importunity her Departure, she veild her self a Nun, then made Abbess of Ely, dy'd seven Years after the Pestilence; and might with better Warrant have kept faithfully her undertaken Wedlock, though now canoniz'd St. Audrey of Ely. In the mean while Ecfrið had sent Bertus with a Power to subdue Ireland, a harmless Nation, saith Beda, and ever friendly to the English; in both which they seem to have left a Posterity much unlike them at this Day: Miserably wasted, without regard had to Places hallowed or profane, they betook them partly to their Weapons, partly to implore Divine Aid; and, as was thought, obtain'd it in their full Avengement upon Ecfrið, for he the next Year, against the Mind and Persuasion of his sagest Friends, and especially of Cudbert, a famous Bishop of that Age, marching unadvisedly against the Picts, who long before had been subject to Northumberland, was by them, feigning flight, drawn unawares into narrow Streights overtopped with Hills, and cut off with most of his Army. From which time, saith Beda, Military Valour began among the Saxons to decay, nor only the Picts till then peaceable, but some part of the Britains also recover'd by Arms their Liberty for many Years after. Yet Aldfrid elder, but base Brother to Ecfrið, a Man said to be learned in the Scriptures, recall'd from Ireland, to which Place in his Brother's Reign he had retir'd, and now succeeding, upheld with much Honour, though in narrower Bounds, the residue of his Kingdom: Kedwalla having now with great disturbance of his

D. 686. his Neighbours, Reign'd over the West-Saxons two Years, besides what time he spent in gaining it, weary'd perhaps with his own turbulence, went to Rome, desirous there to receive Baptism, which till then his worldly Affairs had deferr'd; and accordingly on Easter-day 689, he was baptiz'd by Sergius the Pope, and his Name chang'd to Peter. All which notwithstanding, surpriz'd with a Disease, he out-liv'd not the Ceremony so far fought, much above the space of five weeks, in the thirtieth Year of his Age, and in the Church of St. Peter was there bury'd, with a large Epitaph upon his Tomb. Him succeeded Ina of the Royal Family, and from the time of his coming in, for many Years oppress'd the Land with like Grievances, as Keatwalla had done before him, insomuch that in those times there was no Bishop among them. His first Expedition was into Kent, to demand satisfaction for the burning of Mollo: Vitred, loth to hazard all for the rash Act of a few, deliver'd up thirty of those that could be found accessory; or, as others say, pacify'd Ina with a great Sum of Money^b. Mean while, at the incitement of Ecbert, a devout Monk, Wilbrod a Priest, eminent for Learning, pass'd over Sea, having twelve others in Company, with intent to preach the Gospel in Germany. And coming to Pepin, chief Regent of the Franks, who a little before had conquer'd the hither Frisia, by his Countenance and Protection, promise also of many benefits to them who should believe, they found the Work of Conversion much the easier, and Wilbrod the first Bishop in that Nation^c. But two Priests, each of them Hewald by Name, and for distinction furnam'd from the Colour of their Hair, the Black and the White, by his Example, piously affected to the Souls of their Countrymen the old Saxons, at their coming thither to convert them, met with much worse entertainment. For in the House of a Farmer, who had promis'd to convey them, as they desir'd, to the Governour of that Country, discover'd by their daily Ceremonies to be Christian Priests, and the cause of their coming suspected, they were by him and his Heathen Neighbours cruelly butcher'd; yet not unaveng'd, for the Governour enrag'd at such Violence offer'd to his Strangers, sending arm'd Men, slew all those Inhabitants, and burnt their Village.

697. After three Years in Mercia, Ofred the Queen, Wife to Ethelred, was kill'd by her own Nobles, as Beda's Epitome records; Florence calls them Southumbrians, negligently omitting the Cause of so strange a Fact. And the Year following, Bertred, a Northumbrian General, was slain by the Picts. Ethelred, seven Years after the violent Death of his Queen, put on the^d Monk, and resign'd his Kingdom to Kenred the Son of Wulfer his Brother. The next Year, Aldfrid in Northumberland dy'd, leaving Ofred a Child of eight Years to succeed him. Four Years after which, Kenred having a while with praise govern'd the Mercian Kingdom, went to Rome in the time of Pope Constantine, and shorn a Monk spent there the residue of his Days. Kelred succeeded him, the Son of Ethelred, who had reign'd the next before.

With Kenred went Offa the Son of Siger, King of A. D. East-Saxons, and betook him to the same Habit, 709. leaving his Wife and Native Country; a comely Person in the prime of his Youth, much desir'd of the People; and such his Virtue, by report, as might have otherwise been worthy to have reign'd. Ina the West-Saxon one Year after fought a Battel, 710. at first doubtful, at last successful, against Gerent King of Wales. The next Year Bertfrid, another Northumbrian Captain, fought with the Picts, and slaughter'd them, saith Huntingdon, to the full avengement of Ecfrid's Death. The fourth Year after, Ina had another doubtful and cruel Battel 715. at Wodnesburg in Wiltshire, with Kelred the Mercian, who dy'd the Year following a lamentable Death: 716. For as he sat one day feasting with his Nobles, suddenly possess'd with an Evil Spirit, he expir'd in despair, as Boniface Archbishop of Mentz, an Englishman, who taxes him for a defiler of Nuns, writes by way of caution to Ethelbald, his next of kin, who succeeded him. Ofred also the young Northumbrian King, slain by his Kindred in the eleventh of his Reign, for his vicious Life and Incest committed with Nuns; was by Kenred succeeded and aveng'd. He Reigning two Years, left Ofric in his room. In whose seventh Year, if Beda calculate right, Vitred King of Kent deceas'd, having reign'd thirty four Years, and some part of them with Suebbard, as Beda testifies. He left behind him three Sons, Ethelbert, Eadbert, and Alric his Heirs^e. Three Years after which, appear'd two Comets about the Sun, terrible to behold, the one before him in the Morning, the other after him in the Evening, for the space of two Weeks in January, bending their Blaze toward the North; at which time the Saracens furiously invaded France, but were expell'd soon after with great overthrow. The same Year in Northumberland, Ofric dying or slain, adopted Kelwulf the Brother of Kenred his Successor, to whom Beda dedicates his Story; but writes this only of him, that the beginning and the process of his Reign met with many adverse Commotions, whereof the event was then doubtfully expected. Mean while Ina seven Years before having slain Kenwulf, to whom Florent gives the addition of Clito, given usually to none but of the Blood Royal, and the fourth Year after overthrown and slain Albright another Clito, driven from Taunton to the South-Saxons for aid, vanquish'd also the East-Angles in more than one Battel, as Malmshury writes, but not the Year, whether to expiate so much Blood, or infected with the contagious Humour of those Times, Malmshury saith, at the persuasion of Ethelburga his Wife, went to Rome, and there ended his Days; yet this praise left behind him, to have made good Laws, the first of Saxon that remain extant to this day, and to his Kinsman Edelard, bequeath'd the Crown: No less than the whole Monarchy of England and Wales. For Ina, if we believe a digression in the Laws of Edward Confessor, was the first King crown'd of English and British, since the Saxon entrance; of the British by means of his second Wife, some way related to Cadwallader last King of Wales, which I had not noted, being unlikely,

A. D. 731. but for the place where I found it*. After Ina, by a surer Author, Ethelwald King of Mercia commanded all the Provinces on this side Humber, with their Kings; the Picts were in League with the English, the Scots peaceable within their bounds, and the Britains part were in their own Government, part subject to the English. In which peaceful state of the Land, many in Northumberland, both Nobles and Commons, laying aside the exercise of Arms, betook them to the Cloister: And not content so to do at home, many in the Days of Ina, Clerks and Laicks, Men and Women, hasting to Rome in Herds, thought themselves no where sure of Eternal Life, till they were cloister'd there. Thus representing the state of things in this Island, Beda surceas'd to write. Out of whom chiefly hath been gather'd, since the Saxons arrival, such as hath been deliver'd, a scatter'd Story pick'd out here and there, with some trouble and tedious work from among his many Legends of Visions and Miracles; toward the latter end so bare of Civil Matters, as what can be thence collected may seem a Kalendar rather than a History, taken up for the most part with Succession of Kings, and Computation of Years, yet those hard to be reconcil'd with the Saxon Annals. Their Actions, we read of, were most commonly Wars, but for what Cause wag'd, or by what Counsels carry'd on, no care was had to let us know: Whereby their Strength and Violence we understand, of their Wisdom, Reason, or Justice, little or nothing, the rest Superstition and Monastical Affectation; Kings, one after another, leaving their Kingly Charge, to run their Heads fondly into a Monk's Cowle: Which leaves us uncertain, whether Beda was wanting to his Matter, or his Matter to him. Yet from hence to the Danish Invasion it will be worse with us, destitute of Beda. Left only to obscure and blockish Chronicles; whom Malmshury and Huntingdon, (for neither they than we had better Authors of those times) ambitious to adorn the History, make no scruple oft-times, I doubt, to interline with Conjectures and Surmises of their own: Them rather than imitate, I shall choose to represent the Truth naked, though as lean as a plain Journal. Yet William of Malmshury must be acknowledg'd, both for Stile and Judgment, to be by far the best Writer of them all: But what labour is to be endur'd, turning over Volumes of Rubbish in the rest, Florence of Worcester, Huntingdon, Simeon of Durham, Hoveden, Matthew of Westminster, and many others of obscurer note, with all their Monachisms, is a penance to think. Yet these are our only Registers, Transcribers one after another for the most part, and sometimes worthy enough for the things they register. This travel rather than not know at once what may be known of our Antient Story, sifted from Fables and Impertinences, I voluntarily undergo; and to save others, if they please, the like unpleasing labour; except those who take pleasure to be all their Life-time raking in the Foundations of old Abbies and Cathedrals: But to my Task now as it befalls. In the Year 733. on the 18th Kalends of September, was an Eclipse of the Sun about the third Hour of day, obscuring almost his whole Orb, as with a black Shield^b. Ethelwald of Mercia besieg'd and took the Castle or Town of Somerton: And two Years after, Beda our Historian dy'd, some say the Year before. Felwulf in Northumberland three Years after became Monk in Lindisfarne, yet none of the severest; for he brought those Monks from Milk and Water, to Wine and Ale; in which Doctrine no doubt but they were soon docile; and well might, for Kelwulf brought with him good Provision, great Treasure and Revenues of Land, recited by Simeon, yet all under pretence of following (I use the Author's words) poor Christ, by voluntary Poverty: No marvel then if such applause were given by Monkish Writers to Kings turning Monks, and much Cunning perhaps us'd to allure them. To Eadbert, his Uncle's Son, he left the Kingdom, whose Brother Ethbert, Archbishop of York, built a Library there. But two Years after, while Eadbert was busy'd in War against the Picts, Ethelwald the Mercian, by foul fraud, assaulted part of Northumberland in his absence, as the Supplement of Beda's Epitomy records. In the West-Saxons, Elelard who succeeded Ina, having been much molested in the beginning of his Reign, with the Rebellion of Ofwald his Kinsman, who contended with him for the Right of Succession; overcoming at last those Troubles, dy'd in Peace 741, leaving Cuthred one of the same Lineage to succeed him: Who at first had much War with Ethelwald the Mercian, and various success, but joining with him in League two Years after, made War on the Welsh: Huntingdon doubts not to give them a great Victory. And Simeon reports, another Battel fought between Britains and Picts the Year ensuing. Now was the Kingdom of East-Saxons drawing to a Period; for Sigeward and Senfred, the Sons of Sebbi, having reign'd a while, and after them young Offa, who soon quitted his Kingdom to go to Rome with Kenred, as hath been said, the Government was conferr'd on Selred Son of Sigebert the Good, who having rul'd thirty eight Years, came to a violent Death; how or wherefore, is not set down. After whom Switbred was the last King, driven out by Ecbert the West-Saxon: But London, with the Countries adjacent, obey'd the Mercians till they also were dissolv'd. Cuthred had now reign'd about nine Years, when Kenric his Son a valiant young Prince, was in military tumult slain by his own Soldiers. The same Year Eadbert dying in Kent, his Brother Ethilbert reign'd in his stead. But after two Years, the other Eadbert in Northumberland, whose War with the Picts hath been above mention'd, made now such progress there, as to subdue Kyle^c, so saith the Auctary of Beda, and other Countries thereabout, to his dominion; while Cuthred the West-Saxon had a Fight with Ethelbun, one of his Nobles, a stout Warriour, envy'd by him in some matter of the Commonwealth, as far as by the Latin of Ethelwerd can be understood, (others interpret it Sedition) and with much ado overcoming, took Ethelbun for his Valour into Favour, by whom faithfully serv'd in the twelfth or thirteenth of his Reign, he encounter'd in a set Battel with Ethelwald the Mercian at Beonford, now Burford in Oxfordshire; one Year after against the Welsh, which was the last but one of his Life. Huntingdon, as his manner is to comment upon the Annal Text, makes a terrible Description of that Fight between Cuthred and may likely be to read of so many bare and reasonless Actions, so many Names of Kings one after another, acting little more than mute Persons in a Scene: What would it be to have swelling my Authors each to a voluminous Bo-

 the unfortunate end of Kinwulf the West-Saxon; who having laudably reign'd about thirty one Years, yet suspecting that Kineard Brother of Sigebert the former King, intended to usurp the Crown after his Decease, or revenge his Brother's Expulsion, had commanded him into Banish- Sax. An.

 by Night and beset the Place. Kenwulf overconfident either of his Royal Presence, or per-him, runs fiercely at Kineard, and wounds him fore, but by his Followers hem'd in, is kill'd among them. The Report of so great an Acciself surrounded, with fair Words and Promise of great Gifts, attempted to appease them; but

Not better was the end of Elfwald in Northumberland, two Years after slain miserably by the Conspiracy of Siggar, one of his Nobles, others say of the whole People at Seilcester by the Roman Wall; yet undeservedly, as his Sepulchre at Hazulstall, now Hexham upon Tine, and some Miracles there said to be done, are alledg'd to witness; and Siggar five Years after laid violent hands on himself. Ofred, Son of Alcred, advanced into the room of Elfwald, and within one Year driven out, left his Seat vacant to Ethelred Son of Mollo, who after ten Years of Banishment (Imprisonment, saith Alcuin) had the Scepter put again into his hand. The third Year of Birtbri King of West-Saxons, gave beginning from abroad to a new and fatal Revolution of Calamity on this Land. For three Danish Ships, the first that had been seen here of that Nation arriving in the West, to visit these, as was suppos'd, Foreign Merchants, the King's Gatherer of Customs taking Horse from Dorchester, found them Spies and Enemies. For being commanded to come and give account of their lading at the King's Custom-House, they slew him and all who came with him; as an earnest of the many Slaughters, Rapines, and Hostilities, which they return'd not long after to commit over all the Island. Of this Danish first Arrival, and on a sudden worse than Hostile Aggression, the Danish History far otherwise relates, as if their landing had been at the Mouth of Humber, and their spoilful March far into the Country; tho' soon repell'd by the Inhabitants, they hasted back as fast to their Ships: But from what Cause, what Reason of State, what Authority or Public Council the Invasion proceeded, makes not mention, and our Wonder yet the more, by telling us that Sigefrid then King in Denmark, and long after, was a Man studious more of Peace and Quiet than of Warlike Matters. These therefore seem rather to have been some Wanderers at Sea, who with publick Commission, or without, through Love of Spoil, or Hatred of Christianity, seeking Booties on any Land of Christians, came by Chance or Weather on this Shoar. The next Year Ofred in Northumberland, who driven out by his Nobles had given place to Ethelred, was taken and forcibly shaven a Monk at Tork. And the Year after, Oelf, and Oelfwin, Sons of Elfwald, formerly King, formerly King, were drawn by fair Promises from the Principal Church of Tork, and after by Command of Ethelred, cruelly put to Death at Wondremere, a Village by the great Pool in Lancashire, now call'd Winandermere*. Nor was the third Year less bloody; for Ofred, who not liking a shaven Crown, had desired Banishment and obtain'd it, returning from the Isle of Man with small Forces, at the secret but deceitful Call of certain Nobles, who by Oath had promis'd to assist him, was also taken, and by Ethelred dealt with in the same manner; who the better to avouch his Cruelties, thereupon married Elfred the Daughter of Offa: For in Offa was found as little Faith or Mercy. He the same Year having drawn to his Palace Ethelbrite King of East-Angles, with fair Invitations to marry his Daughter, caus'd him to be there inhospitably beheaded, and his Kingdom wrongfully seiz'd, by the wicked Counsel of his Wife, saith Malin. A. D. 792. West, annexing thereto a long unlikely Tale. For which Violence and Bloodshed to make Attainment, with Fryars at least, he bestows the Reliques of St. Alban, in a Shrine of Pearl and Gold. Far worse it fard the next Year with the Reliques in Lendisfarne; where the Danes landing, pillag'd that Monastery, and of Fryars kill'd some, carried away others Captive, sparing neither Priest nor Lay: Which many strange Thunders and fiery Dragons, with other Impressions in the Air seen frequently before, were judg'd to fore signify. This Year Alric third Son of Vithred, ended in Kent his long Reign of thirty four Years. With him ended the Race of Hengist: Thenceforth whomsoever Wealth or Faction advanc'd, took on him the Name and State of a King. The Saxon Annals of 784. name Ealmond then reigning in Kent; but that consists not with the time of Alric, and I find him no where else mention'd. The Year following was remarkable for the Death of Offa the Mercian, a strenuous and subtle King; he had much intercourse with Charles the Great, at first Enmity, to the interdicting of Commerce on either side, at length much Amity and firm League, as appears by the Letter of Charles himself yet extant, procur'd by Alcuin a learned and prudent Man, though a Monk, whom the Kings of England in those Days had sent Orator into France, to maintain good Correspondence between them and Charles the Great. He granted, saith Huntingdon, a perpetual Tribute to the Pope, out of every House in his Kingdom; for yielding perhaps to translate the Primacy of Canterbury to Lichfield in his own Dominion. He drew a Trench of wondrous length between Mercia and the British Confines, from Sea to Sea. Egferth the Son of Offa, a Prince of great Hope, who also had been crown'd nine Years before his Father's Decease, restoring to the Church what his Father had seiz'd on: Yet within four Months by a Sickness ended his Reign. And to Kenulf next in right of the same Progeny bequeath'd his Kingdom. Mean while the Danish Pirates who still wast'd Northumberland, ventring on Shoar to spoil another Monastery at the Mouth of the River Don, were assail'd by the English, their Chief Captain slain on the Place; then returning to Sea, were most of them ship-wrack'd; others driven again on Shoar, were put all to the Sword. Simeon attributes this their Punishment to the Power of St. Cuthbert, offended with them for the rifling of his Covent. Two Years after this, dy'd Ethelred twice King, but not exempted at last from the Fate of many his Predecessors, miserably slain by his People, some say deservedly, as not unconscious with them who train'd Ofred to his Ruine. Osbal, a Nobleman, exalted to the Throne, and in less than a Month, deserted and expelled, was forc'd to fly at last from Lendisfarne by Sea to the Pictish King, and dy'd an Abbot. Eardulf whom Ethelred six Years before had commanded to be put to Death at Ripon, before the Abbey-Gate, dead as was suppos'd, and with solemn Dirge carried into the Church, after Midnight found there alive, I read not how, then banish'd, now recall'd was in Tork created King. In Kent, Ethelbert or Pren, whom the Annals call

* Cambden, in his Brit. Tit. Devonshire, tells us, that the Danes first landed at Teignmouth in that County: Now Tinmouth, a Fisher-Town, which was burnt by the French in the last War.

^b He assisted Charlemagne in his Founding the University of Paris.

^c Call'd Offa's Dyke, about 90 Miles long, says Mr. Cambden.

^d From the Mouth of Dee to that of the River Wye. Mr. Lloyd, in his Additions to Wales (in the late Edition of Cambden) has set down the exact Course of it, Page 587.

A. D. Eadbright (so different they often are one from another, both in Timing and in Naming) by some means having usurp'd Regal Power, after two Years Reign contending with Kenulf the Mercian, was by him taken Prisoner, and soon after, out of pious Commiseration, let go: But not receiv'd of his own, what became of him, Malmfbury leaves in doubt. Simeon writes, that Kenulf commanded to put out his Eyes, and lop off his Hands; but whether the Sentence were executed or not, is left as much in doubt by his want of expression. The second Year after this, they in Northumberland who had conspir'd against Ethelred, now also raising War against Eardulf, under Wada their Chief Captain, after much havoc on either side at Langbo, by Wdaley in Lancashire, the Conspirators at last flying, Eardulf return'd with Victory. The same Year London, with a great multitude of her Inhabitants, by a sudden Fire was consum'd. The Year 800 made way for great alteration in England, uniting her seven Kingdoms into one, by Ecbert the famous West-Saxon; him Birtric dying Childless left next to Reign, the only Survivor of that Lineage, descended from Inegild the Brother of King Ina. And according to his Birth liberally bred, he began early from his Youth to give signal hopes of more than ordinary Worth growing up in him; which Birtric fearing, and withal his juster Title to the Crown, secretly sought his Life, and Ecbert perceiving, fled to Offa the Mercian: But he having marry'd Eadburg his Daughter to Birtric, easily gave ear to his Ambassadors coming to require Ecbert: He again put to his shifts, escap'd thence into France; but after three Years banishment there, which perhaps contributed much to his Education, Charles the Great then Reigning, he was call'd over by the Publick Voice (for Birtric was newly dead) and with general applause Created King of West-Saxons. The same day Ethelmund at Kimmeresford, passing over with the Worcestershire Men, was met by Woolstan another Nobleman with those of Wiltshire, between whom happen'd a great Fray, wherein the Wiltshire Men overcame, but both Dukes were slain; no reason of their Quarrel written. Such Bickerings to recount, met often in these our Writers; what more Worth is it than to Chronicle the Wars of Kites or Crows flocking and fighting in the Air? The Year following, Eardulf the Northumbrian, leading forth an Army against Kenulf the Mercian, for harbouring certain of his Enemies, by the diligent mediation of other Princes and Prelates, Arms were laid aside, and Amity soon sworn between them. But Eadburga the Wife of Birtric, a Woman every way wicked, in Malice especially cruel, could not or car'd not to appease the general hatred justly conceiv'd against her; accusom'd in her Husband's days to accuse any whom she spighted; and not prevailing to his ruine, her Practice was by Poison secretly to contrive his Death. It fortun'd that the King her Husband, lighting on a Cup which she had temper'd, not for him, but for one of his great Favourites, whom she could not harm by accusing, sip'd thereof only, and in a while after still pining away, ended his Days; the Favourite drinking deeper, found speedier the Operation. She fearing to be question'd for these Facts, with what Treasure she had, pass'd over

Sea to Charles the Great, whom with rich Gifts coming to his presence the Emperor courtly receiv'd with this pleasant Proposal: Choose, Eadburga, which of us two thou wilt, me or my Son, (for his Son stood by him) to be thy Husband: She, no dissembler of what she lik'd best, made easie answer. Were it in my choice, I should choose of the two your Son rather, as the younger Man. To whom the Emperor, between jest and earnest, Hadst thou chosen me, I had bestow'd on thee my Son; but since thou hast chosen him, thou shalt have neither him nor me. Nevertheless he assign'd her a rich Monastery to dwell in as Abbess; for that Life, it may seem, she chose next to profess: But being a while after detected of Unchastity with one of her Followers, she has commanded to depart thence; from that time wandring poorly up and down with one Servant, in Pavia a City of Italy, she finish'd at last in Beggary her shameful Life. In the Year 805, Cutbred, whom Kenulf the Mercian had, instead of Pren, made King in Kent, having obscurely Reign'd eight Years, deceas'd. In Northumberland, Eardulf the Year following was driven out of his Realm by Alfwold, who Reign'd two Years in his room; after whom Eayred, Son of Eardulf, thirty three Years. But I see not how this can stand with the sequel of Story out of better Authors: Much less that which Buchanan relates the Year following of Acaius King of Scots, who having Reign'd thirty two Years, and dying in 809, had formerly aided (but in what Year of his Reign tells not) Hungus King of Picts, with 10000 Scots, against Atbelstan a Saxon or Englishman, then wasting the Pictish Borders; that Hungus, by the aid of those Scots, and the help of St. Andrew their Patron, in a Vision by Night, and the appearance of his Cross by Day, routed the astonish'd English, and slew Atbelstan in fight. Who this Atbelstan was, I believe no Man knows; Buchanan supposes him to have been some Danish Commander, on whom King Alured, or Alfred, had bestow'd Northumberland: But of this I find no footstep in our Antient Writers; and if any such thing were done in the time of Alfred, it must be little less than one hundred Years after; this Atbelstan therefore, and this great Overthrow seems rather to have been the fancy of some Legend, than any warrantable Record. Mean while, Ecbert having with much Prudence, Justice and Clemency, a Work of more than one Year, establish'd his Kingdom, and himself in the Affections of his People, turns his first Enterprize against the Britains, both them of Cornwall, and those beyond Severn, subduing both. In Mercia, Kenulf the sixth Year after, having Reign'd with great Praise of his Religious Mind and Virtues, both in Peace and War, deceas'd. His Son Kenelm, a Child of seven Years, was committed to the Care of his Eldest Sister Quendred; who with a Female Ambition aspiring to the Crown, hir'd one who had the charge of his Nurture, to murder him, led into a woody place upon pretence of Hunting. The Murther, as is reported, was miraculously reveal'd; but to tell how, by a Dove dropping a written Note on the Altar at Rome, is a long Story told, tho' out of order, by Malmfbury; and under the Year 821 by Matt. West. where I leave it to be sought by such as are more credulous than I

^a Ethelward says, he was Ordain'd King; Dr. Lloyd Bishop of Worcester, from Affer's Annals, Simeon of Durham, Roger Hoveden, and others, proves Egbert's Accession to the Throne to be two Years forwarder, Anno 802.
^b It seems to be Kempsford on the edge of Glostershire, next to Wiltshire.

man on the East-Angles, was by them with his five Consuls, as the Annals call them, surpriz'd and put to the Sword: And Witblif his Successor first vanquish'd, then upon submission with all Mercia, made Tributary to Ecbert. Mean while the Northumbrian Kingdom of it self was fallen to shivers; their Kings, one after another, so often slain by the People, no Man daring, tho' never so ambitious, to take up the Scepter, which many had found so hot, (the only effectual Cure of Ambition that I have read) for the space of thirty three Years after the Death of Ethelred Son of Mollo, as Malmfbury writes, there was no King: Many Noblemen and Prelates were fled the Country. Which mis-rule among them, the Danes having understood, ofttimes from their Ships entring far into the Land, infested those parts with wide depopulation, wasting Towns, Churches and Monasteries, for they were yet Heathen: The Lent before whose coming, on the North-side of St. Peter's Church in Tork, was seen from the Roof to rain Blood. The Causes of these Calamities, and the Ruine of that Kingdom, Alcuin, a learned Monk living in those Days, attributes in several Epistles, and well may, to the general ignorance and decay of Learning, which crept in among them after the Death of Beda, and of Ecbert the Archbishop; their neglect of breeding up Youth in the Scriptures, the spruce and gay Apparel of their Priests and Nuns, discovering their vain and wanton Minds; Examples are also read, even in Beda's Days, of their wanton Deeds: Thence Altars defil'd with Perjuries, Cloisters violated with Adulteries, the Land polluted with Blood of their Princes, Civil Dissentions among the People, and finally all the same Vices which Gildas alledg'd of old to have ruin'd the Brit-tains. In this estate, Ecbert, who had now con-quer'd all the South, finding them in the Year 827, (for he was march'd thither with an Army to compleat his Conquest of the whole Island) no wonder if they submitted themselves to the Yoke without resistance, Eandred their King becoming Tributary. Thence turning his Forces the Year following, he subdu'd more thoroughly what remain'd of North-Wales.

History of ENGLAND,

Continu'd to the NORMAN CONQUEST.

By Mr. JOHN MILTON. Book V.

THE Sum of things in this Island, or the best part thereof, reduc'd now under the Power of one Man; and him one of the worthiest, which, as far as can be found in good Authors, was by none attain'd at any time here before unless in Fables; Men might with some Reason have expected from such Union, Peace and Plenty, Greatness, and the flourishing of all Estates and Degrees: But far the contrary fell out soon after, Invasion, Spoil, Desolation, Slaughter of many, Slavery of the rest, by the forcible landing of a fierce Nation; Danes commonly called, and sometimes Dacians, by others, the same with Normans; as barbarous as the Saxons themselves were at first reputed, and much more; for the Saxons first invited came hither to dwell; these unsent for, unprovok'd, came only to destroy. But if the Saxons, as is above related, came most of them from Futland and Anglen, a part of Denmark, as Danish Writers affirm, and that Danes and Normans are the same; then in this Invasion, Danes drove out Danes, their own Posterity. And Normans afterwards, none but Antienter Normans. Which Invasion perhaps, had the Heptarchy stood divided as it was, had either not been attempted, or not uneasily resisted; while each Prince and People, excited by their nearest Concernments, had more industriously defended their own Bounds, than depending on the neglect of a deputed Governour, sent oft-times from the remote residence of a secure Monarch. Though as it fell out in those Troubles, the lesser Kingdoms revolting from the West-Saxon Yoke, and not aiding each other, too much concern'd with their own Safety, it came to no better pass; while severally they sought to repel the Danger nigh at hand, rather than jointly to prevent it far off. But when God hath decreed Servitude on a sinful Nation, fitted by their own Vices for no Condition but servile, all Estates of Government are alike unable to avoid it. God had purpos'd to punish our instrumental Punishers, though now Christians, by other Heathen, according to his Divine Retaliation; Invasion for Invasion, Spoil for Spoil, Destruction for Destruction. The Saxons were now full as wicked as the Britains were at their Arrival, broken with Luxury and Sloth, either secular, or superstitious; for laying aside the Exercise of Arms, and the Study of all vertuous Knowledge, some betook them to over-worldly or vicious Practice, others to Religious Idleness and Solitude, which brought forth nothing but vain and delusive Visions; easily perceiv'd such, by their commanding of things, either not belonging to the Gospel, or utterly forbidden, Ceremonies, Reliques, Monasteries, Masses, Idols, add to these Ostentation of Alms, got of-times by Rapine and Oppression, or intermixt with violent and lustful Deeds, sometimes prodigally bestow'd, as the Expiation of Cruelty and Bloodshed. What longer suffering could there be, when Religion it self grew so void of Sincerity, and the greatest Shews of Purity were impur'd.

Ecbert in full heighth of Glory, having now enjoy'd his Conquest seven peaceful Years, his victorious Army long since disbanded, and the Exercise of Arms perhaps laid aside, the more was found unprovided against a sudden Storm of Danes from the Sea, who landing in the 32 of his Reign, wasted Shepey in Kent. Ecbert the next Year, gathering an Army, for he had heard of their Arrival in 35 Ships, gave them Battel by the River Carr in Dorsetshire; the Event whereof was, that the Danes kept their Ground, and encamp'd where the Field was fought; two Saxon Leaders, Dudda and Ofmund, and two Bishops as some say, were there slain. This was the only Check of Fortune we read of, that Ecbert in all his time receiv'd. For the Danes returning two Years after with a great Navy, and joining Forces with the Cornish, who had enter'd League with them, were overthrown and put to flight. Of these Invasions against Ecbert, the Danish History is not silent; whether out of their own Records or ours, may be justly doubted; for of these times at home, I find them in much Uncertainty, and beholding rather to Out-landish Chronicles than any Records of their own. The Victor Ecbert, as one who had done enough, seasonably now, after prosperous Success, the next Year with Glory ended his Days, and was buried at Winchester.

E T H E L W O L F.

Ethelwolf the Son of Ecbert succeeded, by Malmfbury describ'd a Man of mild Nature, not inclin'd to War, or delighted with much Dominion; that therefore contented with the

A. D. 836. ancient West-Saxon Bounds, he gave to Ethelstan his Brother, or Son, as some write, the Kingdom of Kent and Essex. But the Saxon Annalist, whose Authority is Elder, saith plainly, that both these Countries and Sussex, were bequeath'd to Ethelstan by Ecbert his Father. The unwarlike Disposition of Ethelwolf, gave Encouragement no doubt, and easier Entrance to the Danes, who came again the next Year with thirty three Ships; but Wulfbeard, one of the King's Chief Captains, drove them back at Southampton with great Slaughter; himself dying the same Year, of Age, as I suppose, for he seems to have been one of Ecbert's old Commanders, who was sent with Ethelwolf to subdue Kent. Ethelhelm another of the King's Captains with the Dorsetshire Men, had at first like Success against the Danes at Portsmouth; but they reinforcing stood their Ground, and put the English to rout. Worse was the Success of Earl Herebert at a Place call'd Merewar, slain with the most part of his Army. The Year following in Lindsey also, East-Angles, and Kent, much Mischief was done by their landing; where the next Year, imbolden'd by Success, they came on as far as Canterbury, Rocheſter, and London it self, with no less cruel Hostility: And giving no respite to the peaceable Mind of Ethelwolf, they yet return'd with the next Year in thirty five Ships, fought with him, as before with his Father, at the River Carr, and made good their Ground. In Northumberland Eandred the Tributary King deceasing, left the same Tenure to his Son Ethelred, driven out in his fourth Year, and succeeded by Readwulf, who soon after his Coronation, hastening forth to Battel against the Danes at Alvezheli, fell with the most part of his Army; and Ethelred like in Fortune to the former Ethelred, was re-exalted to his Seat. And to be yet farther like him in Fate, was slain the fourth Year after. Osbert succeeded in his room. But more Southerly, the Danes next Year after met with some stop in the full course of their outrageous Insolences. For Earnulf with the Men of Somerset, Alstan the Bishop, and Osric with those of Dorsetshire, setting upon them at the River's Mouth of  Pedridan*, slaughter'd them in great Numbers, and obtain'd a just Victory. This Repulse quell'd them, for ought we hear, the Space of six Years; Then also renewing their Invasion, with little better Success. For Keorle an Earl, aided with the Forces of Devonshire, assaulted and overthrew them at Wigganbeorch with great Destruction; as prosperously were they fought with the same Year at Sandwich, by King Ethelstan, and Ealker his General, their great Army defeated, and nine of their Ships taken, the rest driven off, however to ride out the Winter on that Shoar, Aſſer saith, they then first winter'd in Shepey Isle. Hard it is through the bad Expression of these Writers to define this Fight, whether by Sea or Land; Hoveden terms it a Sea-fight. Nevertheless, with fifty Ships (Aſſer and others add three Hundred) they enter'd the Mouth of Thames, and made Excursions as far as Canterbury and London, and as Ethelwerd writes destroy'd both; of London, Aſſer signifies only that they pillag'd it. Bertulf also the Mercian, Successor of Witlaf, with all his Army they forc'd to fly, and him beyond the Sea. Then passing over Thames with their Powers into Surrey, and the West Saxons, and meeting there with King Ethelwolf and Ethelwald his Son, at a Place call'd  Ak-Lea*, or Oak-Lea, they receiv'd a total Defeat with memorable Slaughter. This was counted a lucky Year to England, and brought to Ethelwolf great Reputation. Barbed therefore, who after Bertulf held of him the Mercian Kingdom, two Years after this, imploring his Aid against the North-Welch, as then troublesome to his Confines, obtain'd it of him in Person, and thereby reduc'd them to Obedience. This done, Ethelwolf sent his Son Alfrid a Child of five Years, well accompanied to Rome, whom Leo the Pope both consecrated to be King afterward, and adopted to be his Son; at home Ealker with the Forces of Kent, and Huda with those of Surrey, fell on the Danes at their landing in Tanet, and at first put them back; but the slain and drown'd were at length so many on either side, as left the Loss equal on both: Which yet hinder'd not the Solemnity of a Marriage at the Feast of Malmſbury, Easter, between Barbed the Mercian, and Ethelſwida King Ethelwolf's Daughter. Howbeit the Danes next Year winter'd again in Shepey. Whom Ethelwolf not finding humane Health sufficient to resist growing daily upon him, in hope of Divine Aid, register'd in a Book, and dedicated to God the tenth part of his own Lands, and of his whole Kingdom, eas'd of all Impositions, but converted to the Maintenance of Masses and Psalms Weekly to be sung for the prospering of Ethelwolf and his Captains, as appears at large by the Patent it self, in William of Malmſbury. Aſſer saith, he did it for the Redemption of his Soul, and the Soul of his Ancestors. After which, as having done some great Matter, to shew himself at Rome, and be applauded of the Pope; he takes a long and cumbersome Journey thither with young Alfrid again, and there stays a Year, when his Place requir'd him rather here in the Field against Pagan Enemies left wintering in his Land. Yet so much Manhood he had, as to return thence no Monk; and in his way home took to Wife Judith Daughter of Charles the Bald, King of France. But ere his return, Ethelward his eldest Son, Alstan his trusty Bishop, and Emulf Earl of Somerset conspir'd against him; their Complaints were, that he had taken with him Alfrid his youngest Son to be there inaugurated King, and brought Home with him an Out-landish Wife; for which they endeavour'd to deprive him of his Kingdom. The Disturbance was expected to bring forth nothing less than War: But the King abhorring Civil Discord, after many Conferences tending to Peace, condescended to divide the Kingdom with his Son; Division was made, but the Matter so carried, that the Eastern and worst part was malignly afforded to the Father: The Western and best given to the Son, at which many of the Nobles had great Indignation, offering to the King their utmost Assistance for the Recovery of all; whom he peacefully dissuading, sat down contented with his Portion assign'd. In the East-Angles, Edmund Lineal from the Ancient Stock of those Kings, a Youth of fourteen Years only, but of great Hopes, was with consent of all but his own crown'd at Burie. About this time, as Buchanan relates, the

The Scots unable to resist longer, and by Ambassadors intreating Peace, had it granted them on these Conditions: The Scots were to quit all they had possess'd within the Wall of Severus: The Limits of Scotland were beneath Sterlingbridge to be the River Forth, and on the other side Dunbritton-Frith; from that time so call'd of the British then seated in Cumberland, who had join'd with Osbert in this Action, and so far extended on that side the British Limits. If this be true, as the Scotch Writers themselves witness (and who would think them fabulous to the disparagement of their own Country?) How much wanting have been our Historians to their Country's Honour, in letting pass unmention'd an Exploit so memorable, by them remember'd and attested, who are wont offer to extenuate than to amplify ought done in Scotland by the English? Donaldus on these Conditions releas'd, soon after dies, according to Buchanan, in 858. Ethelwolf, chief King in England, had the Year before ended his Life, and was bury'd as his Father at Winchester. He was from his Youth much addicted to Devotion; so that in his Father's time he was ordain'd Bishop of Winchester; and unwillingly, for want of other Legitimate Issue, succeeded him in the Throne: Managing therefore his greatest Affairs by the Activity of two Bishops, Astlan of Sherburne, and Switbin of Winchester. But Astlan is noted of Covetousness and Oppression, by William of Malmesbury; the more vehemently, no doubt, for doing some notable damage to that Monastery. The same Author writes, that Ethelwolf at Rome paid a Tribute to the Pope, continu'd to his Days. However he were facile to his Son and seditious Nobles, in yielding up part of his Kingdom; yet his Queen he treated not the less honourably, for whomsoever it pleas'd. The West-Saxons had decreed, ever since the time of Eadburga, the infamous Wife of Birtric, that no Queen should sit in State with the King, or be dignify'd with the Title of Queen. But Ethelwolf permitted not that Judith his Queen should lose any point of Regal State by that Law. At his Death he divided the Kingdom between his two Sons, Ethelbald and Ethelbert; to the Younger, Kent, Essex, Sursey, Sussex; to the Elder, all the rest: To Peter and Paul certain Revenues yearly, for what Uses let others relate, who write also his Pedigree, from Son to Father, up to Adam.

ETHELBALD, and ETHELBERT.

Affer. Malmbs. Sim. Dun. Ethelbald, unnatural and disloyal to his Father, fell justly into another, though contrary Sin, of too much Love to his Father's Wife; and whom at first he oppos'd coming into the Land, her now unlawfully marrying, he takes into his Bed; but not long enjoying, dy'd at three Years end, without doing ought more worthy to be remember'd; having Reign'd two Years with his Father, impiously usurping, and three after him, as unworthily inheriting. And A. D. his hap was all that while to be unmolested by 860. the Danes; not of Divine Favour doubtless, but to his great Condemnation, living the more securely his incestuous Life. Huntingdon on the other side much praises Ethelbald, and writes him bury'd at Sherburn, with great sorrow of his People, who miss'd him long after. Mat. West. saith, that he repented of his Incest with Judith, and dismiss'd her: But Affer an Eye-witness of those Times, mentions no such thing.

ETHELBERT alone.

Ethelbald by Death remov'd, the whole Kingdom came rightfully to Ethelbert his next Brother. Who though a Prince of great Virtue and no Blame, had as short a Reign allotted him as his faulty Brother, nor that so peaceful; once or twice invaded by the Danes. But they having landed in the West with a great Army, and sack'd Winchester, were met by Osric Earl of Southampton, and Ethelwolf of Barkshire, beaten to their Ships, and forc'd to leave their Booty. Five Years after, about the time of his Death, 865. they set foot again in Taney; the Kentishmen weary'd out with so frequent Alarms, came to agreement with them for a certain Sum of Money; but ere the Peace could be ratify'd, and the Money gather'd, the Danes impatient of delay by a sudden Eruption in the Night, soon wasted all the East of Kent. Mean while, or something before, Ethelbert deceasing was bury'd as his Brother at Sherburn.

ETHELRED.

Ethelred the third Son of Ethelwolf, at his first coming to the Crown was entertain'd with a fresh Invasion of Danes, led by Hinguar and Hubba, two Brothers, who now had got footing among the East-Angles; there they winter'd, and coming to terms of Peace with the Inhabitants, furnish'd themselves of Horses, forming by that means many Troops with Riders of their own: These Pagans, Affer saith, came from the River Danubius. Fitted thus for a long Expedition, they ventur'd the next Year to make their way over Land and over Humber, as far as Tork, then they found to their hands embroil'd in Civil Dissentions; their King Osbert they had thrown out, and Ella Leader of another Faction chosen in his room; who both, though late, admonish'd by their Common Danger, towards the Year's end, with United Powers made Head against the Danes and prevail'd; but pursuing them over-eagerly into Tork, then but slenderly wall'd, the Northumbrians were every where slaughter'd, both within and without; their Kings also both slain, their City burnt, saith Malmesbury, the rest as they could made their Peace, over-run and vanquish'd as far as the River Tine, and Ecbert of English Race appointed King over them. Bromton, no antient Author (for he wrote since Mat. West.) nor of much Credit, writes a particular Cause of the Danes coming to Tork: That Bruern a Nobleman, whose Wife King Osbert had ravish'd, call'd in Hinguar and Hubba to revenge him. The Example is remarkable, if the Truth were as evident. Thence Victorious, the Danes next Year enter'd into Mercia towards Nottingham, where they spent the Winter. Burberd, then King of that Country, unable to resist, implores,

A. D. 868. plores the Aid of Ethelred and young Alfred his Brother, they assembling their Forces and joining with the Mercians about Nottingham, offer Battel: The Danes, not daring to come forth, kept themselves within that Town and Castle, so that no great Fight was hazarded there; at length the Mercians, weary of long suspense, enter'd into Conditions of Peace with their Enemies. After which the Danes returning back to Tork, made their abode there the space of one Year, committing, some say, many Cruelties. Thence imbarcking to Lindsey, and all the Summer destroying that Country, about September they came with like Fury into Kesteven, another part of Lincolnsbire, where Algar, the Earl of Howland, now Holland, with his Forces, and two hundred stout Soldiers belonging to the Abby of Croiland, three hundred from about Boston, Morcard Lord of Brunne, with his numerous Family, well train'd and arm'd, Osgot Governour of Lincoln, with five hundred of that City, all joining together, gave Battel to the Danes, slew of them a great multitude, with three of their Kings, and pursu'd the rest to their Tents: But the Night following, Gorburn, Bafeg, Ofketil, Halfden and Hamond, five Kings; and as many Earls, Frena, Hinguar, Hubba, Sidroc the Elder and Younger, coming in from several parts with great Forces and Spoils, great part of the Engliff began to sink home. Nevertheless Algar, with such as forsook him not, all next Day in order of Battel facing the Danes, and sustaining unmov'd the brunt of their Assaults, could not withhold his Men at last from pursuing their counterfeited flight; whereby open'd and disorder'd, they fell into the Snares of their Enemies rushing back upon them. Algar, and those Captains fore-nam'd with him, all resolute Men, retreating to a Hill side, and slaying of such as follow'd them, manifold their own number, dy'd at length upon heaps of Dead which they had made round about them. The Danes thence passing on into the Country of East-Angles, rifl'd and burnt the Monastery of Ely, overthrew Earl Wulketul with his whole Army, and lodg'd out the Winter at Thetford; where King Edmund affailing them, was with his whole Army put to flight, himself taken, bound to a Stake, and shot to Death with Arrows, his whole Country subdu'd*. The next Year with great Supplies, saith Huntingdon, bending their march toward the West-Saxons, the only People now left, in whom might seem yet to remain Strength or Courage likely to oppose them, they came to Reading, fortify'd there between the two Rivers of Thames and Kenet; and about three Days after, sent out Wings of Horse under two Earls to forage the Country; but Ethelwulf Earl of Barkshire, at Englefeld a Village nigh, encounter'd them, slew one of their Earls, and obtain'd a great Victory. Four Days after came the King himself and his Brother Alfred with the main Battel; and the Danes issuing forth, a bloody Fight began, on either side great Slaughter, in which Earl Ethelwulf lost his Life; but the Danes losing no ground, kept their place of standing to the end. Neither did the Engliff for this make less haste to another Conflict at Eccesdune, or Asb-down†, four Days after, where both Armies with their whole Forces on either side met. The Danes were imbattel'd in two great Boddies, the one led by Bascai and Halfden, their two Kings, the other by such Earls as were appointed: In like manner the Engliff divided their Powers, Ethelred the King stood against their Kings; and though on the lower ground, and coming later into the Battel from his Orifone, gave a fierce onset, wherein Bascai (the Daniff History names him Ivarus the Son of Regnus) was slain. Alfred was plac'd against the Earls, and beginning the Battel ere his Brother came into the Field, with such Resolution charged them, that in the shock most of them were slain; they are nam'd, Sidroc, Elder and Younger, Osbern, Frena, Harald; at length in both Divisions, the Danes turn their backs; many thousands of them cut off, the rest pursu'd till Night. So much the more it may be wonder'd to hear next in the Annals, that the Danes fourteen Days after such an Overthrow, fighting again with Ethelred and his Brother Alfred at Basing, under conduct, saith the Daniff History, of Agnernus and Hubba, Brothers of the slain Ivarus, should obtain the Victory; especially since the new Supply of Danes, mention'd by Affer, arriv'd after this Action. But after two Months, the King and his Brother fought with them again at Merton‡, in two Squadrons as before, in which Fight hard it is to understand who had the better; so darkly do the Saxon Annals deliver their Meaning with more than wonted infancy. Yet these I take (for Affer is here silent) to be the chief Fountain of our Story, the Ground and Basis upon which the Monks later in time Gloss and Comment at their Pleasure. Nevertheless it appears, that on the Saxon part, not Heamund the Bishop only, but many valiant Men lost their Lives. This Fight was follow'd by a heavy Summer Plague; whereof, as is thought, King Ethelred dy'd in the fifth of his Reign, and was bury'd at Winburne, where his Epitaph inscribes, that he had his Death's Wound by the Danes, according to the Daniff History 872*. Of all these terrible Landings and Devastations by the Danes, from the Days of Ethelwulf till their two last Battels with Ethelred, or of their Leaders, whether Kings, Dukes, or Earls, the Daniff History of best Credit saith nothing; so little Wit or Conscience it seems they had to leave any Memory of their Brutish, rather than Manly Actions; unless we shall suppose them to have come, as above was cited out of Affer, from Danubius, rather than from Denmark, more probably some barbarous Nations of Prussia, or Livonia, not long before seated more Northward on the Baltick Sea.

ALFRED.

Alfred the fourth Son of Ethelwulf, had scarce perform'd his Brother's Obsequies, and the Solemnity of his own Crowning, when at the Month's end in haste with a small Power he encounter'd the whole Army of Danes at Wilton, and most part of the Day foil'd them; but unwarily following the Chase, gave others of them the advantage to rally; who returning upon him now weary, remained Masters of the

* It appears by the Inscription on his Tomb, which may be read in Winbourn Church, that he fell per manus Danorum Paganorum, by the hands of the Pagan Danes, the 23^d of April, Anno. 872.

† Afferius Menevensis, Affer Bishop of St. David's, wrote the Life of this Prince, in whose Reign he liv'd. The Life of King Alfred was also written at large by Sir John Spelman, (Son to Sir Henry) the Original Manuscript whereof is now in the Bodleian Library. It was translated into Latin; and publish'd in Folio, with Mr. Walker's Notes, some Years ago.

- A. D. Field. This Year, as is affirm'd in the Annals, nine Battels had been fought against the Danes on the South-side of Thames, besides innumerable Excursions made by Alfred and other Leaders; one King, nine Earls were fall'n in Fight, so that weary on both sides at the Year's end, League or Truce was concluded. Yet next Year the Danes took their march to London, now expos'd their Prey, there they winter'd, and thither came the Mercians to renew Peace with them. The Year following they rov'd back to the Parts beyond Humber, but winter'd at Torksey in Lincolnshire, where the Mercians now the third time made Peace with them. Notwithstanding which, removing their Camp to Rependune in Mercia, now Repton upon Trent in Darbyshire, and there wintering, they constrain'd Barbed the King to fly into Foreign Parts, making Seizure of his Kingdom, he running the direct way to Rome, with better Reason than his Ancestors, dy'd there, and was buried in a Church by the English School. His Kingdom the Danes farm'd out to Kelwulf, one of his Household Servants or Officers, with Condition to be resign'd them when they commanded. From Rependune they dislodg'd, Hafden their King leading part of his Army Northward, winter'd by the River Tine, and subjecting all those Quarters, wasted also the Picts and British beyond: But Cuthrun, Oskitell, and Anwyn, other three of their Kings moving from * Repton in Darbyshire, came with a great Army to † Grant-bridge, and remain'd there a whole Year. Alfred that Summer purposing to try his Fortune with a Fleet at Sea (for he had found that the want of Shipping and Neglect of Navigation, had expos'd the Land to these Piracies) met with seven Danish Rovers, took one, the rest escaping; an acceptable Success from so small a Beginning: For the English at that time were but little experienc'd in Sea Affairs. The next Year's first Motion of the Danes was towards Warham Castle: Where Alfred meeting them, either by Policy, or their Doubt of his Power; Ethelwerd saith, by Money brought them to such Terms of Peace, as that they swore to him upon a hallow'd Bracelet, others say upon certain Reliques (a solemn Oath it seems which they never vouchsafed before to any other Nation) forthwith to depart the Land: But falsifying that Oath, by Night with all the Horse they had (Affer saith, slaying all the Horsemen he had) stole to Exeter, and there winter'd. In Northumberland, Hafden their King began to settle, to divide the Land, to till, and to inhabit. Mean while they in the West who were marched to Exeter, enter'd the City, coursing now and then to Warham; but their Fleet the next Year sailing or rowing about the West, met with such a Tempest near to *Swanwich, or Gnawenwic, as wrack'd 120 of their Ships, and left the rest easie to be master'd by those Gallies which Alfred had set there to guard the Seas, and streiten Exeter of Provision. He the while beleaguering them in the City; now humbled with the Loss of their Navy (two Navies, saith Affer, the one at Gnawenwic, the other at Swanwine) distress'd them so, as that they gave him as many Hostages as he requir'd, and as many Oaths, to keep their covenanted Peace, and kept it. For the Summer coming on, they departed into Mercia, whereof part they divided amongst themselves, part left to Kelwulf their substituted King. The Twelfth following, all Oaths forgotten, they came to Chippenham in Wiltshire, dispeopling the Countries round, dispossessing some, driving others beyond the Sea; Alfred himself A. D. with a small Company was forc'd to keep with- 878. in Woods and Fenny Places; and for some time all alone, as Florent saith, sojourn'd with Dunwulf a Swine-herd, made afterwards for his Devotion, and Aptness to Learning, Bishop of Winchester. Hafden and the Brother of Hinguar, Sim Dun. coming with twenty three Ships from North-Wales, where they had made great Spoil, landed in Devonshire, nigh to a strong Castle nam'd Kinwith; where by the Garrison issuing forth unexpectedly, they were slain with twelve Hundred of their Men. Mean while the King about Easter, not despairing of his Affairs, built a Fort- 879. tress at a Place call'd Atbelney in Somersetshire, therein valiantly defending himself and his Followers, frequently falling forth. The seventh Week after, he rode out to a Place call'd * Ecbryt-stone in the East part of Selwood: Thither resorted to him with much Gratulation the Somerset and Wiltshire Men, with many out of Hampshire, some of whom a little before had fled 880. their Country; with these marching to Ethandune now Eldon in Wiltshire, he gave Battel to the whole Danish Power, and put them to flight. Then besieging their Castle, within fourteen Days took it. Malmbury writes, that in this time of his recess, to go a Spy into the Danish Camp, he took upon him with one Servant the Habit of a Fidler; by this means gaining access to the King's Table, and sometimes to his Bed-Chamber, got Knowledge of their Secrets, their careless encamping, and thereby this Opportunity of assailing them on a sudden. The Danes by this Misfortune broken, gave him more Hostages, and renew'd their Oaths to depart out of his Kingdom. Their King Gyro, or Gothrun, offer'd willingly to receive Baptism, and accordingly came with thirty of his Friends, to a Place call'd Aldra, or * Aulre, near to Atbelney, 881. and were baptiz'd at Wedmore; where Alfred receiv'd him out of the Font, and nam'd him Atbelstan. After which, they abode with him twelve Days, and were dismiss'd with rich Presents. Whereupon the Danes remov'd next Year 879. to Cirencester, thence peaceably to the East-Angles; which Alfred, as some write had bestow'd The Danes on Gothrun to hold of him; the Bounds whereof have the Kingdom of may be read among the Laws of Alfred. Others of them went to Fulham on the Thames, and joining there with a great Fleet newly come inven them. to the River, thence pass'd over into France and Flanders, both which they enter'd, so far conquering or wasting, as witness'd sufficiently, that the French and Flemish were no more able than the English, by Policy or Prowess to keep off that Danish Inundation from their Land. Alfred thus rid of them, and intending for the future to prevent their landing; three Years after 882. (quiet the mean while) with more Ships and better provided, puts to Sea, and at first met with four of theirs, whereof two he took, throwing the Men over-board, then with two others, wherein were two of their Princes, and took them also, but not without some Loss of his own. After three Years another Fleet of them appear'd 885. on these Seas, so huge, that one part thought themselves sufficient to enter upon East-France, the other came to Rocheſter, and beleagu'd it, they within stoutly defending themselves, till Alfred with great Forces, coming down upon the Danes, drove them to their Ships, leaving for haſt all their Horses behind them. The same Year Alfred sent a Fleet toward the East-Angles, then

* Between the Rivers Tone and Parret in Somersetshire, about North-Petherton.† Possibly Briarton on the West-side of Wiltshire. See the Gloss to the Saxon Chronicle.

A. D. 885. inhabited by the Danes, which at the Mouth of Stour^a, meeting with sixteen Danish Ships, after some fight took them all, and slew the Soldiers aboard; but in their way home lying careless, were overtaken by another part of that Fleet, and came off with Loss; whereupon perhaps those Danes who were settl'd among the East-Angles, erected with new Hopes, violated the Peace which they had sworn to Alfred, who spent the next Year in repairing London, (besieging, saith Huntingdon) much ruin'd and unpeopl'd by the Danes; the Londoners, all but those who had been led away Captive, soon return'd to their Dwellings, and Ethred Duke of Mercia, was by the King appointed their Governor^b. But after thirteen Years respite of Peace, another Danish Fleet of 250 Sail^c, from the East part of France arriv'd at the Mouth of a River in East Kent, call'd^d Limen, nigh to the great Wood^e Andred, famous for Length and Breadth; into that Wood they drew up their Ships four Mile from the River's Mouth, and built a Fortrefs. After whom Haesten with another Danish Fleet of Eighty Ships, entring the Mouth of Thames, built a Fort at Middleton, the former Army remaining at a Place call'd Apeltre. Alfred perceiving this, took of those Danes who dwelt in Northumberland, a new Oath of Fidelity, and of those in Essex, Hostages, lest they should joyn, as they were wont, with their Country-men newly arriv'd. And by the next Year, having got together his Forces, between either Army of the Danes encamp'd so, as to be ready for either of them, who first should happen to stir forth; Troops of Horse also he sent continually abroad, assisted by such as could be spar'd from strong Places, wherever the Countries wanted them, to encounter foraging Parties of the Enemy. The King also divided sometimes his whole Army, marching out with one part by turns, the other keeping intrench'd. In Conclusion, rowling up and down, both sides met at Farnham in Surrey^f; where the Danes by Alfred's Horse Troops were put to flight, and crossing the Thames to a certain Island near Coln in Essex, or as Cambden thinks, by Colebrooke, were besieged there by Alfred till Provision fail'd the Besiegers, another part staid behind with the King wounded. Mean while Alfred preparing to reinforce the Siege in Colney, the Danes of Northumberland breaking Faith, came by Sea to the East-Angles, and with a Hundred Ships coasting Southward, landed in Devonshire, and besieged Exeter; thither Alfred hasten'd with his Powers, except a Squadron of Welch that came to London: With whom the Citizens marching forth to  Beamflet*, where Haesten the Dane had built a strong Fort, and left a Garrison, while he himself with the Main of his Army was enter'd far into the Country, luckily surprize the Fort, master the Garrison, make prey of all they find there; their Ships also they burnt or brought away with good Booty, and many Prisoners, among whom, the Wife and two Sons of Haesten were sent to the King, who forthwith set them at Liberty. Whereupon Haesten gave Oath of

Amity and Hostages to the King, he in requital, whether freely, or by Agreement, a Sum of Money. Nevertheless without regard of Faith given, while Alfred was busied about Exeter, joyning with the other Danish Army, he built another Castle in Essex at Shoberie, thence marching Westward by the Thames, aided with Northumbrian and East-Anglish Danes, they came at length to Severn, pillaging all in their way. But, Ethred, Ethelm, and Ethelnoth, the King's Captains, with united Forces[†] pitch'd nigh to them at Buttington, on the Severn Bank in Montgomeryshire, the River running between, and there many Weeks attended; the King mean while blocking up the Danes, who besieged Exeter, having eaten part of their Horses, the rest urg'd with Hunger broke forth to their Fellows, who lay encamp'd on the East-side of the River, and were all there discomfited, with some Loss of valiant Men on the King's Party; the rest fled back to Essex and their Fortrefs there. Then Laf, one of their Leaders, gather'd before Winter a great Army of Northumbrian and East-Anglish Danes, who leaving their Money, Ships and Wives with the East-Angles, and marching Day and Night, sat down before a City in the West call'd^g Wirbeal near to Chester, and took it ere they could be overtaken. The English after two Days Siege, hopeless to dislodge them, wasted the Country round to cut off from them all Provision, and departed. Soon after which, next Year the Danes no longer able to hold Wirbeal, destitute of Victuals, enter'd North-Wales; thence laden with Spoils, part return'd into Northumberland, others to the East-Angles as far as Essex, where they seiz'd on a small Island call'd Me-Merseyrefig. And here again the Annals record them to besiege Exeter, but without Coherence of Sense or Story. Others relate to this purpose, that returning by Sea from the Siege of Exeter, and in their way landing on the Coast of Sussex, they of Chichester fallied out, and slew of them many Hundreds, taking also some of their Ships. The same Year they who possess'd Meresfig, intending to winter thereabout, drew up their Ships, some into the Thames, others into the River Lee, and on the Bank thereof built a Castle twenty Miles from London; to assault which the Londoners aided with other Forces march'd out the Summer following, but were soon put to flight, losing four of the King's Captains. Huntingdon writes quite the contrary, that these four were Danish Captains, and the overthrow theirs: But little Credit is to be plac'd in Huntingdon single. For the King thereupon with his Forces, lay encamp'd nearer the City, that the Danes might not infest them in time of Harvest; in the mean time, subtly devising to turn Lee Stream several ways; whereby the Danish Bottoms were left on dry Ground: Which they soon perceiving march'd over Land to Quatbrig^h on the Severn, built a Fortrefs and winter'd there; while their Ships left in Lee, were either broken or brought away by the Londoners; but their Wives and Children they had left in Safety with the East-Angles. The next Year was pestilent, ^h This is most like to be Bridgenorth in Shropshire. For what Reasons, see the Gloss to the Saxon Chronicle, under the Title of Cwathrigge. Suppos'd by others to be Cambridge, in Gloucestershire, now a Village situated on the River Cam, where it falls into the Severn.

A. D. 897. and besides the common sort took away many great Earls, Kelmond in Kent, Britbulf in Essex, Wulfred in Hampshire, with many others; and to this Evil, the Danes of Northumberland and East-Angles ceas'd not to endamage the West-Saxons, especially by stealth, robbing on the South-shoar in certain long Gallies. But the King causing to be built others twice as long as usually were built, and some of sixty or seventy Oars higher, swifter and steddier than such as were in use before either with Danes or Frisons, his own Invention, some of these he sent out against six Danish Pirates, who had done much harin in the Isle of Wight and Parts adjoining. The Bickering was doubtful and intricate, part on the Water, part on the Sands; not without Loss of some Eminent Men on the English side. The Pirates at length were either slain or taken, two of them stranded; the Men brought to Winchester, where the King then was, were executed by his Command; one of them escap'd to the East-Angles, her Men much wounded: The same Year not fewer than twenty of their Ships perish'd on the South Coast with all their Men. And Rollo the Dane or Norman landing here, as Mat. West. writes, though not in what part of the Island, after an unsuccessful Fight against those Forces which first oppos'd him, sail'd into France, and conquer'd the Country, since that time called Normandy. This is the Sum of what pass'd in three Years against the Danes, returning out of France, set down so perplexedly by the Saxon Annalist, ill-gifted with Utterance, as with much ado can be understood sometimes what is spoken, whether meant of the Danes or of the Saxons. After which troublesome time, Alfred enjoying three Years of Peace, by him spent, as his manner was, not idly or voluptuously, but in all vertuous Employments both of Mind and Body, becoming a Prince of his Renown, ended his Days in the Year 900, the 51 of his Age, the 20th of his Reign, and was buried Regally at Winchester; he was born * at a Place call'd † Wanadring in Berkshire, his Mother Osburga the Daughter of Oslac the King's Cup-bearer, a * Goth by Nation, and of Noble Descent. He was of Person comelier than all his Brethren, of pleasing Tongue and graceful Behaviour, ready Wit and Memory; yet through the Fondness of his Parents towards him, had not been taught to read till the twelfth Year of his Age; but the great Desire of Learning which was in him, soon appear'd, by his conning of Saxon Poems Day and Night, which with great Attention he heard by others repeated. He was besides, excellent at Hunting, and the new Art then of Hawking, but more exemplary in Devotion, having collected into a Book certain Prayers and Psalms, which he carried ever with him in his Bosom to use on all Occasions. He thirsted after all Liberal Knowledge, and oft complain'd that in his Youth he had no Teachers, in his middle Age so little Vacancy from Wars, and the Cares of his Kingdom; yet leisure he found sometimes, not only to learn much himself, but to communicate thereof what he could to his People, by translating Books out of Latin into English, Orosius, Boetius, Bede's History, and others, permitted none unlearn'd to bear Office, either in Court or Common-wealth; at twenty Years of Age not yet Reigning, he took to Wife Egelswitha the Daughter of Ethelred a Mercian Earl. The Extremities which beset him in the sixth of his Reign, Neo- than Abbot told him, were justly come upon A. D. him for neglecting in his younger Days the 900. Complaints of such as injur'd and oppress'd repair'd to him, as then second Person in the Kingdom for Redress; which Neglect were it such indeed, were yet excusable in a Youth, through Jollity of Mind, unwilling perhaps to be detain'd long with sad and sorrowful Narrations; but from the time of his undertaking Regal Charge, no Man more patient in hearing Causes, more inquisitive in examining, more exact in doing Justice, and providing good Laws, which are yet extant; more severe in punishing unjust Judges or obstinate Offenders. Thieves especially and Robbers, to the Terror of whom in cross ways were hung upon a high Post certain Chains of Gold, as it were daring any one to take them thence; so that Justice seem'd in his Days not to flourish only, but to triumph: No Man than he more frugal of two precious things in Man's Life, his Time and his Revenue; no Man wiser in the Disposal of both. His Time, the Day and Night he distributed by the burning of certain Tapers into three equal Portions: The one was for Devotion, the other for publick or private Affairs, the third for bodily Refreshment: How each Hour past, he was put in mind by one who had that Office. His whole Annual Revenue, which his first Care was should be justly his own, he divided into two equal Parts; the first he employ'd to secular Uses, and subdivided those into three, the first to pay his Soldiers, Household Servants and Guard, of which divided into three Bands, one attended Monthly by turn; the second was to pay his Architects and Workmen, whom he had got together of several Nations; for he was also an Elegant Builder; above the Custom and Conceit of Englishmen in those Days: The third he had in Readiness to relieve or honour Strangers according to their Worth, who came from all Parts to see him, and to live under him. The other equal Part of his Yearly Wealth he dedicated to Religious Uses, those of four sorts; the first to relieve the Poor, the second to Building and Maintenance of two Monasteries, the third of a School, where he had perswaded the Sons of many Noblemen to study Sacred Knowledge and Liberal Arts, ^b some say at Oxford; the fourth was for the Relief of Foreign Churches, as far as India to the Shrine of St. Thomas, sending thither Sigelm Bishop of Sherburn, who both return'd safe, and brought with him many rich Gems and Spices; Gifts also, and a Letter he receiv'd from the Patriarch of Jerusalem, sent many to Rome, and for them receiv'd Reliques. Thus far, and much more might be said of his Noble Mind, which render'd him the Mirror of Princes; his Body was diseas'd in his Youth with a great Soreness in the Siege, and that ceasing of it self, with another inward Pain of unknown Cause, which held him by frequent Fits to his dying Day; yet not disinabl'd to sustain those many glorious Labours of his Life both in Peace and War.

EDWARD the Elder.

EDward the Son of Alfred succeeded, in Learning not equal, in Power and Extent of Dominion, surpassing his Father. The beginning of his Reign had much Disturbance by Ethelwald

* A Saxon Lord descended from Withgar first Prince of the Isle of Wight.

^b The Truth of it is so clearly made out by several Authors, that he had no reason to mention it so suspiciously.

A. D. 901. an ambitious young Man, Son of the King's Uncle, or Cousin German, or Brother, for his Genealogy is variously deliver'd. He vainly avouching to have equal Right with Edward of Succession to the Crown, possess'd himself of Winburne in Dorset, and another Town diversly nam'd, giving out that there he would live or die; but encompass'd with the King's Forces at Badbury, a Place nigh, his Heart failing him, he stole out by Night, and fled to the Danish Army beyond Humber. The King sent after him, but not overtaking, found his Wife in the Town, whom he had married out of a Nunnery, and commanded her to be sent back thither^a. About this time the Kentish Men, against a Multitude of Danish Pirates, fought prosperously at a Place call'd Holme, as Hoveden records, Ethelwald aided by the Northumbrians with Shipping, three Years after, failing to the East-Angles, perswaded the Danes there to fall into the King's Territory, who marching with him as far as Crecklad, and passing the Thames there, waisted as far beyond as they durst venture, and laden with Spoils return'd home. The King with his Powers making Speed after them, between the ^b Dike and Onse, suppos'd to be Suffolk and Cambridgeshire, as far as the Fens Northward, laid waste all before him. Thence intending to return, he commanding that all his Army should follow him close without delay; but the Kentish Men, though often call'd upon, lagging behind, the Danish Army prevented them, and join'd Battle with the King: Where Duke Sigulf and Earl Sigelm, with many other of the Nobles were slain; on the Danes part, Eorik their King, and Ethelwald the Author of this War, with others of high Note, and of them greater Number, but with great Ruine on both sides; yet the Danes kept in their Power the burying of their slain. Whatever followed upon this Conflict, which we read not, the King two Years after with the Danes, both of East-Angles, and Northumberland concluded Peace, which continu'd three Years, by whomsoever broken; for at the end thereof King Edward raising great Forces out of West-Sex, and Mercia, sent them against the Danes beyond Humber; where staying five Weeks, they made great Spoil and Slaughter. The King offer'd them Terms of Peace, but they rejecting all, enter'd with the next Year into Mercia, rendring no less Hostility than they had suffer'd; but at Tetnal in Staffordshire, saith Florent, were by the English in a set Battel otherthrown. King Edward then in Kent, had got together of Ships about a Hundred Sail, others gone Southward, came back and met him. The Danes now supposing that his main Forces were upon the Sea, took Liberty to rove and plunder up and down, as hope of Prey led them, beyond Severn. The King guessing what might embolden them, sent before him the lightest of his Army to entertain them; then following with the rest, set upon them in their return over Cantbrig in Gloucestershire, and slew many Thousands, among whom Ecwils, Hafden, and Hinguar their Kings, and many other harsh Names in Huntingdon; the Place also of this Fight is variously written by

Ethelwerd and Florent, call'd Wodensfield. The Year following Ethelred Duke of Mercia, to whom Alfred had given London, with his Daughter in Marriage; now dying, King Edward resum'd that City, and Oxford, with the Countries adjoining, into his own hands, and the Year after, built, or much repair'd by his Soldiers, the Town of Hertford on either side Lee, and leaving a sufficient Number at the Work, march'd about middle Summer, with the other part of his Forces into Essex, and encamp'd at Maldon, while his Soldiers built Witham; where a good part of the Country, subject formerly to the Danes, yielded themselves to his Protection. Four Years after (Florent allows but one Year) the Danes from Leister and Northampton, falling into Oxfordshire, committed much Rapine, and in some Towns thereof great Slaughter; while another Party waisting Hertfordshire, met with other Fortune; for the Country-people inur'd now to such kind of Incurfions, joining stoutly together, fell upon the Spoilers, recover'd their own Goods, with some Booty from their Enemies. About the same time Elsed the King's Sister sent her Army of Mercians into Wales, who routed the Welch, took the Castle of ^a Brecenam-mere by Brecknock, and brought away the King's Wife of that Country, with other Prisoners. Not long after she took Derby from the Danes, and the Castle by a sharp Assault. But the Year ensuing brought a new Fleet of Danes to Lidwic in Devonshire, under two Leaders, Otter and Roald; who sailing thence Westward about the Lands End, came up to the Mouth of Severn; there landing waisted the Welch Coast, and Irebenfield part of Herefordshire; where they took Kuteleac a British Bishop, for whose Ransome King Edward gave forty Pound, but the Men of Hereford and Glocestershire assembling, put them to flight; slaying Roald and the Brother of Otter, with many more, pursu'd them to a Wood, and there beset, compell'd them to give Hostages of present Departure. The King with his Army far not far off, securing from the South of Severn to Avon; so that openly they durst not, by Night they twice ventur'd to land; but found such welcome, that few of them came back; the rest anchor'd by a small Island where many of them famish'd; then sailing to a Place call'd Deomied, they cross'd into Ireland. The King with his Army went to Buckingham, staid there a Month, and built two Castles or Forts on either Bank of Onse ere his departing, and Turkitel a Danish Leader, with those of Bedford and Northampton, yielded him Subjection. Whereupon the next Year he came with his Army to the Town of Bedford, took Possession thereof, staid there a Month, and gave order to build another part of the Town, on the South-side of Onse. Thence the Year following went again to Maldon, repair'd and fortifi'd the Town. Turkitel the Dane having small hope to thrive here, where things with such Prudence were manag'd against his Interest, got leave of the King, with as many Voluntaries as would follow him, to pass in to France. Early the next Year King Edward re-edifi'd Tovecheester, now Torchester; and ano-

^c The next Year 914. the Danes committed great Outrages in Buckinghamshire about Bernwood, and destroy'd an ancient Roman Burgh, which stood where now Briel stands.

^d Brecenannmere is the right Name: In English Brecknock Mere.

^e Where they besieg'd an Island, which Florent of Worcester calls Reoric, suppos'd to be Stepholm; and when they had taken it, were almost starv'd with Hunger. This Island is now of no Use nor Defence, yielding nothing fit for Humane Nourishment: It lies about two Leagues from the Shoar, over-against Uphill in Somersetshire.

^f Deomod the Saxon Annals call it. 'Tis no particular Place, but a Country; the same which the Ancients call'd Demeta, including Carmarthenshire, Pembrokeshire, and Cardiganshire.

A. D. 921. ther City in the Annals call'd Wigingmere. Mean while the Danes of Leister and Northampton-shire; not liking perhaps to be Neighbour'd with strong Towns, laid Siege to Torchester, but they within, repelling the Assault one whole Day till Supplies came, quitted the Siege by Night; and pursu'd close by the besieged, between Birnwood^a and Ailbury were surpriz'd, many of them made Prisoners, and much of their Baggage lost. Other of the Danes at Huntingdon, aided from the East-Angles, finding that Castle not commodious, left it, and built another at Temsford, judging that Place more opportune from whence to make their Excursions; and soon after went forth with design to assail Bedford: But the Garrison issuing out, slew a great part of them, the rest fled. After this, a great Army of them gather'd out of Mercia and the East-Angles, came and besieg'd the City call'd Wigingmere a whole Day; but finding it defended stoutly by them within, thence also departed, driving away much of their Cattel: Whereupon the English, from Towns and Cities round about joining Forces, laid Siege to the Town and Castle of Temsford, and by Assault took both; slew their King with Togla a Duke, and Mannan his Son an Earl, with all the rest there found; who chose to die rather than yield. Encourag'd by this, the Men of Kent, Surrey, and part of Essex, enterprize the Siege of Colchester, nor gave over till they won it, sack'd the Town, and putting to Sword all the Danes therein, except some who escap'd over the Wall. To the Succour of these, a great number of Danes inhabiting Ports and other Towns in the East-Angles, united their Forces; but coming too late, as in Revenge beleagu'd Maldon; but that Town also timely reliev'd, they departed, not only frustrate of their Design, but so hotly pursu'd, that many Thousands of them lost their Lives in the Flight. Forthwith King Edward, with his West-Saxons, went to Passham upon Ouse, there to guard the Passage, while others were building a Stone Wall about Torchester; to him the Earl Thurfert, and other Lord Danes, with their Army thereabout as far as Woolud, came and submitted. Whereat the King's Soldiers joyfully cry'd out to be dismiss'd home: Therefore with another part of them he enter'd Huntingdon, and repair'd it, where Breaches had been made; all the People thereabout returning to Obedience. The like was done at Colchester by the next remove of his Army, after which both East and West-Angles, and the Danish Forces among them, yielded to the King, swearing Allegiance to him both by Sea and Land: The Army also of Danes at Grantbrig, surrendering themselves took the same Oath. The Summer following he came with his Army to Stamford, built a Castle there on the South-side of the River, where all the People of those Quarters acknowledg'd him Supream. During his abode there, Elfred his Sister a Martial Woman, who after her Husband's Death would no more marry, but gave her self to Publick Affairs, repairing and fortifying many Towns, warring sometimes, dy'd at Tamworth the chief Seat of Mercia, whereof by Gift of Alfred her Father, she was Lady or Queen; whereby that whole Nation became obedient to King Edward, as did also North-Wales, with Howel, Cledaucus, and Jeothwell their Kings. Thence passing to Nottingham, he enter'd and repair'd the Town, plac'd there part English, part Danes, and receiv'd Fealty from all in Mercia of either Nation. The next Autumn, coming with his Army into Cheeshire, he built and fortify'd Thelwel; and while he staid there, call'd another Army out of Mercia, which he sent to repair and fortify Manchester. About Mid-summer following, he march'd again to Nottingham, built a Town over-against it on the South-side of that River, and with a Bridge joyn'd them both; thence journeyed to a Place call'd Bedecanwillan in Pisland; there also built and fenc'd a City on the Borders, where the King of Scots did him Honour as to his Sovereign, together with the whole Scotish Nation; the like did Reginald and the Son of Eadulf, Danish Princes, with all the Northumbrians, both English and Danes. The King also of a People thereabout call'd Streagledwalli (the North-Welch, as Cambden thinks, of Strat-Cluid in Denbigh-shire, perhaps rather the British of Cumberland) did him Homage, and not undeserv'd. For Buchanan himself confesses, that this King Edward, with a small number of Men compar'd to his Enemies, overthrew in a great Battel, the whole United Power both of Scots and Danes, slew most of the Scotish Nobility, and forc'd Malcolm, whom Constantine the Scotish King had made General, and design'd Heir of his Crown, to save himself by flight, fore wounded. Of the English, he makes Arhelstan the Son of Edward Chief Leader; and so far seems to confound Times and Actions, as to make this Battel the same with that fought by Arhelstan, about twenty four Years after at Bruneford, against Anlaf and Constantine, whereof hereafter. But here Buchanan takes occasion to inveigh against the English Writers, upbraiding them with Ignorance, who affirm Arhelstan to have been Supream King of Britain, Constantine the Scotish King with others to have held of him; and denies that in the Annals of Marianus Scotus, any mention is to be found thereof; which I shall not stand much to contradict, for in Marianus, whether by Sirname or by Nation Scotus, will be found as little mention of any other Scotish Affairs, till the time of King Dunbad slain by Macbetad, or Mackbeth, in the Year 1040. which gives Cause of Suspicion, that the Affairs of Scotland before that time were so obscure as to be unknown to their own Country-man, who liv'd and wrote his Chronicle not long after. But King Edward thus nobly doing, and thus honour'd, the Year following dy'd at Farendon; a Builder and Restorer even in War, not a Destroyer of his Land. He had by several Wives many Children; his Eldest Daughter Edgith, he gave in Marriage to Charles King of France, Grand-child of Charles the Bald above mention'd; of the rest in Place convenient. His Laws are yet to be seen. He was buried at Winchester, in the Monastery by Alfred his Father. And a few Days after him dy'd Ethelwerd his Eldest Son, the Heir of his Crown. He had the whole Island in Subjection, yet so as petty Kings reign'd under him. In Northumberland, after Ecbert whom the Danes had set up, and the Northumbrians yet unruly under their Yoke, at the end of six Years had expell'd, one Ricfig was set up King, and

^b This is an Error which has been handed down to our Historians by Marianus, who mistook the Saxon Annals. These do not tell us, that King Edward repair'd Manchester, but that he repair'd many ceapen, i. e. Many Cities: Which is certainly the Sense of the Place.

^c The Cottonian Copy of the Saxon Annals relate, that he went from Nottingham into Peakland, the Peak in Darbyshire, and thence to Bedecanwell, suppos'd to be Bakewell in that County.

A. D. bore the Name three Years; then another Ecbert, and Gutbred; the latter if we believe Legends, of a Servant made King by Command of St. Cudbert, in a Vision; and enjoy'd by another Vision of the same Saint, to pay well for his Royalty many Lands and Privileges to his Church and Monastery. But now to the Story.

ATHELSTAN.

926. *A*thelstan next in Age to Ethelward his Brother, who deceas'd untimely few Days before, though born of a Concubine, yet for the great Appearance of many Vertues in him, and his Brethren being yet under Age, was exalted to the Throne, at Kingstone upon Thames, and by his Father's last Will, faith Malmfbury, yet not without some Opposition of one Alfred and his Accomplices; who not liking he should reign, had conspir'd to seize on him after his Father's Death, and to put out his Eyes. But the Conspiratours discover'd, and Alfred denying the Plot, was sent to Rome, to assert his Innocence before the Pope; where taking his Oath on the Altar, he fell down immediately, and carried out by his Servants, three Days after dy'd. Mean while beyond Humber, the Danes, though much aw'd were not idle. Inguald, one of their Kings, took Possession of York. Sitric, who some Years before had slain Niel his Brother, by force took Davenport in Cheshire; and however he defended these Doings, grew so considerable, that Athelstan with great Solemnity gave him his Sister Edgith to Wife: But he enjoy'd her not long, dying ere the Year's end, nor his Sons Anlaf and Guthfert the Kingdom, driven out the next Year by Athelstan; not unjustly faith Huntingdon, as being first Raisers of the War. Simeon calls him Gudfrid a British King, whom Athelstan this Year drove out of his Kingdom; and perhaps they were both one, the Name and Time not much differing, the Place only mistaken. Malmfbury differs in the Name also, calling him Aldulf a certain Rebel. Them also I wish as much mistaken, who write that Athelstan, jealous of his younger Brother Edwin's towardly Vertues, left added to the Right of Birth, they might some time or other call in question his illegitimate Precedence, caus'd him to be drown'd in the Sea; expos'd, some say, with one Servant in a rotten Bark, without Sail or Oar; where the Youth far off Land, and in rough Weather despairing, threw himself over-board; the Servant more patient, got to Land † and reported the Success. But this Malmfbury confesses to be sung in old Songs, not read in warrantable Authors: And Huntingdon speaks as of a sad Accident to Athelstan, that he lost his Brother Edwin by Sea; far the more credible, in that Athelstan, as is written by all, tenderly lov'd, and bred up the rest of his Brethren, of whom he had no less Cause to be jealous. And the Year following he prosper'd better than from so foul a Fact, passing into Scotland with great Puissance, both by Sea and Land, and chasing his Enemies before him, by Land as far as Dunfeoder, and Wertermore, by Sea as far as Catbness. The Cause of this Expedition, faith Malmfbury, was to demand Gudfert the Son of Sitric, thither fled, though not deny'd at length by Constantine, who with Eugenius King of Cumberland, at a Place A. D. call'd Dacor or Dacre in that Shire, surrender'd 934. himself and each his Kingdom to Athelstan, who brought back with him for Hostage the Son of Constantine. But Gudfert escaping in the mean Florent. while out of Scotland, and Constantine exasperated by this Invasion, perswaded Anlaf the other Son of Sitric then fled into Ireland, others write Anlaf Florent. King of Ireland and the Isles, his Son-in-Law, with Sim. Dun. 615 Ships, and the King of Cumberland with other Forces, to his Aid. This within four Years effected, 928. they enter'd England by Humber, and fought with Sax. An. Athelstan at a Place call'd Wendune, others term it Malmfb. * Brunanburg, others Bruneford, which Ingulf places beyond Humber, Cambden in Glendale of Nor- * Bromwig in the County of Northumb- thumberland on the Scotch Borders; the bloodiest berland. Fight, say Authors, that ever this Island saw, to describe which, the Saxon Annalist went to be sober and succinct, whether the same or another Writer, now labouring under the Weight of his Argument, and over-charg'd, runs on a sudden into such extravagant Fancies and Metaphors, as bear him quite beside the Scope of being understood. Huntingdon, though himself peccant enough in this kind, transcribes him word for word as a Pastime to his Readers. I shall only sum up what I can attain, in usual Language. The Battel was fought eagerly from Morning till Night; some fell of King Edward's old Army, try'd in many a Battel before; but on the other side great Multitudes, the rest fled to their Ships. Five Kings, and seven of Anlaf's Chief Captains were slain on the Place, with Froda a Norman Leader; Constantine escap'd home, but lost his Son in the Fight, if I understand my Author; Anlaf by Sea to Dublin, with a small remainder of his great Host. Malmfbury relates this War, adding many Circumstances after this manner. That Anlaf joyning with Constantine and the whole Power of Scotland, besides those which he brought with him out of Ireland, came on far Southwards, till Athelstan who had retir'd on set purpose to be the surer of his Enemies, enclosed from all Succour and Retreat, met him at Bruneford. Anlaf perceiving the Valour and Resolution of Athelstan, and mistrusting his own Forces though numerous, resolv'd first to spy in what Posture his Enemies lay: And imitating perhaps what he heard attempted by King Alfred the Age before, in the Habit of a Musician, got access by his Lute and Voice to the King's Tent, there playing both the Minstrel and the Spy: Then towards Evening dismiss'd, he was observ'd by one who had been his Soldier and well knew him, viewing earnestly the King's Tent, and what Approaches lay about it, then in the Twilight to depart. The Soldier forthwith acquaints the King, and by him blamed for letting go his Enemy, answer'd, that he had given first his Military Oath to Anlaf, whom if he had betray'd, the King might suspect him of like treasonous Mind towards himself; which to disprove, he advis'd him to remove his Tent a good distance off; and so done, it happen'd that a Bishop with his Retinue coming that Night to the Army, pitch'd his Tent in the same Place, from whence the King had remov'd. Anlaf coming by Night, as he had design'd to assault the Camp, and especially the King's Tent, finding there the Bishop in stead, slew him with all his Followers. Athelstan took the Alarm, and as it seems, was not found so unprovided, but that

* He was crown'd by Athelm Bishop of Canterbury, on a Scaffold erected for that purpose, in the midst of the Town.

† What he calls extravagant Fancies, is nothing but a Passage in Imitation of Cadmon's Verse, which was the Standard of Poetry among the Saxons. This Cadmon, says Mr. Cambden in his Remains, about the Year 680. became so Divine a Poet in our English Tongue, that with his sweet Verses he withdrew many from Vice to Virtue.

A. D. 928. the Day now appearing, he put his Men in order, and maintain'd the Fight till Evening; wherein Constantine himself was slain with five other King's, and twelve Earls, the Annals were content with seven, in the rest not disagreeing. Ingulf Abbot of Croyland, from the Authority of Turketul a principal Leader in this Battel, relates it more at large to this effect: That Atbelstan, above a Mile distant from the Place where Execution was done upon the Bishop and his Supplies, alarm'd at the Noise, came down by break of Day, upon Anlaf and his Army, overwatch'd and wearied now with the Slaughter they had made, and something out of order, yet in two main Battels. The King therefore in like manner dividing, led the one part, consisting most of West-Saxons, against Anlaf with his Danes and Irisb, committing the other to his Chancellor Turketul, with the Mercians and Londoners against Constantine and his Scots. The Shower of Arrows and Darts over-pass'd, both Battels attack'd each other with a close and terrible Engagement, for a long space neither side giving Ground. Till the Chancellor Turketul a Man of great Stature and Strength, taking with him a few Londoners of select Valour, and Singin who led the Worstershire Men, a Captain of undaunted Courage, broke into the thickest, making his way first through the Picts and Orkeners, then through the Cumbrians and Scots, and came at length where Constantine himself fought, unhors'd him, and us'd all means to take him alive; but the Scots valiantly defending their King, and laying load upon Turketul, which the Goodness of his Armour well endur'd, he had yet been beaten down, had not Singin his faithful Second at the same time slain Constantine; which once known, Anlaf and the whole Army betook them to flight, whereof a huge Multitude fell by the Sword. This Turketul not long after leaving Worldly Affairs, became Abbot of Croyland, which at his own Cost he had repair'd from Danish Ruins, and left there this Memorial of his former Actions. Atbelstan with his Brother Edmund victorious, thence turning into Wales, with much more ease vanquish'd Ludwal the King, and possess'd his Land. But Malmfbury writes, that commiserating humane Chance, as he displac'd, so he restor'd both him and Constantine to their Regal State; for the surrender of King Constantine hath been above spoken of. However the Welch did him Homage at the City of Hereford, and covenanted Yearly Payment of Gold 20 Pound, of Silver 300, of Oxen 25 thousand, besides Hunting Dogs and Hawks. He also took Exeter from the Cornish Britains, who till that time had equal Right there with the English, and bounded them with the River Tamar, as the other British with Wey. Thus dreaded of his Enemies, and renown'd far and near, three Years after he dy'd at Gloster, and was buried with many Trophies at Malmfbury, where he had caus'd to be laid his two Cofin Germans, Elwin and Ethelstan, both slain in the Battel against Anlaf. He was thirty Years old at his coming to the Crown, mature in Wisdom from his Childhood, comely of Person and Behaviour; so that Alfred his Grandfather in Blessing him was wont to pray he might live to have the Kingdom, and put him yet a Child into Soldiers Habit. He had his Breeding in the Court of Elfred his Aunt, of whose Vertues more than Female we have related, sufficient to evince that his Mother, though said to be no wedded Wife, was yet such of Parentage and Worth, as the Royal Line disdain'd not, though the Song went in Malmfbury's Days (for it seems he refus'd not the Authority of Ballads for want of better) that his Mother was A. D. 941. a Farmer's Daughter, but of excellent Feature; who dreamt one Night she brought forth a Moon that should enlighten the whole Land: Which the King's Nurse hearing of, took her home and bred up Courtly; that the King coming one Day to visit his Nurse, saw there this Damsel, lik'd her, and by earnest Suit prevailing, had by her this famous Atbelstan, a bounteous, just and affable King, as Malmfbury sets him forth; nor less honour'd abroad by Foreign Kings, who sought his Friendship by great Gifts or Affinity; that Harold King of Noricum sent him a Ship, whose Prow was of Gold, Sails Purple, and other Golden things, the more to be wonder'd at, sent from Noricum, whether meant Norway or Bavaria, the one place so far from such Superfluity of Wealth, the other from all Sea: The Embassadors were Helgrim and Offrid, who found the King at Tork. His Sisters he gave in Marriage to greatest Princes, Elgif to Orbo Son of Henry the Emperour, Egdiib to a certain Duke about the Alpes, Edgiv to Ludwic King of Aquitain, sprung of Charles the Great, Etbilda to Hugo King of France, who sent Aldulf Son of Baldwin, Earl of Flanders, to obtain her. From all these great Suitors, especially from the Emperour and King of France came rich Presents, Horses of excellent Breed, gorgeous Trappings and Armour, Reliques, Jewels, Odors, Vessels of Onyx, and other precious things, which I leave Poetically describ'd in Malmfbury, taken, as he confesses, out of an old Versifier, some of whose Verses he recites. The only Blemish left upon him, was the exposing of his Brother Edwin, who disavow'd by Oath the Treason whereof he was accus'd, and implor'd an equal hearing. But these were Songs, as before hath been said, which add also that Atbelstan, his Anger over, soon repent-ed of the Fact, and put to Death his Cup-bearer, who had induc'd him to suspect and expose his Brother, put in mind by a word falling from the Cup-bearer's own Mouth, who slipping one Day as he bore the King's Cup, and recovering himself on the other Leg, said aloud, fatally as to him it proved, one Brother helps the other. Which words the King laying to Heart, and pondering how ill he had done to make away his Brother, aveng'd himself first on the Adviser of that Fact, took on him seven Years Penance, and as Mar. West. faith, built two Monasteries for the Soul of his Brother. His Laws are extant among the Laws of other Saxon Kings to this Day.

EDMUND.

Edmund not above eighteen Years old succeed-ed his Brother Atbelstan, in Courage not inferior. For in the second of his Reign he freed Mercia of the Danes that remain'd there, and took from them the Cities of Lincoln, Nottingham, Stamford, Darby, and Leister, where they were plac'd by King Edward, but it seems gave not good Proof of their Fidelity. Simeon writes that Anlaf setting forth from Tork, and having wasted Southward as far as Northampton, was met by Edmund at Leister; but that e're the Battels joyn'd, Peace was made between them by Odo and Wulstan the two Arch-bishops, with Conversion of Anlaf; for the same Year Edmund receiv'd at the Font-stone this or another Anlaf, as faith Huntingdon, not him spoken of before, who dy'd this Year (so uncertain they are in the Story of these Times also) and held Reginald another King of the Northumbers, while the Bishop

But spiritual Kindred little avail'd to keep Peace between them, whoever gave the Cause; for we read him two Years after driving Anlaf (whom the Annals now first call the Son of Sivric) and Suthfrid Son of Reginald out of Northumberland, taking the whole Country into Subjection. Edmund the next Year harra's'd Cumberland, then gave it to Malcolm King of Scots, thereby bound to assist him in his Wars, both by Sea and Land; Mat. West. adds that in this Action Edmund had the Aid of Leolin Prince of North-Wales, against Dummail the Cumbrian King, him depriving of his Kingdom, and his two Sons of their Sight. But the Year after, he himself by strange Accident came to an untimely Death, feasting with his Nobles on St. Austin's Day at Puckle-kerke in Glostershire, to celebrate the Memory of his first converting the Saxons. He spy'd Leof a noted Thief, whom he had banish'd, sitting among his Guests; whereat transported with too much Vehemence of Spirit, though in a just Cause, rising from the Table he ran upon the Thief, and catching his Hair, pull'd him to the Ground. The Thief who doubted from such handling no less than his Death intended, thought to die not unreveng'd; and with a short Dagger struck the King, who still laid at him, and little expected such Assassination, mortally into the Breast. The Matter was done in a Moment, ere Men set at Table could turn them, or imagine at first what the stir meant, till perceiving the King deadly wounded, they flew upon the Murderer and hew'd him to pieces; who like a wild Beast at abbay, seeing himself surrounded, desperately laid about him, wounding some in his fall. The King was buried at Glaston, whereof Dunstan was then Abbot, his Laws yet remain to be seen among the Laws of other Saxon Kings.

EDRED.

948. Edred the third Brother of Athelstan, the Sons of Edmund being yet but Children, next reign'd, not degenerating from his worthy Predecessors, and crown'd at Kingston. Northumberland he thoroughly subdu'd, the Scots without Refusal swore him Allegiance; yet the Northumbrians, ever of doubtful Faith, soon after chose to themselves one Eric, a Dane. Huntingdon still haunts us with this Anlaf (of whom we gladly would have been rid) and will have him before Eric recall'd once more and reign four Years, then again put to his shifts. But Edred entering into Northumberland, and with Spoils returning, Eric the King fell upon his Rear. Edred turning about, both shook off the Enemy, and prepar'd to make a second Inroad: Which the Northumbrians dreading rejected Eric, slew Amanus the Son of Anlaf, and with many Presents appeasing Edred, submitted again to his Government; nor from that time had Kings, but were govern'd by Earls, of whom Osulf was the first. 950. Sim. Dun. About this time Wulstan Arch-bishop of York, accus'd to have slain certain Men of Tberford, in revenge of their Abbot whom the Towns-men had slain, was committed by the King to close Custody; but soon after enlarg'd, was restor'd to his Place. Malmibury writes that his Crime was to have conniv'd at the Revolt of his Countrymen: But King Edred two Years after sickning in the Flower of his Youth, dy'd much lamented, and was buried at Winchester. A. D. 957. Sim. Dun.

EDWI.

Edwi the Son of Edmund now come to Age, after his Uncle Edred's Death took on him the Government, and was crown'd at Kingston. His lovely Person firnamed him the Fair, his Actions are diversly reported, by Huntingdon not thought illaudable. But Malmibury and such as follow him write far otherwise, that he married or kept as Concubine, his near Kinswoman, some say both her and her Daughter; so inordinately given to his Pleasure, that on the very Day of his Coronation, he abruptly withdrew himself from the Company of his Peers, whether in Banquet or Consultation, to sit wantoning in the Chamber with this Algiwa, so was her Name, who had such Power over him. Whereat his Barons offended, sent Bishop Dunstan, the boldest among them, to request his return: He going to the Chamber, not only interrupted his Dalliance and rebuk'd the Lady, but taking him by the hand, between Force and Perswasion brought him back to his Nobles. The King highly displeas'd, and instigated perhaps by her who was so prevalent with him, not long after sent Dunstan into Banishment, caus'd his Monastery to be rifl'd, and became an Enemy to all Monks. Whereupon Odo Arch-bishop of Canterbury pronounc'd a Separation or Divorce of the King from Algiwa. But that which most incited William of Malmibury against him, he gave that Monastery to be dwelt in by Secular Priests, or, to use his own Phrase, made it a Stable of Clerks; at length these Affronts done to the Church were so resented by the People, that the Mercians and Northumbrians revolted from him, and set up Edgar his Brother, leaving to Edwi the West-Saxons only, bounded by the River Thames; with Grief whereof, as is thought, he soon after ended his Days, and was buried at Winchester. Mean while Elfsin Bishop of that Place after the Death of Odo, ascending by Simony to the Chair of Canterbury, and going to Rome the same Year for his Pall, was frozen to Death in the Alps. 956. Hoveden. 957. *Sax. EDGAR.

Edgar by his Brother's Death now King of all England at sixteen Years of Age, called home Dunstan out of Flanders, where he liv'd in Exile. This King had no War all his Reign; yet always well prepar'd for War, govern'd the Kingdom in great Peace, Honour and Prosperity, gaining thence the Sirname of Peaceable, much extoll'd for Justice, Clemency, and all Kingly Vertues, the more, ye may be sure, by Monks, for his building so many Monasteries; as some write, every Year one: For he much favour'd the Monks against secular Priests, who in the time of Edwi had got Possession in most of their Covents. His Care and Wisdom was great in guarding the Coast round with stout Ships, to the number of three thousand six hundred, Mat. West. reckons them four thousand eight hundred, divided into four Squadrons, to sail to and fro about the four quarters of the Land meeting

D. 959. each other; the first of one thousand two hundred Sail from East to West, the second of as many from West to East, the third and fourth between North and South, himself in the Summer time with his Fleet. Thus he kept out wisely the force of Strangers, and prevented Foreign War; but by their too frequent resort hither in time of Peace, and his too much favouring them, he let in their Vices unaware. Thence the People, saith Malmsbury, learnt of the Outlandish Saxons Rudeness, of the Flemish Daintiness and Softness, of the Danes Drunkenness; though I doubt these Vices are as naturally home-bred here as in any of those Countries. Yet in the Winter and Spring-time he usually rode the Circuit as a Judge Itinerant through all his Provinces, to see Justice well administered, and the poor not oppress'd. Thieves and Robbers he routed almost out of the Land, and wild Beasts of Prey altogether; enjoying Lutwiel King of Wales to pay the Yearly Tribute of three hundred Wolves, which he did for two Years together, till the third Year no more were to be found, nor ever after; but his Laws may be read yet extant. Whatever was the Cause he was not crown'd till the 30th of his Age, but then with great Splendour and Magnificence at the City of Bath, in the Feast of Pentecost. This Year dy'd Swarling a Monk of Croyland, in the 142 Year of his Age, and another soon after him in the 115th in that Fenny and Watrith Air, the more remarkable. King Edgar the next Year went to Chester, and summoning to his Court there all the Kings that held of him, took Homage of them: Their Names are Kened King of Scots, Malcolm of Cumberland, Maccuse of the Isles, five of Wales, Duswal, Huwel, Griffith, Jacob, Judethil, these he had in such awe, that going one Day into a Gally, he caus'd them to take each Man his Oar, and row him down the River Dee, while he himself sat at the Stern: Which might be, done in Merriment easily obey'd; it with a serious Brow, discover'd rather Vain-Glory, and insulting Haughtiness, than Moderation of Mind. And that he did it seriously triumphing, appears by his Words then utter'd, That his Successors might then glory to be Kings of England, when they had such Honour done them. And perhaps the Divine Power was displeas'd with him for taking too much Honour to himself; since we read that the Year following he was taken out of this Life by Sickness in the height of his Glory and the prime of his Age, buried at Glaston Abby. The same Year, as Mat. West. relates, he gave to Kened the Scotish King, many rich Presents, and the whole Country of Laudian, or Lothien, to hold of him on condition that he and his Successors should repair to the English Court at high Festivals when the King sat crown'd; gave him also many lodging Places by the way, which till the Days of Henry the second were still held by the Kings of Scotland. He was of Stature not tall, of Body slender, yet so well made, that in Strength he chose to contend with such as were thought strongest, and dislik'd nothing more than that they should spare him for Respect or Fear to hurt him. Kened King of Scots then in the Court of Edgar, sitting one Day at Table was heard to say jestingly among his Servants, He wonder'd how so many Provinces could be held in Subjection by such a little dapper Man: His Words were brought to the King's Ear; he fends for Kened as about some private Business, A. D. and in Talk drawing him forth to a secret Place, 975. takes from under his Garment two Swords which he had brought with him, gave one of them to Kened; and now saith he, It shall be try'd which ought to be the Subject; for it is shameful for a King to boast at Table, and shrink in Fight. Kened much abash'd fell presently at his Feet, and besought him to pardon what he had simply spoken, no way intended to his Dishonour or Disparagement: Wherewith the King was satisfied. Cambden in his Description of Ireland, cites a Charter of King Edgar, wherein it appears, he had in Subjection all the Kingdoms of the Isles as far as Norway, and had subdu'd the greatest part of Ireland, with the City of Dublin: But of this other Writers make no mention. In his Youth having heard of Elfrida, Daughter to Ordgar Duke of Devonshire, much commended for her Beauty, he sent Earl Arhelwold, whose Loyalty he trusted most, to see her; intending, if she were found such as answer'd report, to demand her in Marriage. He at the first view taken with her Presence, disloyally, as it often happens in such Employments, began to sue for himself; and with consent of her Parents obtain'd her. Returning therefore with scarce an ordinary Commendation of her Feature, he easily took off the King's Mind, soon diverted another way. But the matter coming to light how Arhelwold had forestall'd the King, and Elfrida's Beauty more and more spoken of, the King now heated not only with a Relapse of Love, but with a deep Sense of the Abuse, yet dissembling his Disturbance, pleasantly told the Earl, what Day he meant to come and visit him and his fair Wife. The Earl seemingly assur'd his Welcome, but in the mean while acquainting his Wife, earnestly advis'd her to deform her self, what she might, either in Dress or otherwise, lest the King, whose amorous Inclination was not unknown, should chance to be attracted. She who by this time was not ignorant, how Arhelwold had step'd between her and the King, against his coming Arrays her self richly, using whatever Art she could devise might render her the more amiable; and it took effect. For the King inflam'd with her Love, the more for that he had been so long defrauded and robbed of her, resolv'd not only to recover his intercepted Right, but to punish the Interloper of his destin'd Spouse, and appointing with him as was usual, a Day of Hunting, drawn aside in a Forest, now call'd Harewood, smote him through with a Dart. Some censure this Act as cruel and tyrannical, but consider'd well, it may be judg'd more favourably, and that no Man of sensible Spirit, but in his Place, without extraordinary Perfection, would have done the like: For next to Life, what worse Treason could have been committed against him? It chanc'd that the Earl's base Son coming by upon the Fact, the King sternly ask'd him, How he lik'd this Game; he submissly answering, That whatsoever pleas'd the King, must not displease him; the King return'd to his wonted Temper, took an Affection to the Youth, and ever after highly favour'd him, making amends in the Son for what he had done to the Father. Elfrida forthwith he took to Wife, who to expiate her former Husband's Death, though therein she had no hand, cover'd the Place of his Bloodshed with a Monastery of Nuns to sing over him. Another Fault is laid to his Charge,

King Edgar row'd down the Dee by Kened King of Scotland, Malcolm King of Cumberland, Maccuse King of Man and the Isles, and five Irish and Welsh Kings.

A. D. 975. no way excusable, that he took a Virgin Wilfrida by force out of the Nunnery, where she was plac'd by her Friends to avoid his Pursuit, and kept her as his Concubine; but liv'd not obstinately in the Offence; for sharply reprov'd by Dunstan, he submitted to seven Years Penance, and for that time to want his Coronation: But why he had it not before, is left unwritten. Another Story there goes of Edgar, fitter for a Novel than a History; but as I find it in Malmfbury, so I relate it. While he was yet unmarried, in his Youth he abstain'd not from Women, and coming on a Day to Andover, caus'd a Duke's Daughter there dwelling, reported rare of Beauty, to be brought to him. The Mother not daring flatly to deny, yet abhorring that her Daughter should be so deflowr'd, at fit time of Night sent in her Attire, one of her waiting Maids; a Maid it seems not unhandsome nor unwitty; who supply'd the Place of her young Lady. Night pass'd, the Maid going to rise, but Day-light scarce yet appearing, was by the King ask'd why she made such haste, she answer'd, to do the Work which her Lady had set her; at which the King wondring, and with much ado staying her to unfold the Riddle, for he took her to be the Duke's Daughter, she falling at his Feet besought him, that since at the Command of her Lady she came to his Bed, and was enjoy'd by him, he would be pleas'd in Remembrance to set her free from the hard Service of her Mistress. The King a while standing in a study whether he had best be angry or not, at length turning all to a Jest, took the Maid away with him, advanc'd her above her Lady, lov'd her, and accompanied with her only, till he married Elfrida. These only are his faults upon Record, rather to be wonder'd how they were so few, and so soon left, he coming at sixteen to the Licence of a Scepter; and that his Vertues were so many and so mature, he dying before the Age wherein Wisdom can in others attain to any Ripeness: However with him dy'd all the Saxon Glory. From henceforth nothing is to be heard of but their decline and ruin under a double Conquest, and the Causes foregoing; which, not to blur or taint the Praises of their former Actions and Liberty well defended, shall stand severally related, and will be more than long enough for another Book.

THE History of ENGLAND,

Continu'd to the NORMAN CONQUEST.

By Mr. JOHN MILTON. Book VI.

EDWARD the Younger.

Edward the Eldest Son of Edgar by Egelfreda his first Wife, the Daughter of Duke Ordmer, was according to Right and his Father's Will, plac'd in the Throne; Elfrida his second Wife, and her Faction only repining, who labour'd to have had her Son Ethelred, a Child of seven Years, prefer'd before him; that she under that Pretence might have rul'd all. Mean while Comets were seen in Heaven, portending not Famine only, which follow'd the next Year, but the troubl'd State of the whole Realm not long after to ensue. The Troubles begun in Edwin's Days, between Monks and Secular Priests, now reviv'd and drew on either side many of the Nobles into Parties. For Elfere Duke of the Mercians, with many other Peers, corrupted as is said with Gifts, drove the Monks out of those Monasteries where Edgar had plac'd them, and in their stead put Secular Priests with their Wives. But Ethelwin Duke of East-Angles, with his Brother Elfwold, and Earl Britnot oppos'd them, and gathering an Army defended the Abbies of East-Angles from such Intruders. To appease these Tumults, a Synod was call'd at Winchester, and nothing there concluded, a General Council both of Nobles and Prelates, was held at Caln in Wiltshire, where while the dispute was hot, but chiefly against Dunstan, the room wherein they sat fell upon their Heads, killing some, maiming others, Dunstan only escaping upon a Beam that fell not, and the King absent by reason of his tender Age. This Accident quieted the Controversie, and brought both Parts to hold with Dunstan and the Monks. Mean while the King addicted to a Religious Life, and of a mild Spirit, simply permitted all things to the ambitious Will of his Stepmother and her Son Ethelred: To whom she displeas'd that the Name only of King was wanting, practis'd thenceforth to remove King Edward out of the way; which in this manner she brought about. Edward on a Day wearied with hunting, thirsty and alone, while his Attendance follow'd the Dogs, hearing that Ethelred and his Mother lodg'd at Corvesgate (Corfe Castle, saith Cambden, in the Isle of Purbeck) innocently went thither. She with all shew of Kindness welcoming him, commanded Drink to be brought forth, for it seems he lighted not from his Horse; and while he was drinking, caus'd one of her Servants, privately before instructed, to stab him with a Poignard. The poor Youth who little expected such Unkindness there, turning speedily the Reins, fled bleeding; till through

Loss

A. D. 978. Loss of Blood falling from his Horse, and expiring, yet held with one Foot in the Stirrop, he was dragg'd along the way, trac'd by his Blood, and buried without Honour at Werham, having reigned about three Years: But the Place of his Burial not long after grew famous for Miracles. After which by Duke Elfer (who, as Malmfbury saith, had a hand in his Death) he was Royally interr'd at Skepton, or Shafsbury. The Murtheress Elfrida at length repenting spent the residue of her Days in Sorrow and great Penance.

ETHELRED.

979. Ethelred second Son of Edgar by Elfrida, (for Edmund dy'd a Child) his Brother Edward wickedly remov'd, was now next in Right to succeed, and accordingly crown'd at Kingstone: Reported by some, fair of Visage, comely of Person, elegant of Behaviour; but the Event will shew, that with many sluggish and ignoble Vices he quickly sham'd his out-side; born and prolong'd a fatal Mischief of the People, and the Ruine of his Country; whereof he gave early Signs from his first Infancy, bewraying the Font and Water while the Bishop was baptizing him. Whereat Dunstan much troubl'd, for he stood by and saw it, to them next him broke into these words, By God and God's Mother this Boy will prove a Sluggard. Another thing is written of him in his Childhood, which argu'd no bad Nature, that hearing of his Brother Edward's cruel Death, he made loud Lamentation; but his furious Mother offended therewith, and having no Rod at hand, beat him so with great Wax Candles, that he hated the Sight of them ever after. Dunstan though unwilling set the Crown upon his Head; but at the same time foretold openly, as is reported, the great Evils that were to come upon him and the Land, in Avengement of his Brother's innocent Blood. And about the same time, one Midnight, a Cloud sometimes bloody, sometimes fiery, was seen over all England; and within three Years the Danish Tempest, which had long surceast, revolv'd again upon this Island. To the more ample relating whereof, the Danish History, at least their latest and diligentest Historian, as neither from the first landing of Danes, in the Reign of West-Saxon Birttric, so now again from first to last, contributes nothing; busied more than enough to make out the bare Names and Successions of their uncertain Kings, and their small Actions at home: Unless out of him I should transcribe what he takes, and I better may, from our own Annals; the surer, and the sadder Witnesses of their Doings here, not Glorious, as they vainly boast, but most inhumanly Barbarous. For the Danes well understanding, that England had now a slothful King to their Will, first landing at Southampton from seven great Ships, took the Town, spoiled the Country, and carried away with them great Pillage; nor was Devonshire and Cornwall uninfested on the Shoar; Pirates of Norway also harried the Coast of West-Chester: And to add a worse Calamity, the City of London was burnt, casually or not, is not written. It chanc'd four Years after, that Ethelred besieg'd Rocheſter, some way or other offended by the Bishop thereof. Dunstan not approving the Cause, sent to warn him that he provoke not St. Andrew the Patron of that City, nor waſt his Lands; an old Craft of the Clergy to secure their Church-Lands, by entailing them on some Saint; the King not hearkning, Dunstan on this condition that the Siege might be rais'd, sent him a hundred Pound, the Money was accepted and the Siege dissolv'd. Dunstan reprehending his Avarice, sent him again this word, Because thou hast respected Money more than Religion, the Evils which I foretold shall the sooner come upon thee; but not in my Days, for so God hath spoken. The next Year was calamitous, bringing strange Fluxes upon Men, and Murrain upon Cattel. Dunstan the Year following dy'd, a strenuous Bishop, zealous without dread of Person, and for ought appears, the best of many Ages, if he busied not himself too much in secular Affairs. He was Chaplain at first to King Arbelftan, and Edmund who succeeded, much employ'd in Court Affairs, till envied by some who laid many things to his Charge, he was by Edmund forbidden the Court, but by the earnest Mediation, saith Ingulf, of Turkitel the Chancellor, receiv'd at length to Favour, and made Abbot of Glaston, lastly by Edgar and the general Vote, Archbishop of Canterbury. Not long after his Death, the Danes, arriving in Devonshire were met by Goda Lieutenant of that Country, and Strenwold a valiant Leader, who put back the Danes, but with Loss of their own Lives. The third Year following, under the Conduct of Justin and Guthmund the Son of Steytan, they landed and spoil'd Ipswich, fought with Brithnot Duke of the East-Angles about Maldon, where they slew him; the Slaughter else had been equal on both sides. These and the like Depredations on every side, the English not able to resist, by Counsel of Siric then Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and two Dukes, Ethelward and Alfric; it was thought best for the present to buy that with Silver which they could not gain with their Iron: And ten thousand Pound was paid to the Danes for Tribute Peace. Which for a while contented; but taught them the ready way how easiest to come by more. The next Year but one they took by Storm and rifl'd Bebbanburgh an ancient City nigh Durham: Sailing thence into the Mouth of Humber, they waſted both sides thereof, Yorkshire and Lindſey, burning and destroying all before them. Against these went out three Noblemen, Fraena, Fritbegift, and Godwin, but being all Danes by the Father's side, willingly began Flight, and forsook their own Forces betray'd to the Enemy. No less Treachery was at Sea; for Alfric the Son of Elfer Duke of Mercia, whom the King for some Offence had banish'd, but now recall'd, sent from London with a Fleet to surprize the Danes, in some Place of Disadvantage, gave them over-night Intelligence thereof, then fled to them himself; which his Fleet, saith Florent, perceiving, pursu'd, took the Ship, but mis'd of his Person; the Londoners by chance grappling with the East-Angles made them fewer, saith my Author, by many thousands. Others say, that by this notice of Alfric, the Danes not only escap'd, but with a great Fleet set upon the English, took many of their Ships, and in Triumph brought them up the Thames, intending to besiege London: For Anlaf King of Norway, and Swane of Denmark, at the head of these, came with ninety four Gallies. The King for this Treason of Alfric, put out his Son's Eyes; but the Londoners both by Land and Water, so valiantly resisted their Besieges, that they were forc'd in one Day with great Loss to give over.

* This seems to be a Monkish Fable, copy'd from the Story of Constantine the VIth Emperour of Constantinople, who is said to have done so, and was thence called Copronymus.

† Then Bishop of Worcester.

A. D. 994. But what they could not on the City, they wreck'd themselves on the Countries round about, waſting with Sword and Fire all Esſex, Kent, and Suſſex. Thence horſing their Foot, diffuſ'd far wider their outrageous Incurſions, without Mercy either to Sex or Age. The ſlothful King inſtead of Warlike Oppoſition in the Field, ſends Embaſſadors to treat about another Payment; the Sum promis'd was now 16000; till which paid, the Danes winter'd at Southampton; Ethelred inviting Anlaf to come and viſit him at Andover: Where he was Royally entertain'd, ſome ſay baptiz'd, or confirm'd, adopted Son by the King, and diſmiſs'd, with great Preſents, promiſing by Oath to depart, and moleſt the Kingdom no more; which he perform'd, but the Calamity ended not ſo, for after ſome Intermiſſion of their Rage for three Years, the other Navy of Danes ſailing about to the Weſt, enter'd Severn, and waſted one while South-Wales, then Cornwall and Devonſhire, till at length they winter'd about Tauiſtoc. For it were an endleſs Work to relate how they wallow'd up and down to every particular Place, and to repeat as oft what Devaſtations they wrought, what Deſolations left behind them, eaſie to be imagin'd. In Sum, the next Year they afflicted Dorſetſhire, Hamſhire, and the Iſle of Wight; by the Engliſh many Reſolutions were taken, many Armies rais'd, but either betray'd by the Falſhood, or diſcourag'd by the Weakneſs of their Leaders, they were put to rout, or diſbanded themſelves. For Soldiers moſt commonly are as their Commanders, without much odds of Valour in one Nation or other, only as they are more or leſs wiſely diſciplin'd and conducted. The following Year brought them back upon Kent, where they enter'd Medway, and beſieg'd Rochefter; but the Kentiſh Men aſſembling, gave them a ſharp Encounter, yet that ſuffic'd not to hinder them from doing as they had done in other Places. Againſt theſe Depopulations, the King leavied an Army; but the unſkilful Leaders not knowing what to do with it when they had it, did but drive out time, burthening and impoveriſhing the People, conſuming the publick Treafure, and more emboldening the Enemy, than if they had ſat quiet at home. What Cauſe mov'd the Danes next Year to paſs into Normandy, is not recorded; but that they return'd thence more outrageous than before. Mean while the King, to make ſome Diſverſion, undertakes an Expedition both by Land and Sea into Cumberland, where the Danes were moſt planted; there and in the Iſle of Man, or as Cambden ſaith, Angleſey, imitating his Enemies in ſpoiling and unpeopling; the Danes from Normandy arriving in the River Ex, laid ſiege to Exeter; but the Citizens, as thoſe of London, valourouſly defending themſelves, they wreck'd their Anger, as before, on the Villages round about. The Country People of Somerſet and Devonſhire aſſembling themſelves at Penbo, ſhew'd their readineſs, but wanted a Head; and beſides, being then but few in number, were eaſily put to flight; the Enemy plundering all at Will, with loaded Spoils paſs'd into the Iſle of Wight; from whence all Dorſetſhire, and Hamſhire, felt again their Fury. The Saxon Annals write, that before their coming to Exeter, the Hamſhire Men had a bickering with them, wherein Ethelward the King's General was ſlain, adding other things hardly to be underſtood, and in one ancient Copy; ſo end. Ethelred, whom no Adverſity could awake from his ſoft and ſluggiſh Life, ſtill coming by the worſe at fighting, by the Advice of his Peers not unlike himſelf, ſends one of his gay Courtiers, though looking loſtily, to ſtoop baſely and propoſe a third Tribute to the Danes: They willingly kearken, but the Sum is enhanc'd now to twenty four thouſand Pound, and paid; the Danes thereupon abſtaining from Hoſtility. But the King to ſtrengthen his Houſe by ſome Potent Affinity, marries Emma, whom the Saxons call Elgiva, Daughter of Richard Duke of Normandy. With him Ethelred formerly had War or no good Correſpondence, as appears by a Letter of Pope John the 15th, who made Peace between them about eleven Years before; puſt up now with his ſuppos'd acceſs of Strength by this Affinity, he caus'd the Danes all over England, though now living peaceably, in one Day perfidiouſly to be maſſacred, both Men, Women and Children; ſending private Letters to every Town and City, whereby they might be ready all at the ſame Hour; which till the appointed time (being the 9th of July) was conceal'd with great Silence, and perform'd with much Unanimity; ſo generally hated were the Danes. Mat. Weſt. writes, that this Execution upon the Danes was ten Years after; that Huna one of Ethelred's Chief Captains, complaining of the Daniſh Infolencies in time of Peace, their Pride, their raviſhing of Matrons and Virgins, incited the King to this Maſſacre, which in the Madneſs of Rage made no difference of innocent or nocent. Among theſe, Gumbildis the Siſter of Swane was not ſpar'd, though much deſerving not Pity only, but all Protection: She with her Huſband Earl Palingus, coming to live in England, and receiving Chriſtianity, had her Huſband and young Son ſlain before her Face, her ſelf then beheaded; foretelling and denouncing that her Blood would coſt England dear. Some ſay this was done by the Traytor Edric, to whoſe Cuſtody ſhe was committed; but the Maſſacre was ſome Years before Edric's Advancement; and if it were done by him afterward, it ſeems to contradict the private Correſpondence which he was thought to hold with the Danes. For Swane breathing Revenge, haſted the next Year into England, and by the Treason or Negligence of Count Hugh, whom Emma had recommended to the Government of Devonſhire, ſack'd the City of Exeter, her Wall from Eaſt to Weſt-gate, broken down: After this waſting Wiltſhire, the People of that County, and of Hamſhire, came together in great Numbers with Reſolution ſtoutly to oppoſe him, but Alfric their General, whoſe Son's Eyes the King had lately put out, madly thinking to revenge himſelf on the King, by ruining his own Country, when he ſhould have order'd his Battel, the Enemy being at hand, feign'd himſelf taken with a Vomiting; whereby his Army in great Diſcontent, deſtitute of a Commander, turn'd from the Enemy; who ſtreight took Wilton and Salisbury, carrying the Pillage thereof to his Ships. Thence the next Year landing on the Coaſt of Norfolk, he waſted the Country, and ſet Norwich on fire; Ulfketel Duke of the East-Angles, a Man of great Valour, not having ſpace to gather his Forces, after Conſultation had, thought it beſt to make Peace with the Dane, which he breaking within three Weeks, iſſued ſilently out of his Ships, came to Thetford, ſtaid there a Night, and in the Mor-

^a Pen in Somerſetſhire, on the Borders of Dorſetſhire.

^b Old Sarum; for Salisbury, or New Sarum, was not built till the Reign of Henry the 3^d above 200 Years afterwards.

^c He came with his Fleet to Norwich up the River Tare, which was then Navigable.

A. D. 1004. ning left it flaming. Ulfketel hearing this, commanded some to go and break, or burn his Ships; but they not daring or neglecting, he in the mean while with what Secrecy and Speed was possible, drawing together his Forces, went out against the Enemy, and gave them a fierce Onset retreating to their Ships; but much inferior in number, many of the chief East-Angles, there lost their Lives. Nor did the Danes come off without great Slaughter of their own; confessing that they never met in England with so rough a Charge. The next Year, whom War could not, a great Famine drove Swane out of the Land. But the Summer following, another great Fleet of Danes enter'd the Port of Sandwich, thence pour'd out over all Kent and Sussex, made Prey of what they found. The King levying an Army out of Mercia, and the West-Saxons, took on him for once the Manhood to go out and face them; but they who held it safer to live by Rapine, than to hazard a Battel, shifting lightly from Place to Place, frustrated the slow Motions of a heavy Camp, following their wonted Course of Robbery, then running to their Ships. Thus all Autumn they wearied out the King's Army, which gone home to winter, they carried all their Pillage to the Isle of Wight, and there staid till Christmas; at which time the King being in Shropshire, and but ill employ'd (for by the Procurement of Edric, he caus'd, as is thought, Alfhelm a Noble Duke, treacherously to be slain, and the Eyes of his two Sons to be put out) they came forth again, over-running Hampshire, and Berkshire, as far as Reading and Wallingford: Thence to Abdune, and other Places thereabout, neither known nor of tolerable Pronunciation; and returning by another way, found many of the People in Arms by the River Kenet; but making their way through, they got safe with vast Booty to their Ships. The King and his Courtiers wearied out with their last Summer's jaunt after the nimble Danes to no purpose, which by Proof they found too toilsome for their soft Bones, more us'd to Beds and Couches, had recourse to their last and only Remedy, their Coffers; and send now the fourth time to buy a dishonourable Peace, every time still dearer, not to be had now under thirty six thousand Pound (for the Danes knew how to milk such easie Kine) in Name of Tribute and Expences: Which out of the People over all England, already half begger'd, was extorted and paid. About the same time Ethelred advanc'd Edric, surnam'd Streon, from obscure Condition to be Duke of Mercia, and marry Edgitha the King's Daughter. The Cause of his Advancement, Florent of Worster, and Mat. West, attribute to his great Wealth, gotten by fine Policies and a plausible Tongue: He prov'd a main Accessory to the Ruine of England, as his Actions will soon declare. Ethelred the next Year somewhat rousing himself, ordain'd that every three hundred and ten Hides (a Hide is so much Land as one Plow can sufficiently till) should set out a Ship or Gally, and every nine Hides find a Corset and Head-piece: New Ships in every Port were builded, victual'd, fraught with stout Mariners and Soldiers, and appointed to meet all at Sandwich. A Man might now think that all would go well, when suddenly a new Mischiefe sprung up, Dissention among the great ones; which brought all this Diligence to as little Success as at other times before. Bitbric the Brother of Edric, falsely accus'd Wulnoth a great Officer set over the South-Saxons, who fearing the Potency of his Enemies, with twenty Ships got to Sea, and practis'd Piracy on the Coast. Against whom, reported to be in a Place where he might be easily surpriz'd, Bitbric sets forth with eighty Ships, all which driven back by a Tempest, and wrack'd upon the Shoar, were burnt soon after by Wulnoth. Dishearten'd with this Misfortune, the King returns to London; the rest of his Navy after him; and all this great Preparation to nothing. Whereupon Turkill, a Danish Earl, came with a Navy to the Isle of Tanet, and in August a far greater, led by Heming and Ilaf joyn'd with him. Thence coasting to Sandwich, and landed, they went onward and began to assault Canterbury, but the Citizens and East Kentish Men, coming to Composition with them for three thousand Pound, they departed thence to the Isle of Wight, robbing and burning by the way. Against these the King levies an Army through all the Land, and in several Quarters places them nigh the Sea, but so unskilfully or unsuccessfully, that the Danes were not thereby hinder'd from exercising their wonted Robberies. It happen'd that the Danes one Day were gone up into the Country, far from their Ships, the King having notice thereof, thought to intercept them in their return; his Men were resolute to overcome or die, Time and Place advantageous; but where Courage and Fortune was not wanting, there wanted Loyalty among them. Edric with subtle Arguments that had a shew of deep Policy, disputed and perswaded the Simplicity of his Fellow Counsellors, that it would be best consulted at that time to let the Danes pass without Ambush or Interception. The Danes where they expected Danger, finding none, pass'd on with great Joy and Booty to their Ships. After this, sailing about Kent, they lay that Winter in the Thames, forcing Kent and Essex to Contribution, oft-times attempting the City of London, but repuls'd as oft to their great Loss. Spring begun, leaving their Ships, they pass'd through Chiltern Wood into Oxfordshire, burnt the City, and thence returning with divided Forces wait'd on both sides the Thames; but hearing, that an Army from London was march'd out against them, they on the North-side, passing the River at Stanes, join'd with them on the South into one Body, and, enrich'd with great Spoils, came back through Surrey to their Ships; which all the Lent-time they repair'd. After Easter, sailing to the East-Angles they arriv'd at Ipswich, and came to a Place call'd Ringmere, where they heard that Ulfketel with his Forces lay, who with a sharp Encounter soon entertain'd them; but his Men at length giving back, through the Subtlety of a Danish Servant among them who began the Flight, lost the Field, though the Men of Cambridge stood to it valiantly. In this Battel Ethelstan the King's Son-in-Law, with many other Noblemen, was slain; whereby the Danes without more Resistance, three Months together had the spoiling of those Countries and all the Fens, burnt Thetford and Grantbrig, or Cambridge; thence to a Hilly Place not far off, called by Huntingdon Balesham, by Cambden Gogmagog Hills, and the Villages thereabout they turn'd their Fury, slaying all they met save one Man, who getting up into a Steeple, is said to have defended himself against the whole Danish Army. They therefore so leaving him, their Foot by Sea, their Horse by Land through Essex, return'd back laden to their Ships left in the

A. D. Thames. But many Days pass'd not between, 1010. when falling again out of their Ships as out of ~~~~~ Savage Dens, they plunder'd over again all Ox-Huntingd. fordshire, and added to their Prey Buckingham, Bedford, and Hertfordshire; then like wild Beasts glutt'd, returning to their Caves. A third Excursion they made into Northamptonshire, burnt Northampton, ransacking the Country round;
 then as to fresh Pasture betook them to the West-
Saxons, and in like sort harra'sing all Wiltshire, return'd, as I said before, like wild Beasts, or rather Sea-monsters to their Water-stables, accomplishing by Christmas the Circuit of their whole Years good Deeds; an unjust and inhumane Nation, who receiving or not receiving Tribute where none was owing them, made such Destruction of Mankind, and Rapine of their 1011. Livelihood, as is a Misery to read. Yet here Sim. Dun. they ceas'd not, for the next Year repeating the same Cruelties on both sides the Thames, one way as far as Huntingdon, the other as far as Wiltshire and Southampton, sollicit'd again by the King for Peace, and receiving their Demands both of Tribute and Contribution, they slighted their Faith; and in the beginning of Sep- tember laid siege to Canterbury. On the 20th Day, by the Treachery of Almere the Arch-deacon, they took part of it and burnt it, committing all sorts of Massacre as a Sport: Some they threw over the Wall, others into the Fire, hung some by the privy Members, Infants pulled from their Mothers Breasts, were either to's'd on Spears, or Carts drawn over them; Matrons and Virgins by the Hair dragg'd and ravi'sh'd. Alfage the Eadmer. grave Arch-bishop, above others hated of the Malm'b. Danes, as in all Counsels and Actions to his Eadmer. Might their known Opposer, taken, wounded, imprison'd in a noisome Ship; the Multitude are 1012. tith'd, and every tenth only spar'd. Early the Sim. Dun. next Year before Easter, while Ethelred and his Eadmer. Peers were assembl'd at London, to raise now the fifth Tribute amounting to forty eight thousand Pound, the Danes at Canterbury propose to the Arch-bishop, who had been now seven Months their Prisoner, Life and Liberty, if he pay them three thousand Pound; which he refusing as not able of himself, and not willing to extort it from his Tenants, is permitted till the next Sunday to consider; then hal'd before their Council, of whom Turkill was Chief, and still refusing, they rise most of them being drunk, and beat him with the blunt side of their Axes, then thrust forth deliver him to be pelted with Stones;
 till one Thrum a converted Dane, pitying him half dead, to put him out of Pain, with a pious Impiety, at one Stroke of his Ax on the Head dispatch'd him*. His Body was carried to London, and there buried, thence afterward re-mov'd to Canterbury. By this time the Tribute paid and Peace so often violated sworn again by the Danes, they dispers'd their Fleet; forty five of them, and Turkill their Chief staid at London with the King, swore him Allegiance to defend his Land against all Strangers, on condition only to be fed and cloath'd by him. But this voluntary Friendship of Turkill was thought to be deceitful, that staying under this Pretence he gave Intelligence to Swane, when it would be 1013. most seasonable to come. In July therefore of Sim. Dun.

the next Year, King Swane arriving at Sand- A. D.
wich, made no stay there, but sailing first to 1012.
Humber, thence into Trent, landing and encamp'd at Gainsborough: Whither without delay repair'd to him the Northumbrians, with Urbred their Earl; those of Lindsey also, then those of Fisburg, and lastly all on the North of Watling- street (which is a High-way from East to West Sea) gave Oath and Hostages to obey him.
 From whom he commanded Horses and Provision for his Army, taking with him besides Bands and Companies of their choicest Men; and committing to his Son Canute the Care of his Fleet and Hostages; he marches towards the South Mercians, commanding his Soldiers to exercise all Acts of Hostility; with the Terrour whereof fully executed, he took in few Days the City of Oxford, then Winchester; thence tending to London, in his hasty Passage over the Thames, without seeking Bridge or Ford, lost many of his Men. Nor was his Expedition against London prosperous; for assaying all means by Force or Wile to take the City, wherein the King then was, and Turkill with his Danes, he was stoutly beaten off as at other times. Thence back to Wallingford and Bath, directing his Course, after usual Havock made, he sat a while and refresh'd his Army. There Ethelm an Earl of Devonshire, and other great Officers in the West yielded him Subjection. These things flowing to his Wish, he betook him to his Navy, from that time stil'd and accounted King of England, if a Tyrant, faith Simeon, may be call'd a King. The Londoners also sent him Hostages, and made their Peace, for they fear'd his Fury. Ethelred thus reduc'd to narrow Compass, sent Emma his Queen, with his two Sons had by her, and all his Treasure to Richard II.
 her Brother, Duke of Normandy; himself with the Danish Fleet abode some while at Greenwich, then sailing to the Isle of Wight, pass'd after Ethelred
Christmas into Normandy; where he was honou-rably receiv'd at Roan by the Duke, though known to have born himself churlishly and proudly towards Emma his Sister, besides his dissolute Company with other Women. Mean while Swane ceas'd not to exact almost insupportable Tribute of the People, spoiling them when he list'd; besides, the like did Turkill at Greenwich. The next Year beginning, Swane 1044. sickens and dies<sup>b</sup>; some say terrifi'd by an appear'g Shape of St. Edmund arm'd, whose Church at Bury he had threaten'd to demolish; but the Authority hereof relies only upon the Legend of St. Edmund. After his Death the Danish Army and Fleet made his Son Canute their King;
 but the Nobility and States of England sent Messengers to Ethelred, declaring that they pre-ferr'd none before their Native Sovereign, if he would promise to govern them better than he had done, and with more Clemency. Whereat the King rejoicing, sends over his Son Edward with Embassadors to court both high and low, and win their Love, promising largely to be their mild and devoted Lord, to consent in all things to their Will, follow their Counsel, and whatever had been done or spoken by any Man against him freely to pardon; if they would Loyally restore him to be their King. To this * Alfage was kill'd not at Canterbury, but at Greenwich; to which Place, the Station of their Ships, they had brought him Prisoner. And therefore in the present Church of Greenwich, on the top of the Partition Wall, between the Nave of the Church and the Chancel is this Inscription, This Church was Erected and Dedicated to the Glory of God, and the Memory of S. Alphage, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, here slain by the Danes; because he would not ransom his Life by an unreasonable Sum of Money,

A. D. 1014. the People cheerfully answer'd, and Amity was both promis'd and confirm'd on both sides. An Embassy of Lords is sent to bring back the King honourably; he returns in Lent and is joyfully receiv'd of the People, marches with a strong Army against Canute; who having got Horses, and joyn'd with the Men of Lindsey, was preparing to make spoil in the Countries adjoining; but by Ethelred unexpectedly coming upon him, was soon driven to his Ships, and his Confederates of Lindsey left to the Anger of their Countrymen, executed without Mercy by Fire and Sword. Canute in all hast sailing back to Sandwich, took the Hostages given to his Father from all Parts of England, and with slit Noses, Ears crop'd, and Hands chop'd off, setting them ashore, departed into Denmark. Yet the People were not disburthen'd, for the King rais'd out of them thirty thousand Pound to pay his Fleet of Danes at Greenwich. To these Evils the Sea in October pass'd his Bounds, overwhelming many Towns in England, and of their Inhabitants many thousands. The Year following, an Assembly being at Oxford, Edric of Streon, having invited two Noblemen, Sigefert and Morcar, the Sons of Earngrun of Searburg to his Lodging, secretly murder'd them: The King, for what Cause is unknown, seiz'd their Estates, and caus'd Algith the Wife of Sigefert to be kept at Malden, now Malmesbury; whom Edmund the Prince there married against his Father's Mind, then went and possess'd their Lands, making the People there subject to him. Mat. West. saith, that these two were of the Danes, who had seated themselves in Northumberland, slain by Edric under colour of Treason laid to their Charge. They who attended them without, tumulding at the Death of their Masters, were beaten back; and driven into a Church, and defending themselves were burnt there in the Steeple. Mean while Canute returning from Denmark with a great Navy, two hundred Ships richly gilded and adorn'd, well fraught with Arms, and all Provision; and, which Encomium Emme mentions not, two other Kings, Lackman of Sweden, Olaf of Norway, arriv'd at Sandwich; and as the same Author then living writes, sent out Spies to discover what Resistance on Land was to be expected; who return'd with certain Report, that a great Army of English was in readiness to oppose them. Turkill, who upon the Arrival of those Danish Powers, kept Faith no longer with the English, but joyning now with Canute, as it were to reingratiate himself after his Revolt, whether real or complotted, counsell'd him (being yet young) not to land, but leave to him the Management of this first Battel; the King assented, and he with the Forces which he had brought, and part of those which arriv'd with Canute, landing to their Wish encounter'd the English, though double in number, at a Place call'd Scorastan, and was at first beaten back with much Loss. But at length animating his Men with Rage only and Despair, obtain'd a clear Victory, which won him great Reward and Possessions from Canute. But of this Action no other Writer makes mention: From Sandwich therefore sailing about to the River Frome, and there landing over all Dorset, Somerset, and Wiltshire, he spread wastful Hostility. The King lay then sick at Casham in this County; though it A. D. may seem strange how he could lie sick there in 1015. the midst of his Enemies. Howbeit Edmund in one part, and Edric of Streon in another, rais'd Wiltshire. Forces by themselves; but so soon as both Armies were united, the Traytor Edric being found to practice against the Life of Edmund, he remov'd with his Army from him; whereof the Enemy took great Advantage. Edric easily enticing the forty Ships of Danes to side with him, revolted to Canute, the West-Saxons also gave Pledges and furnished him with Horses. By 1016. which means the Year ensuing, he with Edric Sim. Dun. the Traytor, passing the Thames at Creclad, about Twelftide, enter'd into Mercia, and especially Warwickshire, depopulating all Places in their way. Against these, Prince Edmund, for his Hardiness call'd Ironside, gather'd an Army; but the Mercians refus'd to fight unless Ethelred with the Londoners came to aid them; and so every Man return'd home. After the Festival, Edmund gathering another Army, besought his Father to come with the Londoners, and what Force besides he was able; they came with great Strength gotten together, but being come, and in a hopeful way of good Success, it was told the King, that unless he took the better heed, some of his own Forces would fall off and betray him. The King daunted with this perhaps cunning Whisper of the Enemy, disbanded his Army, returns to London. Edmund betook him into Northumberland, as some thought to raise fresh Forces; but he with Earl Urbred on the one side, and Canute with Edric on the other, did little else but waste the Provinces; Canute to conquer them, Edmund to punish them who stood neuter; for which cause Stafford, Shropshire, and Lestershire, felt heavily his hand; while Canute, who was ruining the more Southern Shires, at length march'd into Northumberland; which Edmund hearing dismiss'd his Forces, and came to London. Urbred the Earl hasted back to Northumberland, and finding no other Remedy, submitted himself with all the Northumbrians, giving Hostages to Canute. Nevertheless by his Command or Connivance, and the hand of one Turebrand a Danish Lord; Urbred was slain, and Iric another Dane made Earl in his stead. This Urbred Son of Walteof, as Simeon writes, in his Treatise of the Siege of Durham, in his Youth obtain'd a great Victory against Malcolm Son of Kened King of Scots, who with the whole Power of his Kingdom was fallen into Northumberland, and laid siege to Durham. Walteof the old Earl unable to resist, had secur'd himself in Bebbanburg, a strong Town, but Urbred gathering an Army rais'd the Siege, slew most of the Scots, their King narrowly escaping, and with the Heads of their slain, fixt upon Poles, beset round the Walls of Durham. The Year of this Exploit Simeon clears not, for in 969, and in the Reign of Ethelred as he affirms, it could not be. Canute by another way returning Southward, joyful of his Success, before Easter came back with all the Army to his Fleet. About the * end * 23<sup>d</sup> of April ensuing, Ethelred after a long, trouble-some, and ill-govern'd Reign, ended his Days at London, and was buried in the Church of St. Paul.

* The Saxon Annals tell us 'twas on the Vigil of St. Michael in September.

† The same Annals call the Place Seafenburghs, i. e. Seven Towns, but where they lay we know not.

‡ Sherston in Wiltshire. See the Addit. to that County in the English Edition of Cambden. The Battel of Scorstan in the Saxon Annals, comes under the Year 1016. and after Ethelred's Death. This Scorstan is suppos'd by others to be the Place where Four Stones call'd Skirestones part the four Counties of Oxford, Gloucester, Worcester, and Warwick.

After the decease of Ethelred, they of the Nobility who were then at London, together with the Citizens, chose Edmund his Son (not by Emma, but a former Wife the Daughter of Earl Thorel) in his Father's room; but the Arch-bishops, Abbots, and many of the Nobles assembling together elected Canute; and coming to Suthampton where he then remain'd, renounc'd before him all the Race of Ethelred, and swore him Fidelity: He also swore to them, in Matters both Religious and Secular, to be their faithful Lord. But Edmund with all speed going to the West-Saxons, was joyfully receiv'd of them as their King, and of many other Provinces by their Example. Mean while Canute about mid May came with his whole Fleet up the River to London; then causing a great Dike to be made on Surrey side, turn'd the Stream and drew his Ships thither West of the Bridge; then begirt the City with a broad and deep Trench, assail'd it on every side; but repuls'd as before by the valourous Defendants, and in Despair of Success at that time, leaving part of his Army for the Defence of his Ships, with the rest sped him to the West-Saxons, e're Edmund could have time to assemble all his Powers: Who yet with such as were at hand invoking Divine Aid, encounter'd the Danes at Pen by Gillingham in Dorsetshire, and put him to flight. After Midsummer, increas'd with new Forces, he met with him again at a Place call'd Sberastan, now Sbarstan; but Edric, Almar, and Algar, with the Hamshire and Wiltshire Men, then siding with the Danes, he only maintain'd the Fight, obstinately fought on both sides, till Night and Weariness parted them. Day-light returning renew'd the Conflict; wherein the Danes appearing inferiour, Edric to dishearten the English, cuts off the Head of one Osmer, in Countenance and Hair somewhat resembling the King, and holding it up, cries aloud to the English, That Edmund being slain and this his Head, it was time for them to flee; which Fallacy Edmund perceiving, and openly shewing himself to his Soldiers, by a Spear thrown at Edric, that missing him yet slew one next him, and through him another behind, they recover'd Heart, and lay fore upon the Danes till Night parted them as before: For e're the third Morn, Canute sensible of his Loss, march'd away by Stealth to his Ships at London, renewing there his League. Some would have this Battel at Sberastan the same with that at Scorastan before mention'd, but the Circumstance of Time permits not that, having been before the landing of Canute, this a good while after, as by the Process of things appears: From Sberastan, or Sbarstan, Edmund return'd to the West-Saxons, whose Valour Edric fearing, left it might prevail against the Danes, fought

Pardon of his Revolt, and obtaining it swore A. D. Loyalty to the King, who now the third time 1016. coming with an Army from the West-Saxons to London, rais'd the Siege, chasing Canute and his Danes to their Ships. Then after two Days passing the Thames at Branford, and so coming on their Backs, kept them so turn'd, and obtain'd the Victory: Then returns again to his West-Saxons, and Canute to his Siege, but still in vain; rising therefore thence, he enter'd with his Ships a River then call'd Arenne; and from the Banks thereof wast'd Mercia; thence their Horse by Land, their Foot by Ship came to Medway. Edmund in the mean while, with multiplied Forces out of many Shires, crossing again at Branford, came into Kent, seeking Canute; encounter'd him at Oxford, and so defeated, that of his Horse, they who escap'd fled to the Isle of Sheppey; and a full Victory he had gain'd, had not Edric still the Traytor by some Wile or other detain'd his Pursuit: And Edmund who never wanted Courage, here wanted Prudence to be so milled, ever after forsaken of his wonted Fortune. Canute crossing with his Army into Essex, thence wast'd Mercia worse than before, and with heavy Prey return'd to his Ships: Then Edmund with a collected Army pursuing, overtook at a Place call'd Affandune, or Affeshill,<sup>Ashington.</sup> now Ashdown in Essex; the Battel on either side<sup>Camden.</sup> was fought with great Vehemence; but perfidious Edric perceiving the Victory to encline towards Edmund, with that part of the Army which was under him, fled, as he had promis'd Canute, and left the King over-match'd with Numbers: By which Desertion the English were overthrown, Duke Alfric, Duke Godwin, and Ulfketel the valiant Duke of East-Angles, with a great part of the Nobility slain, so as the English of a long time had not receiv'd a greater Blow. Yet after a while Edmund not absurdly call'd Ironside, preparing to try again his Fortune in another Field, was hinder'd by Edric and others of his Faction, advising him to make Peace and divide the Kingdom with Canute. To which Edmund over-ru'd, a Treaty appointed, and Pledges mutually given, both Kings met together at a Place call'd Deorbirst in Gloucestershire; Edmund on the West-side of Severn, Canute on the East with their Armies, then both in Person wast'd into an Island, at that time call'd Olaneg,<sup>Camden.</sup> now Alney in the midst of the River; swearing Amity and Brother-hood, they parted the Kingdom between them. Then interchanging Arms and the Habit they wore, assailing also what Pay should be allotted to the Navy; they departed each his way. Concerning this Interview, and the Cause thereof, others write otherwise; Malmfbury, that Edmund grieving at the Loss of so much Blood spilt for the Ambition only of two Men striving who should reign, of his own accord sent to Canute, offering him single Combat, to prevent in their own Cause the Effusion of more blood than their own; that Canute though of Courage enough, yet not unwisely doubting <sup>a</sup> Pen is in Somersetshire.<sup>b</sup> Canute was then at the Siege of London, and according to the Annals we have often mention'd, did not command the Danes in the Fight at Pen, nor at Sberstan.<sup>c</sup> Sberstan in Wiltshire, Camden. Thought by others to be Shirestones on the Borders of Oxfordshire.<sup>d</sup> Mr. Milton owns, That no other Writer, but the Author of Encomium Emmae, mentions the first Battel of Scorastan: And 'tis much to be doubted, whether there was any such Action.<sup>e</sup> Mr. Gibson, the Editor of the Saxon Annals, supposes there is a Mistake in the Copy; and that it should be read to Warin or Ware, on the River Lee: Or else, that this Arenne is the River we now call Orwell, which divides Essex from Suffolk.<sup>f</sup> Rather Affington, in that County; for the Saxon Annals have it Affandun: Whereas the Old Ætelsun is the Word always turn'd by the Moderns into Ashdown.<sup>g</sup> The Magesatons suppos'd by Camden. to be the Radnorshire Men.<sup>h</sup> Bromton's Chronicle says, their Commissioners only met.<sup>i</sup> Camden writes it was call'd Alney by the Saxons: It now bears the Name of the Eight, i. e. Eight; others say this Island was betwixt Oversbridge and Maymore. Brit. last Edit. p. 245.

A. D. 1016. to adventure his Body of finall Timber, against a Man of Iron sides, refus'd the Combat, offering to divide the Kingdom; this Offer pleasing both Armies, Edmund was not difficult to consent; and the Decision was, that he as his Hereditary Kingdom should rule the West-Saxons, and all the South, Canute the Mercians, and the North. Huntingdon follow'd by Mat. West. relates, That the Peers on every side wearied out with continual Warfare, and not refraining to affirm openly, that they two who expected to reign singly, had most Reason to fight singly, the Kings were content; the Island was their Lists, the Combat Knightly; till Knute finding himself too weak, began to parle, which ended as is said before. After which the Londoners bought their Peace of the Danes, and permitted them to winter in the City. But King Edmund about the Feast of St. Andrew, unexpectedly deceas'd at London, and was buried near to Edgar his Grand-father at Glaston. The Cause of his so sudden Death is uncertain; common Fame, saith Malmfbury, lays the Guilt thereof upon Edric, who to please Canute, allur'd with Promise of Reward two of the King's Privy-Chamber, though at first abhorring the Fact, to assassinate him at the Stool, by thrusting a sharp Iron into his hinder Parts. Huntingdon, and Mat. West. relate it done at Oxford by the Son of Edric, and something vary in the manner, <sup>a</sup> not worth recital. Edmund dead, Canute meaning to reign sole King of England, calls to him all the Dukes, Barons, and Bishops of the Land, cunningly demanding of them who were Witnesses what Agreement was made between him and Edmund dividing the Kingdom, whether the Sons and Brothers of Edmund were to govern the West-Saxons after him, Canute living? They who understood his meaning, and fear'd to undergo his Anger, timorously answer'd, that Edmund they knew had left no part thereof to his Sons or Brethren, living or dying; but that he intended Canute should be their Guardian, till they came to Age of reigning. Simeon affirms, that for Fear or Hope of Reward they attested what was not true: Notwithstanding which he put many of them to death not long after.

CANUTE, or KNUTE.

1017. Sim. Dun.
Sax. An.
The first Danish
King of England 570 Years after the Saxon Invasion.
Canute having thus founded the Nobility, and by them understood, receiv'd their Oath of Fealty, they the Pledge of his bare Hand, and Oath from the Danish Nobles; whereupon the House of Edmund was renounc'd, and Canute crown'd. Then they enacted, That Edwi, Brother of Edmund, a Prince of great Hope, should be banish'd the Realm. But Canute not thinking himself secure while Edwi liv'd, consulted with Edric how to make him away; who told him of one Ethelward a decay'd Nobleman, like-liest to do the Work. Ethelward sent for, and tempted by the King in private, with largest Rewards, but abhorring in his Mind the Deed, promis'd to do it when he saw his Opportunity; and so still deferr'd it. But Edwi afterwards, receiv'd into Favour as a Snare, was by him A. D. 1017. or some other of his false Friends, Canute contriving it, the same Year slain. Edric also counsel'd him to dispatch Edward and Edmund, the Sons of Ironside; but the King doubting that the Fact would seem too foul done in England, sent them to the King of Sweden, with like intent; but he disdaining the Office, sent them for better Safety to Solomon King of Hungary; where Edmund at length dy'd, but Edward married Agatha Daughter to Henry the German Emperour. A Digression in the Laws of Edward Confessor under the Title of Lex Noricorum saith, that this Edward for fear of Canute, fled of his own accord to Malefclot King of the Rugians, who receiv'd him honourably, and of that Country gave him a Wife. Canute settl'd in his Throne, divided the Government of his Kingdom into four parts; the West-Saxons to himself, the East-Angles to Earl Turkill, the Mercians to Edric, the Northumbrians to Eric; then made Peace with all Princes round about him, and his former Wife being dead, in July married Emma the Widow of King Ethelred. The Christmas following was an ill Feast to Edric, of whose Treason, the King having now made use as much as serv'd his turn, and fearing himself to be the next betray'd, caus'd him to be slain at London in the Palace, thrown over the City Wall, and there to lie unburied; the Head of Edric fix'd on a Pole, he commanded to be set on the highest Tower of London, as in a double Sence he had promis'd him, for the Murder of King Edmund to exalt him above all the Peers of England. Huntingdon, Malmfbury, and Mat. West. write, that suspecting the King's Intention to degrade him from his Mercian Dukedom, and upbraiding him with his Merits, the King enrag'd, caus'd him to be strangl'd in the Room, and out at a Window thrown into the Thames. Another writes, that Eric at the King's Command struck off his Head. Other great Men though without Fault, as Duke Norman the Son of Leofwin, Ethelward Son of Duke Agelmar, <sup>c</sup> he put to death at the same time, jealous of their Power or Familiarity with Edric: And notwithstanding Peace, kept still his Army; to maintain which, the next Year he squees'd out of the English, though now 1018. his Subjects, not his Enemies, seventy two, some say, eighty two thousand Pound, besides fifteen thousand out of London. Mean while great War arose at Carr, between Urbred Son of Waldef, Earl of Northumberland, and Malcolm Son of Kened King of Scots, with whom held Eugenius King of Lothian. But here Simeon the Relater seems to have committed some Mistake, having slain Urbred by Canute two Years before, and set Eric in his Place: Eric therefore it must needs be, not Urbred, who manag'd this War against the Scots. About which time in a Convention of Danes <sup>d</sup> at Oxford, it was agreed on both Parties to keep the Laws of Edgar; Mat. West. saith, of Edward the Elder. The next Year Canute sail'd into Denmark, and there abode all Winter. Huntingdon and Mat. West. say, he went thither to repress the Swedes, and that the Night before a Battel to be fought with them, Godwin stealing out of the Camp with his English, assaulted the Swedes, and had got the

<sup>c</sup> William of Malmfbury writes, that this Prince having been long toss'd about by Sea and Land, return'd at last to England, where he lay conceal'd to his Death, and was then bury'd at Tavistock.

A. D. 1020. Victory e're Canute in the Morning knew of any Fight. For which bold Enterprize, though against Discipline, he had the English in more Esteem ever after. In the Spring at his return into England, he held in the time of Easter a great Assembly at * Chirchester, and the same Year was with Turkill the Dane at the Dedication of a Church by them built at Affendune †, in the Place of that great Victory which won him the Crown. But suspecting his Greatness, the Year following banish'd him the Realm, and found occasion to do the like by Eric the Northumbrian Earl upon the same Jealousie *. Nor yet content with his Conquest of England, though now above ten Years enjoy'd, he pass'd with fifty Ships into Norway, dispossest Olave their King, and subdu'd the Land, first with great Sums of Money sent the Year before to gain him a Party, then coming with an Army to compel the rest †.

1029. Thence returning King of England, Denmark, and Norway, yet not secure in his Mind, under colour of an Embassy he sent into Banishment * Gunilda his Niece. Daughter of his Sister Gunildis, having conceiv'd some Suspicion of his Practices against him: But such Courte was taken, that he never came back; either perishing at Sea, or slain by Contrivance the next Year in Orkney. Canute therefore having thus establish'd himself by Bloodshed and Oppression, to walk away, as he thought, the Guilt thereof, sailing again into Denmark, went thence to Rome, and offer'd there to St. Peter great Gifts of Gold and Silver, and other precious things; besides the usual Tribute of Romscot, giving great Alms by the way, both thither and back again, freeing many Places of Custom and Toll with great Expence, where Strangers were wont to pay, having vow'd great Amendment of Life at the Sepulchre of Peter and Paul, and to his whole People in a large Letter written from Rome yet extant. At his return therefore he built and dedicated a Church to St. Edmund at Bury †, whom his Ancestors had slain, threw out the Secular Priests who had intruded there, and plac'd Monks in their stead; then going into Scotland, subdu'd and receiv'd Homage of Malcolm, and two other Kings there, Melbeath, and Jermare. Three Years after having made * Swane his suppos'd Son by Algiua of Northampton, Duke Alfelm's Daughter (for others say the Son of a Priest whom Algiua, barren, had got ready at the time of her feigned Labour) King of Norway, and Hardecnute his Son by Emma, King of Denmark, and design'd Harold his Son † by Algiua of Northampton, King of England, dy'd at Shaftsbury, and was buried at Winchester in the old Monastery. This King, as appears, ended better than he began, for tho' he seems to have had no hand in the Death of Ironside, but detested the Fact, and bringing the Murtherers, who came to him in hope of great Reward, forth among his Courtiers, as it were to receive Thanks, after they had openly related the manner of their killing him, deliver'd them to deserved Punishment, yet he spar'd Edric whom he knew to be the prime Author of that detestable Fact; till willing to be rid of him, grown importune upon the Confidence of his Merits, and upbraided by him that he had first relinquisht, then extinguish'd Edmund for his sake; angry to be so upbraided, therefore said he with a chang'd Countenance, Traitor to God and to me, thou shalt die; thine own Mouth accuses thee to have slain thy Master my Confederate Brother, and the Lord's Anointed. Whereupon although present and private Execution was in Rage done upon Edric, yet he himself in cool Blood scrupl'd not to make away the Brother and Children of Edmund, who had better Right to be the Lord's Anointed here than himself. When he had obtain'd in England what he desir'd, no wonder if he fought the Love of his conquer'd Subjects for the Love of his own Quiet, the Maintainers of his Wealth and State, for his own Profit. For the like reason he is thought to have married Emma, and that Richard Duke of Normandy her Brother might the less care what became of Elfred and Edward, her Sons by King Ethelred. He commanded to be observ'd the Ancient Saxon Laws, call'd afterwards the Laws of Edward the Confessor, not that he made them, but strictly observ'd them. His Letter from Rome professes, if he had done aught amiss in his Youth, through Negligence or want of due Temper, full Resolution with the Help of God to make amends, by governing justly and piously for the future; charges and adjures all his Officers and Viscounts, that neither for Fear of him, or Favour of any Person, or to enrich the King, they suffer Injustice to be done in the Land; commands his Treasurers to pay all his Debts e're his return home, which was by Denmark, to compose Matters there; and what his Letter profess'd, he perform'd all his Life after. But it is a fond Conceit in many great ones, and pernicious in the end, to cease from no Violence till they have attain'd the utmost of their Ambitions and Desires; then to think God appeas'd by their seeking to bribe him with a Share however large of their ill-gotten Spoils, and then lastly to grow zealous of doing Right, when they have no longer need to do Wrong. Howbeit Canute was Famous through Europe, and much honour'd of Conrade the Emperour then at Rome, with rich Gifts and many Grants of what he there demanded for the freeing of Passages from Toll and Custom. I must not omit one remarkable Action done by him, as Huntingdon reports it, with great Scene of Circumstance, and emphatical Expression, to shew the small Power of Kings in respect of God; which, unless to Court-Parasites, needed no such laborious Demonstration. He caus'd his Royal Seat to be set on the Shoar, while the Tide was coming in; and with all the State that Royalty could put into his Countenance, said thus to the Sea: Thou Sea belong'st to me, and the Land whereon I sit is mine; nor hath any one unpunish'd resist'd my Commands: I charge thee come no farther upon my Land, neither presume to wet the Feet of thy Sovereign Lord. But the Sea, as before,

* In the Year before, Canute founded the Monastery of St. Edmundsbury, in Honour of St. Edmund the King, and two Years afterwards remov'd the Reliques of St. Alpbage, whom his Countrymen had murder'd; both which were Popular Acts. The Body of Alpbage was translated to Canterbury.

† Bromton writes, That he was in a manner expell'd by his own Subjects, for his Weakness and Effeminacy: And returning a Year afterwards, the People rose upon him and slew him. He was canoniz'd under the Title of King Olaf the Martyr.

* This Letter was sent into England by Living Abbot of Tavistock. 'Twas address'd thus; To Aethelnoth Bishop of Canterbury, to Alfric of York, with all the Bishops and Primates; and to the whole English Nation, as well Noblemen as Plebeians, Health, &c. is very Kind and Particular. 'Tis at large in William of Malmsh. Hist.

† This was done Eleven Years before, as appears by an old Manuscript belonging to St. Edmundsbury; also by the Lord Coke, in the Preface to the 8th Book of his Reports.

* Swyne is suppos'd to be his Son by some other Woman, probably a Dane, before he was King of England: For 'tis not likely that Algiua, who 'tis said was barren, should be able to impose two Sons upon him.

A. D. 1035. came rowling on, and without Reverence both wet and dath'd him. Whereat the King quickly rising, with'd all about him to behold and consider the weak and frivolous Power of a King, and that none indeed deserv'd the Name of a King, but he whose Eternal Laws both Heaven, Earth, and Sea obey. A Truth so evident of it self, as I said before, that unless to thame his Court Flatterers, who would not else be convinc'd, Canute needed not to have gone wet-shod home: The best is, from that time forth he never would wear a Crown, esteeming Earthly Royalty contemptible and vain.

HAROLD.

Parent. Harold for his Swiftness surnam'd Harefoot, the Son of Canute by Algiva of Northampton (though some speak doubtfully as if he bore him not, but had him of a Shoemaker's Wife, as Swane before of a Priest; others of a Maid-servant, to conceal her Barrenness) in a great Assembly at Oxford, was by Duke Leofric and the Mercians, with the Londoners, according to his Father's Testament elected King; but without the Regal Habiliments, which Al-
Encom. Em. not the Arch-bishop having in his Custody, refus'd to deliver up, but to the Sons of Emma, for which Harold ever after hated the Clergy; and (as the Clergy are wont thence to infer) all Religion. Godwin Earl of Kent, and the West-Saxons with him, stood for Hardecnute. Malm- bury saith, that the Contest was between Dane and Englsh; that the Danes and Londoners grown now in a manner Danish, were all for Hardecnute; but he being then in Denmark, Harold prevail'd, yet so as that the Kingdom should be divided between them; the West and South part reserv'd by Emma for Hardecnute, till his return. But Harold once advanc'd into the Throne, banish'd Emma his Mother-in-Law, seiz'd on his Father's Treasure at Winchester, and there remain'd. Em-

bury gives little Credit to this Story of Alfred, as not chronicl'd in his time, but rumour'd only. Which Emma however hearing, sent away her Son Edward, who by good hap accompanied not his Brother, with all speed into Normandy. But the Author of Encomium Emmae, who seems plainly (though nameless) to have been some Monk, yet liv'd, and perhaps wrote within the same Year when these things were done; by his Relation differing from all others, much aggravates the Cruelty of Harold, that he not content to have A. D. practis'd in secret (for openly he durst not) 1036. against the Life of Emma, sought many treacherous ways to get her Son within his Power; and resolv'd at length to forge a Letter in the Name of their Mother, inviting them into England, the Copy of which Letter he produces written to this purpose.

Emma in Name only Queen, to her Sons Ed- Encom. Em.

While we severally bewail the Death of our Lord the King, most dear Sons, and while daily ye are depriv'd more and more of the Kingdom your Inheritance; I admire what Counsel ye take, knowing that your intermitted delay, is a daily strengthening to the Reign of your Usurper, who incessantly goes about from Town to City, gaining the Chief Nobles to his Party, either by Gifts, Prayers, or Threats. But they had much rather one of you should reign over them, than to be held under the Power of him who now over-rules them. I entreat therefore that one of you come to me speedily, and privately; to receive from me wholesome Counsel, and to know how the Business which I intend shall be accomplish'd. By this Messenger present, send back what you determine. Farewel, as dear both as my own Heart.

These Letters were sent to the Princes then in Normandy, by express Messengers, with Presents also as from their Mother; which they joyfully receiving, return word by the same Messengers, that one of them will be with her shortly; naming both the Time and Place. Al-

After which, most of the Nobility, both Danes and Englsh now agreeing, send Embassadors to Hardecnute still at Bruges with his Mother, entreating him to come and receive as his Right the Scepter, who before Midsummer came with sixty Ships, and many Souldiers out of Denmark.

HARDECNUTE.

Hardecnute receiv'd with Acclamation, and seated in the Throne, first call'd to mind the Injuries done to him or his Mother Emma in the time of Harold; sent Alfric Arch-bishop of York, Godwin and others, with Troud his Executioner to London, commanding them to dig up the Body of King Harold, and throw it into a Ditch; but by a second Order into the b The Annals call them the Seamen of London, whose Citizens as William of Malmbury observes, by their long Conversation with the Danes, were become wholly Danish in their Inclinations.

c The Saxon Annals place her Flight to Earl Baldwin, under the Year 1037.

A. D. 1040. Thames. Whence taken up by a Fisherman, and convey'd to a Church-yard in London, belonging to the Danes, it was interr'd again with honour. This done, he levied a fore Tax, that eight Marks to every Rower, and twelve to every Officer in his Fleet, should be paid throughout England; by which time they who were so forward to call him over, had enough of him; for he, as they thought, had too much of theirs. After this he call'd to account Godwin Earl of Kent, and Leving Bishop of Worcester, about the Death of Elfred his half Brother, which Alfric the Archbishop laid to their Charge; the King depriv'd Leving of his Bishoprick, and gave it to his Accuser: But the Year following, pacify'd with a round Sum, restor'd it to Leving. Godwin made his Peace by a sumptuous Present, a Gally with a gilded Stem bravely rigg'd, and eighty Soldiers in her, every one with Bracelets of Gold on each Arm, weighing sixteen Ounces, Helmet, Corset, and Hilts of his Swords gilded; a Danish Curtax list'd with Gold or Silver hung on his left Shoulder, a Shield with Bofs and Nails gilded in his left Hand, in his right a Lance: Besides this, he took his Oath before the King, that neither of his own Counsel or Will, but by the Command of Harold he had done what he did, to the putting out of Elfred's Eyes. The like Oath took most of the Nobility for themselves, or in his behalf. The next Year, Hardecnute sending his Housecarles<sup>b</sup>, so they call'd his Officers, to gather the Tribute impos'd; two of them, rigorous in their Office, were slain at Worcester by the People; whereat the King enrag'd, sent Leofric Duke of Mercia, and Seward of Northumberland, with great Forces and Commission to slay the Citizens, rifle and burn the City, waste the whole Province. Affrighted with such News, all the People fled; the Countrymen whither they could, the Citizens to a small Island in Severn, call'd Beve-rege, which they fortify'd and defended stoutly, till Peace was granted them, and freely to return home. But their City they found sack'd and burnt; wherewith the King was appeas'd. This was commendable in him, however cruel to others, that towards his half Brethren, tho' Rivals of his Crown, he shew'd himself always tenderly affection'd; as now towards Edward, who without fear came to him out of Normandy, and with unfeigned kindness receiv'd, remain'd safely and honourably in his Court<sup>c</sup>. But Hardecnute the Year following, at a Feast wherein Osgod, a great Danish Lord, gave his Daughter in Marriage at Lambeth, to Prudon, another potent Dane; in the midst of his Mirth, found and healthful to fight, while he was drinking fell down speechless, and so dying, was buried at Winchester beside his Father. He was it seems a great lover of good Cheer; sitting at Table four times a day, with great variety of Dishes, and superfluity to all Comers. Whereas, faith Huntingdon, in our time Princes in their Houses made but one Meal a day<sup>d</sup>. He gave his Sister Gunildis, a Virgin of rare Beauty, in Marriage to Henry the Alman Emperor; and to send her forth pompously, all the Nobility contributed their Jewels and richest Ornaments. But it may seem a Wonder, that our Historians, if they deserve that Name, should, in a Matter so remarkable, and so near their own time, so much differ. Huntingdon relates, against the Credit of all other Records, that Hardecnute thus dead, the English rejoycing at this unexpected riddance of the Danish Yoke, sent over to Elfrid the Eldest Son of Emma by King Ethelred, of whom we heard but now, that he dy'd Prisoner at Ely, sent thither by Harold six Years before; that he came now out of Normandy, with a great number of Men, to receive the Crown; that Earl Godwin aiming to have his Daughter Queen of England, by marrying her to Edward a simple Youth, for he thought Elfrid of a higher Spirit than to accept her, perswaded the Nobles that Elfred had brought over too many Normans, had promis'd them Lands here, that it was not safe to suffer a Warlike and subtil Nation to take root in the Land, that these were to be so handled as none of them might dare for the future to flock hither, upon pretence of relation to the King; thereupon, by common consent of the Nobles, both Elfred and his Company were dealt with as was above related; that they then sent for Edward out of Normandy, with Hostages to be left there of their faithful Intentions to make him King, and their desires not to bring over with him many Normans; that Edward, at their call, came then first out of Normandy; whereas all others agree, that he came voluntarily over to visit Hardecnute, as is before said, and was remaining in the Court at the time of his death. For Hardecnute dead, faith Malmfbury, Edward doubting greatly his own safety, determin'd to rely wholly on the Advice and Favour of Earl Godwin; desiring therefore by Messengers to have private Speech with him, the Earl a while deliberated: At last assenting, Prince Edward came, and would have fallen at his Feet; but that not permitted, told him the danger wherein he thought himself at present, and in great perplexity besought his help to convey him some whither out of the Land. Godwin soon apprehending the fair occasion that now as it were prompted him how to advance himself and his Family, cheerfully exhorted him to remember himself the Son of Ethelred, the Grandchild of Elgar, right Heir to the Crown, at full Age; not to think of flying, but of reigning, which might easily be brought about, if he would follow his Counsel; then setting forth the Power and Authority which he had in England, promis'd it should be all his to set him on his Throne, if he on his part would promise and swear to be for ever his Friend, to preserve the Honour of his House, and to marry his Daughter. Edward, as his necessity then was, contented easily, and swore to whatever Godwin requir'd. An Assembly of States thereupon met at Gillingham, where Edward pleaded his Right; and by the powerful Influence of Godwin was accepted. Others, as Bromton, with no probability, write, that Godwin at this time was fled into Denmark, for what he had done to Elfred, return'd and submitted himself to Edward then King, was by him charg'd openly with the Death of Elfred, and, not without much ado, by the intercession of Leofric, and other Peers, receiv'd at length into favour.

GLAD were the English deliver'd so unexpectedly from their Danish Masters<sup>a</sup>, and little thought how near another Conquest was hanging over them. Edward, the Easter following, Crown'd<sup>b</sup> at Winchester, the same Year accompanied with Earl Godwin, Leofric, and Siward, came again thither on a sudden, and by their Counsel seiz'd on the Treasure of his Mother
Emma. The Cause alledg'd is, that she was hard to him in the time of his Banishment; and indeed she is said not much to have lov'd Ethel-red her former Husband, and thereafter the Children by him; she was moreover noted to be very covetous, hard to the Poor, and profuse to Monasteries. About this time also King Edward, according to promise, took to Wife Edith or Egith, Earl Godwin's Daughter, commended much for Beauty, Modesty, and, beyond what is requisite in a Woman, Learning. Ingulph, then a Youth, lodging in the Court with his Father, saw her oft, and coming from the School, was sometimes met by her and pos'd, not in Grammer only, but in Logick. Edward, the next Year but one, made ready a strong Navy at Sandwich against Magnus King of Norway, who threaten'd an Invasion; had not Swane King of Denmark diverted him by a War at home to defend his own Land, not out of good will to Edward, as may be suppos'd, who at the same time ex-press'd none to the Danes, banishing Gunildis the Niece of Canute with her two Sons, and Osgod, by surname Clapa, out of the Realm.
Swane overpower'd by Magnus, sent the next Year to entreat Aid of King Edward; Godwin gave counsel to send him fifty Ships fraught with Soldiers; but Leofric and the general Voice gain saying, none were sent<sup>c</sup>. The next Year
Harold Hareager King of Norway sending Ambassadors, made Peace with King Edward; but an Earthquake at Worcester and Darby, Pestilence and Famine in many places, much lessen'd the Enjoyment thereof. The next Year Henry the Emperor displeas'd with Baldwin Earl of Flanders, had straiten'd him with a great Army by Land; and sending to King Edward, desir'd him with his Ships to hinder what he might, his escape by Sea. The King therefore with a great Navy coming to Sandwich, there staid till the Emperor came to an agreement with Earl Baldwin. Mean while, Swane Son of Earl Godwin, who not permitted to marry Edgiva the Abbess of Chester, by him deflower'd, had left the Land, came out of Denmark with eight Ships, feigning a desire to return into the King's Favour; and Beorn his Cousin German, who commanded part of the King's Navy, promis'd to intercede that his Earldom might be restor'd him. Godwin therefore and Beorn with a few Ships, the rest of the Fleet gone home, coming to Pevensey, (but Godwin soon departing thence in pursuit of twenty nine Danish Ships, who had got much Booty on the Coast of Effex, and perish'd by Tempest in their return) Swane with his Ships comes to Beorn at Pevensey, guilefully requests him to sail with him to Sandwich, and reconcile him to the King, as he had promis'd. Beorn mistrusting no Evil where he intended Good, went with him in his Ship, attended by three only of his Servants: But Swane set upon barbarous Cruelty, not Reconciliation with the King, took Beorn, now in his power, and bound him; then coming to Dartmouth, slew and bury'd him in a deep Ditch. After which, the Men of Hastings took six of his Ships, and brought them to the King at Sandwich; with the other two he escap'd into Flanders, there remaining, till Aldred Bishop of Worcester, by earnest mediation, wrought his Peace with the King. About this time King Ed- ward sent to Pope Leo, desiring Absolution from a Vow, which he had made in his younger Years, to take a Journey to Rome, if God vouchsaf'd him to Reign in England; the Pope dispens'd with his Vow, but not without the Expence of his Journey given to the Poor, and a Monastery built or re-edify'd to St. Peter; who in a Vision to a Monk, as is said, chose Westminster, which King Edward thereupon rebuilding endow'd with large Privileges and Revenues. The same Year, saith Florent of Worcester, certain Irish Pirates with thirty six Ships enter'd the Mouth of Severn, and with the Aid of Griffin Prince of South-Wales, did some hurt in those parts: Then passing the River Wey, burnt Dunelham, and slew all the Inhabitants they found. Against whom Aldred Bishop of Worcester, with a few out of Gloucester and Herefordshire, went out in haste: But Griffin, to whom the Welsh and Irish had privately sent Messengers, came down upon the English with his whole Power by Night, and early in the Morning suddenly assaulting them, slew many, and put the rest to flight. The next Year but one, King Edward remitted the Danish Tax, which had continu'd thirty eight Years heavy upon the Land, since Ethelred first paid it to the Danes, and what remain'd thereof in his Treasury he sent back to the Owners: But through imprudence laid the foundation of a far worse Mischief to the English; while studying Gratitude to those Normans, who to him in Exile had been helpful; he call'd them over to publick Offices here, whom better he might have repaid out of his private Purse; by this means exasperating either Nation one against the other, and making way by degrees to the Norman Conquest. Robert, a Monk of that Country, who had been serviceable to him there in time of need, he made Bishop, first of London, then of Canterbury; William his Chaplain Bishop of Dorchester. Then began the English to lay aside their own Ancient Customs, and in many things to imitate French Manners, the great Peers to speak French in their Houses, in French to write their Bills and Letters, as a great piece of Gentility, asham'd of their own: A presage of their Subjection shortly to that People, whose Fashions and Language they affected so slavishly: But that which gave beginning to many Troubles ensuing, happen'd this Year, and upon this Occasion. Eustace Earl of Boloign, Father of the famous * Bromton in his Chronicle tells us, That the Great Council, who elected Edward King, unanimously agreed and swore, That no Dane should Reign over them any more. The Danes Infolerance being become intolerable; an Englishman not daring to pass a Bridge if he met a Dane, till the latter first pass'd it; and if he did not salute him, he was sure to be well beaten.

Godfrey,

A. D. 1051. Godfrey who won Jerusalem from the Saracens, and Husband to Goda the King's Sister, having been to visit King Edward, and returning by Canterbury to take Ship at Dover, one of his Harbingers insolently seeking to lodge by Force in a House there, provok'd to the Master thereof, as by chance or Heat of Anger to kill him. The Count with his whole Train going to the House where his Servant had been kill'd, slew both the Slayer and eighteen more who defended him. But the Townsmen running to Arms, requited him with the Slaughter of twenty one more of his Servants, wounded most of the rest; he himself with one or two hardly escaping, ran back with Clamour to the King; whom seconded by other Norman Courtiers, he stirr'd up to great Anger against the Citizens of Canterbury. Earl Godwin in haste is sent for, the Cause related and much aggravated by the King against that City, the Earl commanded to raise Forces, and use the Citizens thereof as Enemies. Godwin, sorry to see Strangers more favour'd of the King than his Native People, answer'd, That it were better to summon first the Chief Men of the Town into the King's Court, to charge them with Sedition, where both Parties might be heard, that not found in fault they might be acquitted, if otherwise, by Fine or Loss of Life might satisfy the King whose Peace they had broken, and the Count whom they had injur'd: Till this were done refusing to prosecute with hostile Punishment them of his own Country unheard, whom his Office was rather to defend. The King displeased with his Refusal, and not knowing how to compel him, appointed an Assembly of all the Peers to be held at Gloster, where the Matter might be fully try'd; the Assembly was full and frequent according to Summons; but Godwin mistrusting his own Cause, or the Violence of his Adversaries; with his two Sons, Swane and Harold, and a great Power gathered out of his own and his Son's Earldoms, which contain'd most of the South-East and West Parts of England, came no farther than Beverston in Gloucestershire, giving out that their Forces were to go against the Welsh, who intended an Irruption into Herefordshire; and Swane under that Pretence lay with part of his Army thereabout. The Welsh understanding this Device, and with all Diligence clearing themselves before the King, left Godwin detected of false Accusation in great Hatred to all the Assembly. Leofric therefore and Siward Dukes of great Power, the former in Mercia, the other in all Parts beyond Humber, both ever faithful to the King, send privily with speed to raise the Forces of their Provinces. Which Godwin not knowing, sent boldly to King Edward, demanding Count Eustace and his Followers, together with those Bolignians, who as Simeon writes, held a Castle in the Jurisdiction of Canterbury. The King as then having but little Force at hand, entertain'd him a while with Treaties and Delays, till his summon'd Army drew nigh, then rejected his Demands. Godwin thus match'd, commanded his Sons not to begin Fight against the King; begun with, not to give ground. The King's Forces were the Flower of those Counties whence they came, and eager to fall on: But Leofric and the wiser sort detesting Civil War, brought the Matter to this Accord, That Hostages given on either side, the whole Cause should be again debated at London. Thither the King and Lords coming with their Army, sent to Godwin and his Son (who with their Powers were come as far as Southwark) commanding their Appearance unarm'd with only twelve Attendants, and that the rest of their Souldiers they should deliver over to the King. They to appear without Pledges before an adverse Faction deny'd; but to dismiss their Souldiers refus'd not, nor in ought else to obey the King as far as might stand with Honour and the just regard of their Safety. This Answer not pleasing the King, an Edict was presently issu'd forth, That Godwin and his Sons within five Days depart the Land. He who perceiv'd now his Numbers to diminish, readily obey'd, and with his Wife and three Sons, Tosti, Swane, and Gyrtha, with as much Treasure as their Ship could carry, embarking at Thorney, sail'd into Flanders to Earl Baldwin, whose Daughter Judith Tosti had married: For Wulnod his fourth Son was then Hostage to the King in Normandy; his other two, Harold and Leofwin, taking Ship at Bristol, in a Vessel that lay ready there belonging to Swane, pass'd into Ireland. King Edward pursuing his Displeasure, divorc'd his Wife Edith Earl Godwin's Daughter, sending her despoil'd of all her Ornaments to Warewel with one waiting Maid, to be kept in Custody by his Sister the Abbess there. His Reason of so doing was as harsh as his Act, that she only, while her nearest Relations were in Banishment, might not, though innocent, enjoy Ease at home. After this, William Duke of Normandy with a great number of Followers coming into England, was by King Edward honourably entertain'd and led about the Cities, and Castles, as it were to shew him what ere long was to be his own (though at that time, faith Ingulf, no mention thereof pass'd between them) then after some time of his abode here, presented richly and dismiss'd, he return'd home. The next Year Queen Emma dy'd, and was buried at Winchester. The Chronicle attributed to John Bromton a Yorkshire Abbot, but rather of some nameless Author living under Edward the Third, or later, reports that the Year before, by Robert the Arch-bishop she was accus'd both of consenting to the Death of her Son Alfred, and of preparing Poyson for Edward also; lastly, of too much Familiarity with Alwin Bishop of Winchester; that to approve her Innocence, praying over-night to St. Swithun, she offer'd to pass blind-fold between certain Plow-shares red hot, according to the Ordalian Law, which without harm she perform'd; that the King thereupon receiv'd her to Honour, and from her and the Bishop, Penance for his Credulity; that the Arch-bishop asham'd of his Accusation fled out of England: Which besides the Silence of Ancient Authors (for the Bishop fled not till a Year after) brings the whole Story into Suspicion, in this more probable, if it can be prov'd, that in the Memory of this Deliverance from the Nine burning Plow-shares, Queen Emma gave to the Abbey of St. Swithun nine Mannors, and Bishop Alwin other nine. About this time Griffin Prince of South-Wales wasted Herefordshire; to oppose whom the People of that Country with many Normans, garrison'd in the Castle of Hereford, went out in Arms, but were put to the worse, many slain, and much Booty driven away by the Welsh. Soon after which, Harold and Leofwin, Sons of Godwin, coming into Severn with many Ships, in the Confines of So-

* The Annals say Bosenharn in Suffex.

<sup>b</sup> According to the Saxon Annals, Mr. Milton is out in his Chronology; for the Events of the last three Years, the latest of them Earl Godwin's Banishment, happen'd Anno 1048.

A. D. 1052. merzet and Dorsetshire, spoiled many Villages, and resisted by those of Somerset and Devonshire, slew in Fight more than thirty of their principal Men, many of the common sort, and return'd with much Booty to their Fleet. King Edward on the other side made ready above sixty Ships at Sandwich well stor'd with Men and Provision, under the Conduct of Odo and Radulf two of his Norman Kindred, enjoying them to find out Godwin, whom he heard to be at Sea. To quicken them, he himself lay on Ship-board, oft-times watch'd and sail'd up and down in search of those Pirates. But Godwin, whether in a Mist, or by other Accident, passing by them, arrived in another part of Kent, and dispersing secret Messengers abroad, by fair Words allured the Chief Men of Kent, Sussex, Surrey, and Essex to his Party; which News coming to the King's Fleet at Sandwich, they hastened to find him out; but missing of him again, came up without Effect to London. Godwin advertis'd of this, forthwith sail'd to the Isle of Wight; where at length his two Sons Harold and Leofwin finding him, with their united Navy lay on the Coast, forbearing other Hostility than to furnish themselves with fresh Victual from Land as they needed*. Thence as one Fleet they set forward to Sandwich, using all fair means, by the way to encrease their Numbers both of Mariners, and Souldiers. The King then at London, startl'd at these Tidings, gave speedy Order to raise Forces in all Parts, which had not revolted from him; but now too late, for Godwin within a few Days after with his Ships or Gallies came up the River Thames to Southmark, and till the Tide return'd had Conference with the Londoners; whom by fair Speeches, for he was held a good Speaker in those times, he brought to his bent. The Tide returning, and none upon the Bridge hindring, he row'd up in his Gallies along the South Bank; where his Land-army, now come to him, in array of Battel stood on the Shore, then turning toward the North-side of the River, where the King's Gallies lay in some Readiness, and Land-forces also not far off, he made shew as offering to fight; but they understood one another, and the Souldiers on either side soon declar'd their Resolution not to fight Englisch against Englisch. Thence coming to Treaty, the King and the Earl reconcil'd, both Armies were dissolv'd, Godwin and his Sons restor'd to their former Dignities, except Swane, who touch'd in Conscience for the Slaughter of Beorn his Kinsman, was gone barefoot to Jerusalem, and returning home, dy'd by Sicknells or Saracens in Lycia; his Wife Edith, Godwin's Daughter, King Edward took to him again, dignify'd as before. Then were the Normans, who had done many unjust things under the King's Authority, and given him ill Counsel against his People, banish'd the Realm, some of them not blameable permitted to stay. Robert Archbishop of Canterbury, William of London, Ulf of Lincoln, all Normans, hardly escaping with their Followers, got to Sea. The Archbishop went with his Complaint to Rome; but returning, dy'd in Normandy at the same Monastery from whence he came. Osbern and Hugh surrender'd their Castles, and by Permission of Leofric pass'd through his Countries with their Normans to Macbeth King of Scotland. The Year following Rbese Brother to Griffin, Prince of South-Wales, who by Inrodes had done much Damage to the Englisch, taken at Bu-lenden, was put to Death by the King's Appointment, and his Head brought to him at Gloster.

Sim. Dun.

The same Year at Winchester on the second holy-day of Easter, Earl Godwin sitting with the King at Table, sunk down suddenly in his Seat as dead: His three Sons Harold, Tofti, and Gytha, forthwith carried him into the King's Chamber, hoping he might revive: But the Malady had so seiz'd him, that the 5th Day after he expir'd. The Normans who hated Godwin give out, faith Malmfbury, that mention happening to be made of Elfred, and the King thereat looking sowerly upon Godwin, he to vindicate himself, utter'd these Words, Thou O King, at every mention made of thy Brother Elfred, look'st frowningly upon me: But let God not suffer me to swallow this Morsel, if I be guilty of ought done against his Life or thy Advantage; that after these words, choak'd with the Morsel taken, he sunk down and recover'd not. His first Wife was the Sister of Canute, a Woman of much Infamy for the Trade she drove of buying up Englisch Youths and Maids to sell in Denmark, whereof she made great Gain; but ere long was struck with Thunder, and dy'd. The Year ensuing, Seward Earl of Northumberland, with a great number of Horse and Foot, attended also by a strong Fleet at the King's Appointment, made an Expedition into Scotland, vanquish'd the Tyrant Macbeth, slaying many thousands of Scots, with those Normans that went thither, and plac'd Malcolm Son of the Cumbrian King in his stead; yet not without loss of his own Son, and many other both Englisch and Danes. Told of his Son's Death, he ask'd whether he receiv'd his Death's Wound before or behind? When it was answer'd before, I am glad, faith he; and should not else have thought him, though my Son, worthy of Burial. In the meanwhile King Edward being without Issue to succeed him, sent Aldred Bishop of Winchester with great Presents to the Emperor, entreating him to prevail with the King of Hungary, that Edward the remaining Son of his Brother Edmund Ironside, might be sent into England. Seward but one Year surviving his great Victory, dy'd at Tork; report- ed by Huntingdon a Man of Giant-like Stature, and by his own Demeanour at point of Death manifested, of a rough and meer souldierly Mind. For much disdainning to die in Bed by a Disease, not in the Field fighting with his Enemies, he caus'd himself compleatly armed, and weapon'd with Battel-ax and Shield to be set in a Chair, whether to fight with Death, if he could be so vain, or to meet him (when far other Weapons and Preparations were needful) in a Martial Bravery; but true Fortitude glories not in Feats of War, as they are such, but as they serve to end War soonest by a victorious Peace. His Earldom the King bestow'd on Tofti the Son of Earl Eodwin: And soon after in a Convention held at London, banish'd without visible Cause, Huntingdon faith for Treason, Algar the Son of Leofric; who passing into Ireland, soon return'd with eighteen Ships to Griffin Prince of South-Wales, requesting his Aid against King Edward. He assembling his Powers, enter'd with him into Herefordshire; whom Radulf a timorous Captain, Son to the King's Sister, not by Eustace, but a former Husband, met two Miles distant from Hereford; and having horsed the Englisch who knew better to fight on Foot, without stroke he with his French and Normans, beginning to flie, taught the Englisch by his Example. Griffin and Algar following the Chase, slew many, wounded more, enter'd Hereford, slew seven Canons defending the Minster, burnt the Monastery and Reliques, then the City; killing some, leading captive others of the Citizens, return'd with

But the Enemy flying before him farther into the Country, leaving there the greater part of his Army with such as had charge to fight, if occasion were offer'd, with the rest he return'd, and fortify'd Hereford with a Wall and Gates. Mean while, Griffin and Algar dreading the diligence of Harold, after many Messages to and fro, concluded a Peace with him. Algar discharging his Fleet with pay at Westchester, came to the King, and was restor'd to his Earldom. But Griffin, with breach of Faith, the next Year set upon Leofgar, the Bishop of Hereford, and his Clerks, then at a place call'd Glastbrig, with Agelnoth Viscount of the Shire, and slew them; but Leofric, Harold, and King Edward, by force, as is likeliest, though it be not said how, reduc'd him to Peace.

1056. The next Year, Edward Son of Edmund Ironside, for whom his Uncle King Edward had sent to the Emperor, came out of Hungary, design'd Successor to the Crown; but within a few Days after his coming, dy'd at London, leaving behind him Elgar Ateling his Son, Margaret and Christina his Daughters. About the same time also dy'd Earl Leofric in a good old Age, a Man of no less Virtue than Power in his time, Religious, Prudent and Faithful to his Country, happily wedded to Godiva†, a Woman of great Praise. His Son Algar found less favour with King Edward, again banish'd after his Father's Death; but he again, by the Aid of Griffin, and Fleet from Norway, maugre the King, soon recover'd his Earldom.

1059. The next Year Malcolm King of Scots coming to visit King Edward, was brought on his way by Tosti the Northumbrian Earl, to whom he swore Brotherhood: Yet the next Year but one, while Tosti was gone to Rome with Aldred Archbishop of York for his Pall, this sworn Brother taking advantage of his absence, roughly harra's'd Northumberland. The Year passing to an end without other matter of moment, save the frequent Inrodes and Robberies of Griffin, whom no Bonds of Faith could restrain, King Edward sent against him after Christmas, Harold now Duke of West-Saxons, with no great Body of Horse from Gloster, where he then kept his Court; whose coming heard of, Griffin not daring to abide, nor in any part of his Land holding himself secure, escap'd hardly by Sea, e're Harold coming to Rudeland, burnt his Palace and Ships there, returning to Gloster the same Day: But by the middle of May setting out with a Fleet from Bristol, he sail'd about the most part of Wales, and met by his Brother Tosti with many Troops of Horse, as the King had appointed, began to waste the Country; but the Welsh giving Pledges, yielded themselves, promis'd to become tributary, and banish Griffin their Prince; who lurking somewhere, was the next Year taken and slain by Griffin Prince of North-Wales; his Head, with the Head and Tackle of his Ship, sent to Harold, by him to the King, who of his Gentleness made Blechgent and Rithwallon or Rivallon, his two Brothers, Princes in his stead; they to Harold, in behalf of the King, swore Fealty and Tribute‡. Yet the next Year, Harold having built a fair House at a place call'd Portaf-cith in Monmouthshire, and stor'd it with Provision, that the King might lodge there in time of Hunting; Carabec the Son of Griffin, slain the Year before, came with a number of Men, slew all he found there, and took away the Provision. Soon after which, the Northumbrians in a tumult at York, beset the Palace of Tosti their Earl, slew more than two hundred of his Soldiers and Servants, pillaged his Treasure, and put him to flee for his Life. The Cause of this Insurrection they alledg'd to be, for that the Queen Edith had commanded in her Brother Tosti's behalf, Gespatrie a Nobleman of that Country to be treacherously slain in the King's Court; and that Tosti himself the Year before with like treachery had caus'd to be slain in his Chamber Gamel and Ulf, two other of their Noblemen, besides his intolerable Exactions and Oppressions. Then in a manner the whole Country coming up to complain of their Grievances, met with Harold at Northampton, whom the King at Tosti's request had sent to pacify the Northumbrians; but they laying open the Cruelty of his Government, and their own Birthright of Freedom, not to endure the Tyranny of any Governor whatsoever, with absolute refusal to admit him again, and Harold hearing Reason, all the Accomplices of Tosti were expell'd the Earldom. He himself banish'd the Realm, went into Flanders; Morcarr the Son of Algar made Earl in his stead. Huntingdon tells another Cause of Tosti's Banishment, that one Day at Windsor, while Harold reach'd the Cup to King Edward, Tosti envying to see his younger Brother in greater favour than himself, could not forbear to run furiously upon him, catching hold of his Hair; the Scuffle was soon parted by other Attendants rushing between, and Tosti forbidden the Court. He with continu'd Fury riding to Hereford, where Harold had many Servants, preparing an Entertainment for the King, came to the House and set upon them with his Followers; then lopping off Hands, Arms, Legs of some, Heads of others, threw them into Butts of Wine, Meath or Ale, which were laid in for the King's drinking: And at his going away charg'd them to send him this word, that of other fresh Meats he might bring with him to his Farm what he pleas'd, but of Souse he should find plenty provided ready for him; that for his barbarous Act the King pronounc'd him banish'd; that the Northumbrians taking advantage at the King's displeasure and sentence against him, rose also to be reveng'd of his Cruelties done to themselves; but this no way agrees, for why then should Harold or the King so much labour with the Northumbrians to re-admit him, if he were a banish'd Man for his Crimes done before? About this time it happen'd, that Harold putting to Sea one Day for his pleasure, in a Fisher-Boat, from his Mannor at Bosham in Sussex, caught with a Tempest too far off Land, was carry'd into Normandy; and by the Earl of Pontieu, on whose Coast he was driven, at his own request brought to Duke William; who entertaining him with great Courtesie, so far won him, as to promise the Duke by Oath of his own accord, not only the Castle of Dover, then in his tenure, but the Kingdom also after King Edward's Death to his utmost endeavour; thereupon be-

‡ Florence of Worcester says, they swore Fealty to Earl Harold also.

§ William of Malmesbury gives us the Reason for which the Northumbrians declar'd they took Arms, viz. That they were Free-men born, and as freely educated, and that they would not endure the Insolence of an Earl; for they had learnt from their Ancestors to choose either Liberty or Death.

Others say, that King Edward himself, after the Death of Edward his Nephew, sent Harold thither, on purpose to acquaint Duke William with his Intention to bequeath him his Kingdom: But Malmbury accounts the former Story to be the truer.

*Agas Ed.
Conf. Tit.
Lex Noric.*

Ingulf writes, that King Edward now grown old, and perceiving Edgar his Nephew both in Body and Mind unfit to Govern, especially against the Pride and Insolence of Godwin's Sons, who would never obey him; Duke William on the other side of high Merit, and his Kinsman by the Mother, had sent Robert Archbishop of Canterbury to acquaint the Duke with his purpose, not long before Harold came thither. The former part may be true, that King Edward upon such Considerations had sent one or other; but Archbishop Robert was fled the Land, and dead many Years before. Eadmer and Simeon write, that Harold went of his own accord into Normandy, by the King's Permission or Connivance, to get free his Brother Wulnod and Nephew Hacun the Son of Swane, whom the King had taken Hostages of Godwin and sent into Normandy; that King Edward foretold Harold, his Journey thither would be to the detriment of all England, and his own Reproach; that Duke William then acquainted Harold, how Edward e're his coming to the Crown had promis'd, if he ever at-tain'd it, to leave Duke William Successor after him. Last of these Matthew Paris writes, that Harold to get free of Duke William, affirm'd his coming thither not to have been by accident or force of Tempest, but on set purpose, in that private manner to enter with him into secret Confederacy: So variously are these things reported.

After this King Edward grew sickly, yet as he was able kept his Christmas at London, and was at the Dedication of St. Peter's Church in Westminster, which he had rebuilt; but on the Eve of Epiphany, or Twelfthide, deceas'd much lamented, and in the Church was Entomb'd. That he was harmless and simple, is conjectur'd by his words in anger to a Peasant, who had cross'd his Game, (for with Hunting and Hawking he was much delighted) By God and Gods Mother, said he, I shall do you as shew'd a turn, if I can: Observing that Law-Maxim the best of all his Successors, That the King of England can do no wrong. The softness of his Nature gave growth to Factions of those about him, Normans especially and English; these complaining, that Robert the Archbishop was a Sower of Diffention between the King and his People, a Tra-ducer of the English; the other side, that Godwin and his Sons bore themselves arrogantly and proudly towards the King, usurping to themselves equal share in the Government; oft-times making sport with his Simplicity, that thro' their Power in the Land they made no scruple to kill Men, of whose Inheritance they took a likeing, and so to take possession. The truth is, that Godwin and his Sons did many things boisterously and violently, much against the King's mind; which not able to resist, he had, as some say, his Wife Edith, God-win's Daughter, in such averfation, as in Bed never to have touch'd her; whether for this Cause, or mistaken Chastity, not commendable; to enquire farther, is not material. His Laws held good and just, and long after desir'd by the English of their Norman Kings, are yet extant. He is said to be at Table not excessive, at Festivals nothing puffed up with the costly Robes he wore, which his Queen with curious Art had woven for him in Gold. He was full of Almshouses, and exhorted the Monks to like Charity. He is said to be the first of English Kings that cur'd the Disease, call'd thence the King's Evil; yet Malmbury blames them who attribute that Cure to his Royalty, not to his Sanctity; said also to have cur'd certain Blind Men with the Water wherein he had wash'd his Hands. A little before his Death, lying Speechless two Days, the third Day, after a deep Sleep, he was heard to pray, That if it were a true Vision, not an Illusion which he had seen, God would give him strength to utter it, otherwise not. Then he related how he had seen two devout Monks, whom he knew in Normandy, to have liv'd and dy'd well, who appearing, told him they were sent Messengers from God to foretel, that because the Great Ones of England, Dukes, Lords, Bishops, and Abbots, were not Ministers of God, but of the Devil, God had deliver'd the Land to their Enemies; and when he desir'd that he might reveal this Vision, to the end they might repent, it was answer'd, They neither will repent, neither will God pardon them. At this relation others trembling, Stigand the Simonious Archbishop, whom Edward much to blame had suffer'd many Years to sit Primate of the Church, is said to have laugh'd, as at the feavourish Dream of a doting Old Man; but the event prov'd it true.

HAROLD, Son of Earl Godwin.

Harold, whether by King Edward a little before his Death ordain'd Successor to the Crown, as Simeon of Durham, and others affirm; or by the prevalence of his Faction, excluding Edgar the right Heir, Grandchild to Edmund Ironside, as Malmbury and Huntingdon agree; no sooner was the Funeral of King Edward ended, but on the same Day was Elected and Crown'd King: And no sooner plac'd in the Throne, but began to frame himself by all manner of Compliances to gain Affection, endeavour'd to make good Laws, repeal'd bad, became a great Patron to Church and Churchmen, courteous and affable to all reputed Good, a hater of Evil-doers, charg'd all his Officers to punish Thieves, Robbers, and all Disturbers of the Peace, while he himself by Sea and Land labour'd in the defence of his Country: So good an Actor is Ambition. In the mean while a Blazing Star, seven Mornings together, about the end of April, was seen to stream terribly, not only over England, but other parts of the World; foretelling here, as was thought, the great Changes approaching: Plainlyest prognosticated by Elmer a Monk of Malmbury, who could not foresee, when time was, the breaking of his own Legs for soaring too high. He in his Youth strangely aspiring, had made and fitted Wings to his Hands and Feet; with these on the top of a Tower, spread out to gather Air, he flew more than a Furlong; but the Wind being too high, came fluttering down, to the maiming of all his Limbs; yet so conceited of his Art, that he attributed the Cause of his Fall to the want of a Tail, as Birds have, which he forgot to make to his hinder parts. This Story, tho' seeming otherwise too light in the midst of a sad Narration, yet for the Strangeness thereof, I thought worthy enough the placing as I found it plac'd in my Author. But to digress no farther, Tofti the King's Brother coming from Flanders, full of Envy at his younger Brother's Advancement to the Crown, resolv'd what he might to trouble his Reign; forcing therefore them of Wigbt Isle to Contribution, he sail'd

D. 1066. thence to Sandwich, committing Piracies on the Coast between. Harold then residing at London, with a great number of Ships drawn together, and of Horse Troops by Land, prepares in Person for Sandwich: Whereof Tosti having notice, directs his Course with sixty Ships towards Lindsey, taking with him all the Seamen he found, willing or unwilling: Where he burnt many Villages, and slew many of the Inhabitants; but Edwin the Mercian Duke, and Morcar his Brother, the Northumbrian Earl, with their Forces on either side, soon drove him out of the Country. Who thence betook him to Malcolm the Scottish King, and with him abode the whole Summer. About the same time Duke William sending Embassadors to admonish Harold of his Promise and Oath, to assist him in his Plea to the Kingdom, he made answer, That by the Death of his Daughter betroth'd to him on that Condition, he was absolv'd of his Oath, or not dead, he could not take her now an Outlandish Woman, without consent of the Realm; that it was presumptuously done, and not to be persisted in, if without Consent or Knowledge of the States, he had sworn away the Right of the Kingdom; that what he swore was to gain his Liberty, being in a manner then his Prisoner; that it was unreasonable in the Duke to require or expect of him the foregoing of a Kingdom, conferr'd upon him with universal Favour and Acclamation of the People: To this flat Denial he added Contempt, sending the Messengers back, saith Matthew Paris, on main'd Horses. The Duke thus contemptuously put off, addresses himself to the Pope, setting forth the Justice of his Cause, which Harold, whether through Haughtiness of Mind, or Distrust, or that the ways to Rome were stop'd, sought not to do. Duke William, besides the Promise and Oath of Harold, alledg'd that King Edward by the Advice of Seward, Godwin himself, and Stigand the Arch-bishop, had given him the Right of Succession, and had sent him the Son and Nephew of Godwin, Pledges of the Gift; the Pope * sent Duke William, after this Demonstration of his Right, a consecrated Banner. Whereupon he having with great Care and Choice got an Army of tall and stout Soldiers, under Captains of great Skill and mature Age, came in August to the Port of St. Valerie. Mean while Harold from London comes to Sandwich, there expecting his Navy; which also coming, he sails to the Isle of Wight; and having heard of Duke William's Preparations and Readiness to invade him, kept good Watch on the Coast, and Foot Forces every where in fit Places to guard the Shoar. But e'er the middle of September, Provision failing when it was most needed, both Fleet and Army return home. When on a sudden, Harold Harvager King of Norway, with a Navy of more than five hundred great Ships, (others lessen them by two hundred, others augment them to a thousand) appears at the Mouth of Tine; to whom Earl Tosti with his Ships came as was agreed between them; whence both uniting, set sail with all speed, and enter'd the River Humber. Thence turning into Ouse, as far as Rical, landed; and won Tork by Assault. At these Tidings Harold with all his Power hastes thitherward; but e'er his coming, Edwin and Morcar at Fulford by Tork, on the North-side of Ouse, about the Feast of St. Matthew had given them Battel; successfully at first, but over-born at length with Numbers; and forc'd to turn their backs, more of them perish'd in the River, than in the Fight. The Norwegians taking with them five hundred Hostages out of Tork, and leaving there one hundred and fifty of their own, retir'd to their Ships. But the fifth Day after King Harold with a great and well appointed Army, coming to Tork, and at Stamford Bridge, or Battel Bridge on Darwent, assailing the Norwegians, after much Blood-shed on both sides, cut off the greatest part of them with Harfager their King, and Tosti his own Brother. But Olave the King's Son, and Paul Earl of Orkney, left with many Soldiers to guard the Ships, surrendering themselves with Hostages, and Oath given never to return as Enemies, he suffer'd freely to depart with twenty Ships, and the small Remnant of their Army. One Man of the Norwegians is not to be forgotten, who with incredible Valour keeping the Bridge a long Hour against the whole English Army, with his single Resistance delay'd their Victory; and scorn'd offer'd Life, till in the end no Man daring to grapple with him, either dreaded as too strong, or contemned as one desperate, he was at length shot dead with an Arrow; and by his fall open'd the Passage of pursuit to a compleat Victory. Wherewith Harold lifted up in Mind, and forgetting now his former shews of Popularity, defrauded his Soldiers of their due and well deserved Share of the Spoils. While these things thus pass'd in Northumberland, Duke William lay still at St. Valerie; his Ships were ready, but the Wind serv'd not for many Days; which put the Soldiery into much Discouragement and Murmur, taking this for an unlucky Sign of their Success; at last the Wind came favourable, the Duke first under sail awaited the rest at Anchor, till all coming forth, the whole Fleet of nine hundred Ships, with a prosperous Gale arriv'd at Hastings. At his going out of the Boat by a slip falling on his Hands, to correct the Omen, a Soldier standing by said aloud, that their Duke had taken Seisin of England. Landed, he restrain'd his Army from Waste and Spoil, saying, that they ought to spare what was their own. But these are things related of Alexander and Cesar, and I doubt thence borrow'd by the Monks to inlay their Story. The Duke for fifteen Days after landing kept his Men quiet within the Camp, having taken the Castle of Hastings, or built a Fortrefs there. Harold secure the while, and proud of his new Victory, thought all his Enemies now under foot: But sitting jollily at Dinner, News is brought him, that Duke William of Normandy with a great Multitude of Horse and Foot, Slingers and Archers, besides other choice Auxiliaries which he had hir'd in France, was arriv'd at Pevensey. Harold who had expected him all the Summer, but not so late in the Year as now it was, for it was October; with his Forces much diminish'd after two sore Conflicts, and the departing of many others from him discontented, in great haste marches to London. Thence not tarrying for Supplies which were on their way towards him, hurries into Sussex (for he was always in haste since the Day of his Coronation) and e'er the third part of his Army could be well put in order, finds the Duke about nine Mile from Hastings, and now drawing nigh, sent Spies before him to survey the Strength and Number of his Enemies: Them, discover'd such, the Duke causing to be led about, and after well fill'd with Meat and Drink sent back. They not over-wise, brought word that the Duke's Army were most of them Priests; for they saw their Faces all over shaven; the English then using to let grow on their upper-lip large Mustachios, as did anciently the Britains. The King laughing, answer'd, That they were not Priests, but valiant and hardy Soldiers. Therefore said Girtha his Brother, a Youth of noble Courage and Understanding above his Age, Forbear thou thy self to fight, who art obnoxious to Duke William by Oath, let us unsworn undergo the Hazard of

A. D. 1066. Battel, who may justly fight in the Defence of our Country; thou reserved to fitter time, mayst either reunite us flying, or revenge us dead. The King not hearkning to this, lest it might seem to argue Fear in him, or a bad Cause, with like Resolution rejected the Offers of Duke William sent to him by a Monk before the Battel, with this only Answer hastily deliver'd, Let God judge between us. The Offers were these, That Harold would either lay down the Scepter, or hold it of him, or try his Title with him by single Combat in the Sight of both Armies, or refer it to the Pope. These rejected, both sides prepar'd to fight the next Morning, the English from singing and drinking all Night, the Normans from Confession of their Sins, and Communion of the Host. The English were in a strait disadvantageous Place<sup>a</sup>, so that many discourag'd with their ill ordering, scarce having room where to stand, slip'd away before the Onset, the rest in close order with their Battel-Axes and Shields, made an impenetrable Squadron: The King himself with his Brothers on foot stood by the Royal Standard, wherein the Figure of a Man fighting was inwoven with Gold and precious Stones. The Norman Foot, most Bowmen, made the foremost Front, on either side Wings of Horse somewhat behind. The Duke arming, and his Corset given him on the wrong side, said pleasantly, The Strength of my Dukedom will be turn'd now into a Kingdom. Then the whole Army singing the Song of Rowland, the Remembrance of whose Exploits might hearten them, imploring lastly Divine Help, the Battel began; and was fought sorely on either side; but the main Body of English Foot by no means would be broken, till the Duke causing his Men to feign Flight, drew them out with desire of pursuit into open Disorder, then turn'd suddenly upon them so routed by themselves, which wrought their Overthrow; yet so they dy'd not unmanfully, but turning off upon their Enemies, by the Advantage of an upper Ground, beat them down by heaps, and fill'd up a great Ditch with their Carcasses. Thus hung the Victory wavering on either side, from the third Hour of Day to Evening; when Harold having maintain'd the Fight with unspeakable Courage and Personal Valour, shot into the Head with an Arrow, fell at length, and left his Soldiers without Heart longer to withstand the unwearied Enemy. With Harold fell also his two Brothers, Leofwin, and Girthea, with them the greatest part of the English Nobility. His Body lying dead, a Knight or Soldier wounding on the Thigh, was by the Duke presently turn'd out of Military Service. Of Normans and French were slain no small Number; the Duke himself also that Day not a little hazarded his Person, having had three choice Horses kill'd under him. Victory obtain'd, and his dead carefully buried, the English also by Permission, he sent the Body of Harold to his Mother without Ransom, though she offer'd very much to redeem it, which having receiv'd, she buried at Waltham, in a Church built there by Harold<sup>b</sup>. while, Edwin and Morcar, who had withdrawn themselves from Harold, hearing of his Death, came to London; sending Aldgit the Queen their Sister with all speed to West-Chester. Aldred Archbishop of York, and many of the Nobles, with the Londoners, would have set up Edgar the Right Heir, and prepar'd themselves to fight for him; but Morcar and Edwin not liking the Choice, who each of them expected to have been chosen before him, withdrew their Forces and returned home. Duke William contrary to his former Resolution, if Florent of Worster, and they who follow him say true, wasting, burning, and slaying all in his way, or rather, as saith Malmesbury, not in a Hostile but in Regal manner came up to London, met at Barcham by Edgar, with the Nobles, Bishops, Citizens, and at length Edwin and Morcar, who all submitted to him, gave Hostages, and swore Fidelity, he to them promis'd Peace and Defence; yet permitted his Men the while to burn and make prey. Coming to London with all his Army, he was on Christmas Day solemnly crown'd in the great Church at Westminster, by Aldred Arch-bishop of York, having first given his Oath at the Altar in Presence of all the People, to defend the Church, well govern the People, maintain Right Law; prohibit Rapine and unjust Judgment. Thus the English, while they agreed not about the Choice of their Native King, were constrain'd to take the Yoke of an Outlandish Conquerour. With what Minds, and by what Course of Life they had fitted themselves for this Servitude, William of Malmesbury spares not to lay open. Not a few Years before the Normans came, the Clergy, though in Edward the Confessor's Days, had lost all good Literature and Religion, scarce able to read and understand their Latin Service: He was a Miracle to others who knew his Grammar. The Monks went clad in fine Stuffs, and made no difference what they eat; which though in it self no fault, yet to their Consciences was irreligious. The great Men given to Gluttony and dissolute Life, made a Prey of the Common People, abusing their Daughters whom they had in Service, then turning them off to the Stews; the meaner sort tipling together Night and Day, spent all they had in Drunkenness, attended with other Vices which effeminate Mens Minds. Whence it came to pass, that carried on with Fury and Rashness more than any true Fortitude or Skill of War, they gave to William their Conquerour so easie a Conquest. Not but that some few of all sorts were much better among them; but such was the Generality. And as the long suffering of God permits bad Men to enjoy prosperous Days with the good, so his Severity oft-times exempts not good Men from their Share in evil Times with the bad.

If these were the Causes of such Misery and Thralldom to those our Ancestors, with what better Close can be concluded, than here in fit Season to remember this Age in the midst of her Security, to fear from like Vices without Amendment the Revolution of like Calamities.

OF THE History of England:
CONTAINING
A Brief ACCOUNT of the most Remarkable AFFAIRS of STATE.

Compos'd by SAMUEL DANIEL, one of the Grooms of the Privy Chamber to Queen ANNE, Consort to K. James I.

The Subject of the following History fix'd.

WHEN I first entertain'd the settled Thoughts of Collecting the Principal Affairs of this Kingdom of England into One Body, I design'd to have taken my Beginning at the first British Kings, and have proceeded according to the common List of their Succession, relating the things which happen'd most Remarkable in their several Reigns; but not finding any authentic Proof of their Descent, I laid aside these Resolutions, upon these Considerations, That a far less compass of Time, and better known to us, (viz. From William the First, surnam'd the Bastard) would better suit my Abilities, if not overmatch them; that it is vain Curiosity to search farther into Antiquity, than we can get any good Information of, and of which we can have no Proof, and consequently can reap no real Advantage by it. For the Beginnings of all People and Kingdoms are as difficult to be found out as the Heads of great Rivers; and if they could be known, would promote but very little either our Virtue or Reputation; since it is evident, that most of them owe their Original to Poverty, Robbery, and Oppression; though Fabulous Writers (to magnifie their own Nations) have obtruded upon the Credulity of after-Ages strange Relations of Heroical and Miraculous Beginnings: So that great States, as well as Men, are best worth seeing, when they are in their most flourishing Condition, as they are, and not as they first were. Besides, it seems good to Divine Providence to check our over-inquisitive Dispositions, by leaving all things, of very great Antiquity, under irrecoverable Uncertainty, and so to bound our Searches within the compass of a few Ages; as if that were sufficient, both for Example and Instruction. For had we indeed the particular Occurrences of all former Ages and Nations, they would rather burthen our Memories, than better our Understandings: The Actions and Manners of Men receiving little alteration by Time; Virtues and Vices being the same, though more or less in practice and vogue, according to the Goodness or Viciousness of Governours: The Changes and Ruins of States proceeding from the same Causes, and the Methods of Affairs being carry'd on much in the same Course.

But yet since the History of those Ages, which I have chosen for the Subject of this Collection, <sup>Britain first</sup> cannot be well understood without some know-<sup>discover'd</sup> ledge of the Affairs of the precedent, I shall take <sup>by the Ro-</sup> a brief View of the State of this Nation from the time it became a Tributary Province to the Roman Empire, which is as far as the most Ancient Records we have can give us light; for before that time, England was not more remote in Situation, than it was from the Knowledge of the World. And from hence it was that Julius Caesar, being but on the opposite Continent in Gaul, could get no perfect Information of the State of Britain by all the means he could use, unless by some Merchants (of whom he summon'd as many as he could) who inform'd him of some of * Jeffrey of Monmouth's List of the Regal Succession from Brutus is very distinct and plain; but it hath so many Marks of pure Invention, either of himself, or the Authors from whom he pretends to transcribe them, that it is long since given up for a meer Romance by all our Learned Criticks in English History; and particularly the Bishop of St. Asaph is of opinion, that the Grand Lye of all, which is the Story of Brutus, is nothing but a Forgery to make the English Kings as Nobly descended as the Kings of other Nations, by drawing them from the Trojans, according to the Humour of the Age he liv'd in. This Story of Brutus is reckon'd Fabulous by Sir William Temple, in his Introduction to the History of England, p. 19.

the Coasts, but were ignorant of the State and Condition of the Inhabitants that dwelt in the Inland parts of the Isle, either being regardless of what concern'd not their Trade, or else being kept from any farther knowledge of it by the Britains, who were cautious of discovering their Condition to Strangers: However Cæsar, rather than want a Pretence of invading, accus'd them of aiding his Enemies the Gauls secretly against him; and entering their Country, subdu'd some parts of it in the South; yet made so little progress towards an absolute Conquest, that he may rather be said to have shew'd it, than won it to the Roman Empire.

The most ancient state of Britain.

What the State and Form of Government was among the Britains before this Invasion, the first and best Relation is from Cæsar himself, who tells us, That the Britains were divided into many petty Kingdoms, and names four Kings of Kent: That perceiving themselves in great danger by the Romans, they by common consent chose Cassivellaun, or Cassibolin, to be their King, and have not only the Administration of all publick Affairs, but the supreme Command, as General in the War: That having receiv'd some Defeats, they yielded their Cities up to him, and sent Hostages in Confirmation of it. By which it appears, that the Government of the ancient Britains was not Monarchical, as some have asserted; but like the Gauls (with whom they held a great Similitude, as well in Religion, as in their Manners and Language) was divided into many small Princedoms, without any Combination under one Head: After the same manner, as we have lately discover'd the People of America to be rul'd, and as most Countrys were at first govern'd, till either Ambition and Power forc'd, or Interest and Policy taught them to introduce new Modes and arbitrary Ways of ordering Nations. And this was the form of Government in Britain, Gaul or France, Spain, Germany, and all the West parts of Europe; till the Romans, having first subdu'd all Italy through the Divisions among themselves, which made them a Prey to their Enemies, became potent enough to ravish the Liberties of the other adjacent Nations from them: For the Kings of those times were no better than Generals in Wars, and had no other Jurisdiction over their People, but to conduct them for their Safety. So that this Assertion, That there was a Monarchy establish'd among the Britains long before other Nations, will never pass for truth, but with such Persons as understand little of true Antiquity, but model their Notion of it by the Constitutions of this present time. For had there indeed been an Absolute Monarch in these parts, under whose Conduct the Britains could have united their Forces against the common Invader, it is very probable they had never been conquer'd; since we find the Romans to have been sometimes very strangely foil'd by some petty Princes; and 'tis plain, that though the Britains had not the Improvement of Letters, yet they wanted not many great Souls, who had a quick Sense of Honour and Greatness, and delighted in the boldest and bravest Attempts. But not being united in their publick Danger, they expos'd themselves to the common Enemy; who, often more by the Divisions of others, than by his own Power, became Master of the World.

So that with what probability the long Succession of Absolute Monarchs from Brutus to Cassivellaun can be maintain'd, I am to seek; and therefore shall leave it to those, who are of more easie Faith: Adding only thus much to justify my own Diffidence, That I cannot imagine how the Memory of those ancient Times could be preserv'd to Posterity, when it is almost certain, that they had not the Use of Letters in this Nation till the Romans brought them in. Indeed some report, That not only the Greek Tongue, but Schools of Learning were settled here long before the Romans arrival; which, had it been true, we should have had some mention of it in Cæsar's, or others Writings: Whereas now, on the contrary, we find that the Druids, who were the Ministers of Justice and Religion among the Britains, and the admired Philosophers of those Ages, committed not their Mysteries to Writing, but deliver'd them by Tradition; which sure they would not have done, had they had more certain ways of imparting them to their Nation. And Cornelius Tacitus tells us, That Agricola, Prefect of this Province under Domitian, caus'd the principal Men's Sons to be taught the Liberal Sciences; which the Britains could not have been ignorant of, had the Greek Learning been settled among them so many Ages before. Wherefore 'tis clear, that there was no other way of conveying the Transactions of former Ages but by Tradition; and how little that can be depended upon, all wise Men know.

As to the State of the Britains during their Subjection to the Romans, we find that they were govern'd by the Roman Prefects; or if they had any Kings of their own, they were tributary, and had no other Authority than what they had from the Emperor's Will, who, as Tacitus relates, made Kings but Instruments of more heavy Bondage and Slavery, speaking of Cogedunus, to whom Claudius gave certain Cities in Britain, under the Title of King. For when Cæsar had once got footing among them, and made part of their Country tributary, they would not venture to withstand the Roman Arms for the future, and recover their ancient Freedom; for tho' during the time of the Civil Wars at Rome, by which the Government there was chang'd from a Commonwealth to a Monarchy, they had twenty Years space given them to rid themselves of their Enemies, yet they patiently submitted; and as soon as Augustus had gotten the absolute Sovereignty, all the Princes and Cities of Britain came voluntarily with their Gifts and Tributes to profess their Subjection to him, and gain his mans.

* The British Pearls, which were then of great Esteem in the World, were no small Motive to Cæsar to invade Britain. Dry Honour, without Gain, was not always the Inducement of the Roman Heroes to conquer the World. Rome her self lov'd a full Treasury, and her Great Men a full Purse.

<sup>b</sup> Ptolomy gives the Names of the several People and Kingdoms among the Old Britains before the Romans Invasion, which are exactly set down to us in the late Edition of Mr. Cambden's Britannia.

<sup>c</sup> The most probable Account of the first Original of the People of this Island, is, That they were some Colonies of Gauls, who transplanted themselves into Britain, when their own Country grew over-populous, which was usual in the long-liv'd Ages of Men, near the Creation and Flood.

<sup>d</sup> The Britains, through the continual Wars they had among themselves, were such expert Soldiers for those early Times, that Cæsar himself confesses, he learnt many Stratagems of War from them: So that had they had Union among themselves, Cæsar might have return'd without success.

<sup>e</sup> The Story of Brutus, which seems nothing but an Invention of the Britains to be even with the rest of the World in the Antiquity of their Descent; for 'twas then the Humour of the World to draw their Pedigree from the Trojans, is now utterly exploded.

Favour, fearing lest a new Governour should make their Yoke heavier than it hath hitherto been; which consisted only in a very tolerable Tribute, which they were contented to bear with their Neighbours. After Augustus's Death, when the Corruptions of the Empire had caused miserable Distractions in all Parts of the World, the Britains also falling into Factions among themselves, and Discontents with their Roman Governours, with-held their Obedience, till Claudius obtain'd the Empire; who being an ambitious Prince, and desirous of Glory, cast his Eye upon Britain, as the most probable Place for him to gain his first Triumph in. Hither therefore he sends P. Ostorius Scapula, a great Warriour, to be Proprætor; who tho' he met with various Distractions, and a resolute People hardly to be forc'd into Subjection, yet as an experienc'd Commander, who knew how much the first Attempts do usually either daunt, or encourage an Enemy, contriv'd to fall upon them by Surprise, and where he had any Advantages, to use an affrighting Severity against them: But these Stratagems did not produce the wished Effect; for Caradocus (one of the British Kings) maintain'd War against him for nine Years together, and could not be mastered by this brave General, till being betray'd by his own Nation, he came into his hands, and was with his Wife and Children carried to Rome to be led in Triumph.

Claudius's Conquest of Britain, and their Revolt soon
after.

Claudius after this, pass'd at Rome for the Conqueror of Britain, tho' that Island was not perfectly reduc'd to their Obedience, till a long time after: For the Britains, finding that their Divisions were likely to betray them to the Romans, who would prove cruel Masters, enter'd into a defensive League against them upon this Occasion. Prasutagus, King of the Iceni, a Rich and Potent Prince, dying, left Nero his Heir, with the Care of his Wife and his two Daughters; hoping by this Gift, to secure his Family and Nation from any Injury from the Romans, but it happen'd clear otherwise after his Death: For he was no sooner dead, but the Roman Captains, as if his Kingdom had been left a Prey to them, ravag'd and plunder'd it; his Wife Boodicea was whipp'd, his Daughters ravish'd, his Kindred treated as Captives, and his rich Subjects depriv'd of their Paternal Inheritance and Estates. This inhumane Usage exasperated the Britains so much against them, that they conspired with the Trinobantes, and others, to recover their Liberty, and free themselves from such cruel Oppressors. Boodicea, the injured Queen, animated them in this Resolution, and led them forward in their Design. And first they set upon the Veteran Soldiers, who lay in Garrison at London, Verulam and Camalodunum, and having put them to flight, with their Captain Cerealis, they slew Seventy Thousand of them. Suetonius, Governour of the Province, not discourag'd by this Loss from maintaining his Station, rally'd all the Forces he could together, and hasten'd to engage them. The Britains were an hundred and twenty thousand, under the Conduct of Boodicea, who together with their Wives, encourag'd them manfully to pursue the advantage, and rather die, than come under the Romans Tyranny. Suetonius on the other side was not wanting with the like advice: And so much the more, because his Army was much inferiour in Number to the Britains, tho' of experienc'd old Soldiers. This Battel was very sharp, but the Victory in the issue fell to the Romans, who slew Eighty Thousand Britains in the gaining of it. Boodicea escap'd their Fury, but poison'd her self; choos'ing to die, rather than see the miserable Calamities which would certainly come upon her Country. After this Victory the Romans grievously oppress'd the Britains, who, tho' they often revolted, and upon every advantage that they could spy, struggled to shake off their uneasie Yoke; yet being over-power'd with Numbers, which were sent against them almost from all parts of the Empire, were at last forc'd to yield, and undergo an unwilling Subjection, being under the curb of Fourteen Garrisons, and a standing Army of near Thirty Thousand Foot and Horse.

In this lamentable Condition of Slavery and Oppression did the Britains remain, as long as the Romans had the Government of them; who, not contented to rob them of their Estates and Possessions at home, and involve them in cruel Bondage, constrain'd them to engage in their ambitious Quarrels abroad, and purchase them Glory with the loss of their own Blood and Lives: And not only so, but being left to the arbitrary Power of their Governours, they were forc'd to assist them in their Rebellions: For after the Election of the Emperor fell into the hands of their Army, many Governours here having great Forces under their Command, were proclaim'd Cæsars, and set up for the whole Empire. Thus did Caracallus first, and after him Alexander, whom Constantine, who was Copartner with Maximianus in the Imperial Dignity, at his first coming into Britain conquer'd, by the auspicious Arms of Asclepiodorus Captain of his Life-guard. After this the Caledonians and Picts made their Inroads into the Northern parts of Britain, and much infested the Inhabitants, disturbing their Peace, and wasting their Lands; Constantine, who then was sole Emperor of the West, compassionating the Miseries of his Subjects, as well as desirous to secure his Dominions from the Spoil of these Barbarians, undertook a second Journey into Britain, and had the good fortune to be Victorious against them, and drive them out of his Dominions; though he liv'd not to see the Peace that follow'd thereupon, dying soon after at York. Constantine his Son (afterwards surnamed the Great) was present at his Death, being upon notice of his Father's Sicknefs lately come out of Illyria, where he had been with Galerius warring against the Sarmatians. As soon as Constantine was dead, Constantine was immediately saluted Emperor of the Britains, which he so kindly

<sup>c</sup> Agricola's good Temper and mild Government made their Subjection so tolerable, that by his Direction and Encouragement they were willing almost to turn Romans; learning their Oratory, Building, Gardening, and all other Arts of Peace and Quietness. But this was but a short Breathing from their Miseries; all their Comforts being remov'd with him by Domitian.

<sup>d</sup> The Caledonians, from Ciliddion, which signifies Borderers, were those People that dwelt in the more Southern part of North-Britain, now call'd Scotland; and so border'd upon the Roman-Britain, now call'd England.

<sup>e</sup> The Picts seem to have been a ruder sort of Britains, that would never yield to the Romans, but still kept up their ancient Manners and Liberties; and were call'd Pictæ (about Three Hundred Years after Christ) by the Romans, because they continu'd the old British Custom of painting their Bodies. They dwelt in the North parts of North-Britain, and in probability are the Ancestors of the Highlanders in Scotland.

resented;

resented, that he ever after had a particular Esteem for them; and before he left them, put their Government into such a new Model, as was more easie and pleasant to them. After this we have no certain Information in what posture Affairs were among the Britains, till the Reign of Valentinian the Elder, who sent Theodosius (the Father of the Emperor of that Name) a Person eminent for his Heroick Exploits and good Fortune, into Britain to oppose the Incurfions of the Picts, Saxons, Scots, and Attacotti, who like a destroying Deluge over-run the Country; Theodosius's Army was compos'd chiefly of Bataxians and Herulians, hardy and stout Soldiers, who by the prudent conduct of their General, soon vanquish'd the rude Barbarians, and restor'd the miserable Inhabitants to their Properties and Ease: Which done, Theodosius left Britain, Civilis being sent to govern the Province, and Dulcitius the Army, Men both of great Name and Experience.

Maximus, General of the Roman Army in Britain, claims the Empire.

In these Wars with Theodosius was one Maximus, a Spaniard by Birth, but educated at Rome, by which he became so accomplish'd a Person, that he was made in the time of Valentinian the Younger the supreme Commander of the Army in Britain. This Man taking it ill, that Gratian had declar'd Theodosius Emperor, revolted from his Allegiance, and got himself proclaim'd Cæsar; and to establish himself in the Imperial Throne, transported the Flower of the Britains into Gaul, where by their help he brought over Gaul, Spain and Germany to his Party; and at length grew so powerful, that he in a set Battel conquer'd Gratian, and after by subtilty slew him, and forc'd Valentinian, his Brother and Copartner, to fly to Theodosius Emperor of the East for help, by whose assistance Valentinian recover'd his Right; Maximus, and great part of his Forces, being destroy'd at Aquileia. This Rebellious Expedition much dispeopled Britain, their ablest Youth and strongest Garrisons being taken out of it, which were all either slain with Maximus, or, as some relate, seated themselves in Armorica (now call'd Britain in France) which retains the British Language to this Day.

Marcus set up for Emperor by the Britains, after him others.

But this unfortunate Blow did not allay the factious Humour then got in among the Britains; for in the time of Honorius the Emperor, the Colony of Veterans, fearing the Invasion of the Vandals, revolted, and chose one Marcus Emperor, who not answering their Expectation, was slain by them, and one Gratian a Britain put in his place; but neither had he the luck to please them above four Months; wherefore, putting him to Death, they pitch'd upon Constantine, whose very Name seem'd to them to portend Good Fortune, though his Merit was not extraordinary. This Constantine following Maximus's steps, and gathering together all the remaining Forces of Britain, invaded several parts of the Western Empire, gave his Son Constans (a Monk) the Name of Augustus; and after many Rencontres with Honorius's Forces, was at length conquer'd; his whole Army brought out of Britain, being destroy'd, and himself executed at Arles. The British Nation being thus almost exhausted of its Strength, lay open to the Ravages of the Barbarians of the North, who observing this advantage, came down upon them in great Numbers, and by their Incurfions reduc'd them to great Straights and Calamities; so that they were forc'd to implore the Aid of Aetius, then Praefect of the Gauls under Valentinian III. by all the Arts of moving Commiseration they could invent; sending their Ambassadors with torn Garments, and Dust on their Heads. Aetius, mov'd with their Petitions, did send them such Succours as soon routed their Enemy; and to secure them for the future, helped them to raise a Wall upon the Trench, which Adrian had cast up before from Sea to Sea; and so he left them. This Relief prov'd but of little worth; for the Barbarians no sooner heard of Aetius's departure, but they again assaulted the Britains afresh, beat down their Wall, and haras'd the Country much worse than before. The Britains repeat their Suit to Aetius, but all in vain. The Emperors, and his own Safety requir'd of them a more vigorous defence than before, the Empire it self being in as great Hazard, and under as great Distractions as their Island. Wherefore being left to themselves to fall into the Hands of the Barbarians, and so the Government of the Romans, being unable to support it self, expir'd wholly in Britain, after they had held it Four Hundred Seventy Six Years, from the time that Julius Cæsar invaded it: In all which time we find only these seven British Kings to have reign'd, viz. Theomantius, Cunobelinus, Guiderius, Arviragus, Marius, Coel; and lastly Lucius, who is highly celebrated by our Historians for bringing in the Christian Religion into this Nation. All the rest to Vortigern were Roman Governours.

Britain being thus first weaken'd, and at last deserted by the Romans, was left to provide for its own defence against its Invaders. The Inhabitants were in miserable Distractions among themselves, what to do in this sad Juncture. Many Kings they chose, but soon deposted them. Vortigern, a Noble Britain, and Earl of Cornwall, was at last fix'd upon as their General against their Enemies; who either fearing<sup>a</sup> his own Deposition from the Government he had newly gotten, and desir'd the continuance of, or finding the Nation unable to grapple with its fierce and cruel Enemies, the Scots and Picts, sent for the Saxons out of Germany to assist him.

The Saxons at this time possess'd the third part of Germany, and held all the Country between the Rivers Rhine and Elb, having on the North the Baltick-Sea and Ocean, on the South the Hyrcinian-Wood; and divided into two parts by the River Weser, viz. Eastphalia (as the Country on the East of the River Weser was anciently call'd) and Westphalia. They were govern'd by an Aristocracy of twelve Princes, who in times of War chose a General to lead and con-

The Description of the Saxons; their Inhabitation in Britain, and obtaining of it.

<sup>a</sup> Scots were Inhabitants of Ireland, who came to assist the Picts against the Romans and Britains, their Subjects.

<sup>b</sup> Attacotti are not certainly known by Antiquaries: Some think them a Party of the Scots, who came out of Ireland; others, among whom is the Learned Bishop of Worcester, that they were the Wild-Britains, from Jerome, who says, they were a British People.

<sup>c</sup> Some of these Kings are fabulous; the Bishop of Worcester proves Arviragus, and so his two Sons, Marius and Coillus, to be the Invention of Jeffrey of Monmouth, who tells very pleasant Stories of the former of them, and thinks that none are certainly reckon'd such, but Prasutagus, Cogidunnus, Caradacus, Togodunnus, and Galgacus, who are mention'd in the Roman History; his Conjecture of Lucius is set down before, Orig. Brit. p. 32, 34.

<sup>e</sup> The Saxons were a very Warlike People, who dwelt on the nearest German-Shore, had kept the Romans themselves always upon their Guard, and had sometimes attack'd them in this Isle, which made Vortigern think these People most fit for his Assistants against the Picts and Scots.

duct their Army. Their Country was large, very Populous and Rich, furnish'd with Shipping, (which at that time the Britains had not;) all which things, as they fitted them for any foreign Expedition, so they made them readily embrace Vortigern's Invitation; which they had no sooner receiv'd, but they dispatch'd away a considerable Body of Men into Britain, under the Command of Hengist and Horsa, two Brethren of the chiefest Blood and Nobility of the Saxons. The Saxons at first served the Britains as Stipendiaries, and did them so good service, that within a little time Britain was wholly freed from their troublesome Enemies, and liv'd at peace: Vortigern allowing them the Isle of Thanet for their Residence, kept them still near him; which gave them an opportunity of better understanding the Nature of the English Soil, and Strength of the British People. Some time these two Nations liv'd in Amity and Friendship, but at length the Saxons seeing their Country large, their Soil fruitful, and the Inhabitants weak and unable to make any considerable Resistance, first quarrel with Vortigern about their Pay, afterward get the whole Country of Kent made over to them by Covenant; with which not content, Hengist marries his Sister to Vortigern, and under the shews of Friendship desired all the Country beyond Humber, under this pretence, That the Saxons being well seated in those parts, would secure the Britains against the Invasions of the Scots and Picts. Vortigern easily granted this Petition, and Hengist immediately sent for his Brother Otha and Son Ebusa, with great Supplies, out of Saxony to people those parts; who, glad to exchange their own Country for a much better, soon arriv'd; and so the Saxons became absolute Masters of all Kent and Northumberland, which then contain'd all the Country from Humber to Scotland.

And now the Saxons growing strong and potent, by continual Accesses of their Countrymen to those parts where they were seated, began to contemn their Masters and Entertainers, and commit many Insolencies upon them. The British Nobility, not able to bear their domineering Carriage, combined together against them; and first deposing Vortigern, who had been the Cause of their Admission, elected Vortimer his Son to be their King and Leader against them. This brave and valiant Prince maintain'd many Battels with them, and whilst he liv'd (which was not long) protected his Country much from them; and after his Death Ambrosius the last of the Romans, and Arthur the Noblest of Britains, (who is said in twelve set Battels to have encounter'd them, and either vanquish'd, or come off with an equal loss in them all) kept them from their intended and desired Usurpation of the Britains Country and Estate. But at last, partly by the Politick Management of Hengist, who liv'd forty Years in Wars, and partly by Treachery, the Saxons prevail'd, and forc'd the Britains, almost consum'd with long Wars, to fly into the Mountains and remote Desarts of the Western part of the Isle, leaving the whole Nation almost in the power and sole disposal of their Conquerors.

The Saxons being thus become Masters of this Island, soon canton'd it out among themselves; and other their Countrymen, who having news of their success, came over to possess themselves of the Britains Lands and Estates. Hengist retain'd his Kingdom of Kent, and Otha and Ebusa still held the Country between Humber and Scotland; Ella and his Sons conquer'd the South-East parts, and began the Kingdom of the South-Saxons, containing Sussex and part of Surrey: Cerdick, and his Sons, landed at Portsmouth, and invaded the South and West parts, and began the Kingdom of the West-Saxons, which after contain'd the Countries of Hampshire, Berkshire, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire and Devonshire. Near the same time Uffa invaded the North-East parts, and began the Kingdom of the East-Angles, containing Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely: Erkenwin began the Kingdom of the East-Saxons, containing Essex, Middlesex, and a part of Hertfordshire. The Outparts of the Isle being thus distributed among the unjust Invaders, Cridla began the Kingdom of Mercia, or Middle-Angles, containing Lincolnshire, Northamptonshire, Huntingtonshire, Rutlandshire, Bedford, Buckingham, Oxfordshire, Cheshire, Darbyshire, Nottingham, and Staffordshire, with part of the Shires of Hereford and Hertford, Warwickshire, Shropshire, Lancashire, and Glocesteshire. But these Settlements were made not without great difficulty, and in no small compass of time: The Britains making such a vigorous Opposition to their Establishment, that tho' indeed they were vanquish'd wholly at last, yet they enjoy'd little of the Britains Estates, but naked Land. For in these bloody Contests between the Proprietors and Invaders, all the Noble Buildings, Baths, Aqueducts, High-ways, and other Ornaments of Convenience or Delight, which either the Romans, or the Britains in imitation of them, had built and rais'd, were utterly demolish'd, so that not the least mark or footsteps of them is now left; but instead of them we find very frequent Entrenchments, Mounts, and Burroughs rais'd for Tombs and Defences upon all the wide Champions and high Hills almost of this Isle, the indelible Proofs of the many Hazards and bloody Conflicts the Saxons underwent to get a peaceable Possession of their Conquests in this Island; which at last they obtain'd, but with the Ruine and Destruction of the old Inhabitants.

Nor was it the peculiar fate of Britain at this time to change its old Proprietors for new Lords; but this Nation only sympathiz'd with the rest of the World in the great Changes which Providence had then began to make, and soon after compleated. For there was scarcely any one Country or Province in the World, which did not about this time change its Bounds, Inhabitants, Customs, Language and Name. The Empire being first divided into two Parts, and those broken into many Parties and Factions, which call'd in other Nations to their assistance, made way to the innumerable Changes that soon after follow'd. For the French and Burgundians dispossest the Gauls, and gave the Name of France and Burgundy to their Province: The Gauls transplanted themselves to the Coasts of Spain, and fix'd their Habitation, not for Convenience but Necessity, in such places as they could by force obtain, which from them was after call'd Gallicia and Portugal: The Huns and Avari seiz'd upon Pannonia, and gave it the Name of Hungary: The Longobards, a People of Germany, who border'd upon the Saxons, enter'd Italy, got the greatest part thereof, which after their own Name they call'd by the Name of Lombardy, as it remains to this Day: The Goths and Vandals miserably harass'd the rest of the Empire, sack'd Rome it self; and after subdu'd, peopl'd and possess'd Spain. So that Britain was not ruin'd alone, but suffer'd in the common Deluge.

tants, puts on a new Face of Things: With its new Lords, it had new Laws and Government. Nothing was retain'd of the British Customs or Usages, as tho' they were resolv'd to have no marks left of so troublesome an Enemy as the Britains had been. Their Cities and Towns, Rivers, Hills and Mountains, because they could not demolish them, they gave them new Names. Britain it self was forbidden to be call'd by its ancient Name, but New-Saxony; and shortly after, either from the Angles, the greatest part of the Invaders, or from Hengist, their most eminent Commander call'd Engist-land, or England. The whole Nation at first they divided into Eight<sup>a</sup> Kingdoms, which continu'd till the Britains were quite expell'd their Country, under Caretius their King, who was driven over the Severn an Hundred Thirty Six Years after Hengist first came into England. But as soon as their common Enemy was remov'd, their Ambition stirring them up to enlarge their Dominions, they fell into Dissentions among themselves; and the strongest soon usurping the Dominions of the weaker, they were reduc'd to Seven Kingdoms, the Northumbrians enlarging themselves to the utmost bounds of their next Neighbours, so made one Kingdom of two. Nor did this Settlement hold long; for the West-Saxons took the Kingdom of the South-Saxons to their Dominion, and so they became Six, as they continu'd about Two Hundred and Fifty Years.

Saxon Government.

At their first Settlement, the Saxons, for an Hundred and Fifty Years, were govern'd by their own Laws, without any mixture of those of the Britains, or any other Nations. But when Augustine the Monk, commonly call'd the English Apostle, arriv'd here with forty others his Companions, sent hither by Pope Gregory the Great, and had converted Ethelbert King of Kent, and some other Persons of note; they soon after embrac'd the Christian Faith unanimously, and suffer'd their Laws and Rites to be modell'd according to the Ecclesiastical Constitutions. Their Kings, laying aside their warlike and rough Tempers, became humble and pious, conformable to the Genius of that Religion they had submitted themselves to; and their only Ambition was, who should raise the noblest and most numerous Monuments of Piety, which soon became visible in all parts of the Land: Divers of their Kings left their Temporal Dignities and Worldly Grandeur, to embrace an holy Retirement, and live a Monastick Life; as Ethelred and Kinred, Kings of Mercia; Offa, King of the East-Saxons; Kadwalla and Ina, Kings of the West-Saxons; Eadbert, King of the Northumbrians, and many others.

The Hierarchy reduc'd at last to two Kingdoms.

As to the Civil State of the Kingdom, tho' the Six Kingdoms held their own some Ages, yet at length the Kingdoms of Mercia and West-Saxons so far over-power'd the rest, that it lay between them, who should govern all. For Ina, a martial, wife, and religious Prince, governing the West-Saxons, advanc'd that Kingdom, by his Conquest of Kent and the South-Saxons, to so great an Eminency, that he was able to contend for a Supremacy with the King of Mercia, and that with doubtful Victory. But Offa, afterward King of Mercia, was in a fair way to have swallow'd up both the West-Saxons, and all the other Kingdoms: For while he liv'd, which was in the time of Charles the Great, (with whom he was Confederate) he was accounted the most potent King of the Nation: But the many Injuries he did to others, especially that barbarous Cruelty and Perfidiousness, which he was guilty of, in murdering Ethelbert King of the East-Angles, in his own House, when he came to him upon the publick Faith to court his Daughter, were so closely pursu'd by the Hand of Divine Justice, that tho' he dy'd in Peace, yet his Posterity never flourish'd, but every Day declin'd, till in the end they lost all. For Egbert, the Son of Iwegild, or Ingil, the Brother of Ina, having obtain'd the Kingdom of West-Saxons, laid the foundation of the Conquest of the rest; being a Prince, who from a private Station, wherein he had learned much Moderation, and inur'd himself to much Hardship, was rais'd to that Dignity by these means: Ina, his Great Uncle, having left the World and Kingdom, and dying without Issue, left the Succession involv'd in Troubles, and out of the direct Line, as he found it; and tho' we find a Succession of four Kings inheriting his Throne, viz. Ethelard, Sigibert, Kenwulf, and Brithric; yet they got it either by Election or Force, not by any Right of Descent. Brithric, the last of them, was sensible of the weakness of his Title, and therefore seeing the promising and towardly Disposition of Egbert, who by Blood was nearly related to the former Kings, he us'd all the Arts he could to destroy him; but Egbert perceiving his bloody Design, he fled to Offa King of Mercia, where finding his abode hazardous, because Brithric to strengthen himself had marry'd the Daughter of that King, he made his escape into France, and there remain'd till the Death of Brithric; and then returning, obtain'd the Kingdom of the West-Saxons, and subdu'd Cornwall, then inhabited by the Britains; and after invades Bernulph, who was newly possess'd of the Kingdom of Mercia, a State at that time, through the Interruption of the Royal Line, in a wavering condition. For Egfride, the Son of Offa, enjoy'd his Kingdom but four Months; the Hand of Providence cutting him off for his Father's Cruelty, and left his Kingdom to Kenwolfe, a Kinsman in the sixth Descent, whose Son Kenelm, a Child of six Years old, was soon depriv'd of it by Quindred his Sister, who murder'd him to get into his Throne, but mis'd of her aim, the People electing Ceolulph her Uncle to it. Ceolulph enjoy'd not the Kingdom long, being expell'd out of it by Bernulph, who met with the same fortune from Egbert, who seizing on it made his Kingdom tributary to that of the West-Saxons, as he did afterwards those of the South and East-Saxons with the Kingdom of Northumberland: So that Egbert in a manner became an absolute Monarch of the whole Country; tho' his Power

<sup>a</sup> We generally account the first Settlement of the Saxons to be in an Heptarchy, or Seven Kingdoms, viz. The Kingdoms of Kent, South-Saxons, East-Saxons, East-Angles, West-Saxons, Mercia, and Northumberland; but those that count Eight, divided this last into the Kingdom of Deira, which lies on this side Humber, and Bernicia, which lies beyond Humber, between that River and Scotland.

<sup>b</sup> Charles the Great was then King of France, and finding Egbert dextrous and ingenious, he employ'd him in his Wars, and many other Affairs of his Government, whereby he was made a very accomplish'd Prince.

<sup>c</sup> Brithric was poison'd by Ethelberg his Wife; a Woman of that malicious Temper, that all she could not remove by Accusations, though false, she would poison; which designing to do to one of the King's Friends, the King himself drank of the Potion, and dy'd.

<sup>d</sup> But they are said to have held out so long against his Arms, viz. Fourteen Years, that he made a Law, that it should be Death for any Britain to pass over Offa's Ditch; thinking by this means to prevent any disturbance from them.

<sup>e</sup> Egbert was thus far an absolute Monarch of Britain, that all the Seven Kingdoms were either subdu'd by him, or tributary to him. The Danes disquieted his Reign indeed, but had no part of England their own.

was

was never compleat, nor his Peace firm, because of the Danes, who having got footing in this Nation in the Reign of Brithric, could never be driven out again, but created continual Troubles in the Reigns of himself and Successors; till at length they ravish'd the Sovereignty from the Saxons, and took it into their own hands.

An Account of the Original of the Danes.

The Danes were a People of Germany, near Neighbours to the Saxons, and of a Language and Manners not much differing from them, possessing besides the Cimbrica Chersonesus (now call'd Denmark) all the Isles adjoining, lying in the Baltick Sea, and some time the Kingdom of Norway. A strong, hardy and warlike Nation, having plenty of Shipping, and great numbers of People. These Men perceiving the success the Saxons had here, and how much better a Soil they inhabited than their own, were very desirous to put in for a share with them; to which Attempt they were encourag'd, not only from the Nakedness of the Coasts, which every where almost lay open to Invasion, but chiefly by the many Divisions and Quarrels between their several Princes and Nations, which they foresaw would much facilitate their entrance. The Saxons therefore had scarcely ended their troublesome Wars with the Britains, and began to settle themselves under a Monarchy, when the Danes, as if they were sent to revenge the Cruelties they had done to the Britains, began to assault them with the same Disturbances. It would be both uneasy and tedious to the Reader, as well as difficult for me, to give a particular account of the many bloody Battels and Rencontres which happen'd between these two fierce Nations, while they scuffled for the absolute Mastery of this Kingdom, because they are so confusedly and disorderly deliver'd by Writers; and therefore I shall spare my self the pains, and the Reader the trouble of reading of them.

Ethelwolfe his Gifts to the Church and Rome.

After the Death of Egbert, Ethelwolfe his Son succeeded him in his Kingdom, under the Title of King of the West-Saxons only. He was a Prince more addicted to Devotion than Action; as is evident by his Donation of the Tenth part of his whole Kingdom to the Service of God, and an Exemption of all Lands belonging to the Church from all Tribute and Regal Services: Besides, he gave an Annuity of three hundred Marks to be expended in pious Uses at Rome, whither he went twice in Person, with his youngest Son Alfred, who was the chief Object of his Love, whom Pope Leo IV. anointed King at eleven Years old, as presaging his future Greatness and Fortune. In his last Journey, and whole Year's stay at Rome, Ethelwald his eldest Son conspir'd with the Nobility of the West-Saxons to keep him out of his Kingdom, and deprive him utterly of his Government; which he so craftily manag'd, that notwithstanding his People lov'd him extremely well, yet he was brought to yield up the Kingdom of the West-Saxons to Ethelwald, and retain only the Kingdom of the East-Angles (a small Principality of far less Dignity) to himself. After this he liv'd two Years, and left his whole Kingdom to Ethelwald, who to his eternal Infamy marry'd his Father's Wife Judith, Daughter of Charles the Bald King of France. He enjoy'd his ill-gotten Honour but two Years and a half; and then left it to his Brother Ethelred, who held it indeed five Years, but in continual War with the Danes, and dy'd of the Plague, and was bury'd at Winburn. After whom

ALFRED, or ELFRED<sup>b</sup>, a most incomparable A. D. Prince, who was made a King before he had a Kingdom, or any apparent Succession to it, began Alfred's his troublesome Reign at two and twenty Years of Age, and in a Year wherein there were eight several Battels fought between the Saxons and Danes; which was ominous to him, for his Reign was but as it were one continu'd War, either with his Enemies, or his Peoples Vices. In the beginning of his Reign he was so powerfully assaulted by the Danes, that he had almost lost all, and was forc'd to yield up a part of his Kingdom (viz. the Country of the East-Angles and Northumberland) to Guthrum or Gurmund, the Commander of the Danes; whom, upon his Conversion to Christianity and Baptism, he made his Confederate, and by free Gift confirm'd to him the Possession of those Dominions, which before he only usurped.

But notwithstanding his continual Engagements in War against his Enemies, yet he was not wanting to provide all things that were necessary for the well-being of his Nation; for he first of all collected the Laws of his Predecessors, and the other Kings of the Saxons, especially those of Offa King of Mercia, and Ethelbert the first Christian King of the English, into one Body; and by the advice and consent of his States then assembled, made choice of the best, abrogated the useless, and added others according to the necessity of the time. Then he provided for the Security of his People against the Robberies and Riots, to which the War with Foreigners had expos'd them, (for certain Men combining together to plunder both sides, so infested the High-ways, that no Man could travel about his business without a Convoy, or Guard against them.) Alfred to remedy this great Disorder, made a Division of his Kingdom into Shires, Hundreds and Tythings, that every Englishman (for so the Saxons now generally call'd themselves) living orderly, might be of some Hundred, or Tything, from which he was not to remove without Security; and out of which, if he were accused of any Crime, he was likewise to produce Sureties for his good Behaviour for the future; which if he could not find, he was forced to suffer the Penalty of the Law. If any Malefactor, before or after he had put in Sureties, escaped, all the Tything or Hundred were oblig'd to pay a Fine to the King, by which means he secured Travellers, and soon settled the Peace of the Country.

The great Admiration and Love which he had

<sup>a</sup> They landed three times in four Years, viz. at Landisfern, now Holy Island, Cornwall, and the Isle of Shepey in Kent; were very hardly driven off by Egbert and the English.

<sup>b</sup> Ethelwolf was bred a Monk, and had entred into Deacons Orders at Winchester, but by Pope Leo's permission was made King. He marry'd his Cupbearer's Daughter, nam'd Egburga, by whom he had four Sons, Ethelwald, Ethelbert, Ethelred, and Alfred, who Reign'd successively; but rebell'd all against their Father, but Alfred.

<sup>e</sup> It is said, that he put away his Mother upon the Admonition of S. Swithun Bishop of Winchester, and ever after rul'd his Kingdom in Peace and Justice, as a sign of his Repentance for that Crime. Radb. Hist. Wint. p. 204.

<sup>f</sup> Ethelbert his Elder Brother reign'd five Years before the Kingdom came to Ethelred. He had Troubles by the Danes, but eas'd himself by giving them Money.

<sup>i</sup> Rollo the Dane, and first Duke of that Norman Race, from which William the Conqueror was descended, landed with ten Ships; but being forc'd from Shoar, invaded Neustria in France, afterward from thence call'd Normandy.

This King's Provision for Learn-

for Learning, made him much lament the want of it in himself; accounting it one of his greatest Misfortunes to be bred up in the ignorance of it, and to have his Kingdom so utterly destitute of Learned Men, as it was, through the long continuance of the War with the Barbarians. To repair this defect, and raise the esteem of good Letters among his People, he sent into several parts for such as were grown famous for their Learning; whom, upon their arrival, he highly preferred, encouraged them to teach others, and had them himself in great veneration: Rareness then setting a greater value upon lesser Attainments, than after Plenty did upon the greatest Perfections. Grimbald and Scotus were invited hither out of France, and Afferius Menevensis (who wrote his Life) out of Wales, and others came from other parts. All the time he could spare from the important Concerns of a confused State, he spent in his Studies; by which he made no small progress in Learning, and deservedly bears the Honour of the first Learned Prince we had in England.

His Compo-sures, and good Management of his Time and Expenses.

His own illiterate Education made him the more careful of that of his Children, for whom he provided the best and most diligent Masters; and by their Example encouraged almost all the Nobility of the Kingdom to train up their Children in the same way. For the completing of which Rudiments, he either raised or revived publick Schools in several of the chief Cities of the Land. The Learning, which by his great diligence he had gained in his riper Years, he employed not for shew, or his own honour, but for the publick advantage, in translating the best Authors into the vulgar Language; which it seems he laboured much to adorn, and especially affected the Saxon Verses, which he was so elegant a Composer of, that he gained the Name of a Poet to that of a King. The Natural Day, consisting of twenty four Hours, he divided into three parts, whereof he allotted eight to Prayer, Study and Writing, eight to the Care of his Body, in Eating, Exercise and Sleep, and the other eight to the Affairs of State; which spaces of Time, because he had no better Instrument to measure them by, he marked out by the burning of a great Wax Taper, distinguished into so many parts, which as soon as they were each of them burned, he had a Person who attended it to give him notice. His Revenues also he proportioned into as good an Order, making his Liberality equal to all his other Expences; in which, that he might not be over-lavish, he took an exact account of all his Income, caused a general Survey of his Kingdom to be made, and had all the Branches of his Revenue to be registered in a Book, which he kept in his Treasury at Winchester. In this regular course did he live, notwithstanding the various Changes of his Fortune, and the weak Habit of Body he lay under, and reigned twenty seven Years; leaving his Son Edward, a noble and worthy Prince, his Successor.

EDWARD, [Surnamed the Elder] tho' he was much inferior to his Father in Learning, much excelled him in Power, being a warlike, courageous and fortunate Prince: For he was absolute King of Mercia, and had the actual Possession of it, for which Afred received only a certain Homage; and, as some Writers assure us, ruled over the East-Angles and People of Northumberland; tho' we find by the Laws that he and Guthrum made by joint-consent, that they held the same Correspondence as his Father had. He conquered the Britains in Wales, and fortified and furnished with strong Garrisons divers Towns in England, whose Situation made them fit to prevent the Incurfions of the Danes, and was the whole twenty three Years that he reigned in continual Wars, and in them very fortunate. And indeed his Father himself, and many of his Successors, during the Wars with the Danes, tho' they lost their Ease, yet made a much more valuable Purchase of Honour by it: For this National Calamity kept them in such continual Exercise, that they had no time to indulge themselves in Ease and Luxury; but were obliged thereby to be more pious, just and careful in their Government: For otherwise it had been impossible for them to have held out so long against the Danes as they did, being a People of that Vigour and undaunted Courage, as no adverse Fortune could deter them, so as to let go the hold that they had gotten upon this Nation, who, if they had met with an unactive Prince for their Enemy, would soon have wrought themselves into the whole. And this was the Reason that the Succession of the Saxon Monarchy is something broken, the People being forced to choose a more able Prince, where the direct Line imposed a Minor, or unfit Person upon them; as in

ATHELSTAN, or ETHELSTAN, who tho' he was an Illegitimate Son of King Edward, was yet preferred before his Lawful Son Edmund, who was under Age, and so unfit for a Kingdom in those difficult times, because he was grown to Man's Estate, and promised no small Advantages to the Nation from his Courage and Prudence. He was therefore Crowned with as great Solemnity and Joy as any of his Ancestors, and by an unanimous Election made their King. His Conduct in his Government answered the Expectation the People had of him. He proved Courageous against his Enemies, just to his People, and Zealous for Religion; in which Noble Actions, having spent a Reign of sixteen Years, he dyed as honourably as he lived, but without Issue.

EDMUND his Brother succeeded him: A Prince equal to any of his Predecessors in his Valour and Virtues, had he lived to have given a full proof of them. In the five Years he reigned, so <sup>a</sup> It is said, that on the South-side of the Thames, the People of England were so illiterate, that few or none could read.

<sup>b</sup> He also made a Law, that all Freemen that had two Hides of Land should keep their Sons at School till fifteen Years old.

<sup>c</sup> Viz. Neoth, John of S. Davids, and Joannes Monachus, whom he placed in his School at Oxford, now University-College, as he did Scotus and Grimbald in another, now part of Brazen-nose College.

<sup>d</sup> He founded the University of Oxford, a School at Crikelade in Wiltshire for Greek, and Lechlade in Glostershire for Latin. He built three Monasteries, viz. Etheling, Winchester and Shaftsbury, in one of which he was buried, viz. Winchester.

<sup>f</sup> He was Crowned at Kingstone upon Thames, and is the first of our English Kings whom we read to have been Anointed at his Coronation, according to the Custom of the Jewish Kings.

<sup>h</sup> An Instance of his pious Care was in repairing the University of Cambridge, burnt by the Danes, and restoring it to its Lustre.

<sup>i</sup> He conquered the Scots, and by the Prayers of John of Beverley, is said to have obtained a Sign, that the Scots ought to be subject to the English, which was this: He struck a Rock with his Sword, and cut a Yard deep into it; which is to be seen near the Castle of Dunbar at this Day, Radb. Hist. Wint. p. 211. He, among many other Victories over the Danes, in one more signal slew five Kings, twelve Captains, and almost all their Army; and so brought them to yield him a quiet Reign over all England. At the Conclusion of which Agreement, the single Combat of the famous Guy Earl of Warwick, and Colbrand the Danish Giant, is said to have decided all Differences, the Victory falling to the English Champion. Tho' this Story is suspected of Falshood.

<sup>k</sup> He is said to have recovered Lincoln, Derby, Stafford, Leicester, from the Danes, and converted them to the Christian Faith.

fortunate were his Arms, that none of his Enemies could stand before him; but tho' he escaped in the midst of Dangers, yet he met with his Death in his own Palace, being slain at a Feast in his own House, by the hand of a base Assassin, in the midst of his Nobles and People, who admir'd and lov'd him. He left two Sons, but being both too young to enter upon a Kingdom so full of Troubles,

EDRED his Brother was preferr'd before them both, who inheriting the Virtues and Bravery of his Ancestors, maintain'd his Kingdom stoutly against the continual Inrodes of the Danes all his Reign, which lasted but ten Years; when dying, he left his Kingdom to

A. D. 955. EDWIN, or EDWY, his Nephew, the eldest Son of his Brother Edmund, (a vicious and extravagant Youth) who declining from the excellent Qualities of his Ancestors, was an Happiness to his People in nothing but his short Reign of four Years; after which dying, he left his Kingdom to

959. EDGAR, his Brother, a Prince of great Worth: He was indeed very Young when he came to his Throne, being but sixteen Years old; but being of a pliable Disposition, and willing to admit of Counsel, was, by the grave advice of his Bishops, (who in those Religious times had an absolute sway over the Hearts and Affections of most Men) so instructed in all the Methods and Rules of a good Government and Religion, that he became a most Heroical Prince, and admirable Governour.

His Navy built against the Pirates.

Among other his excellent Acts of Government, he provided a mighty Navy to secure his Coasts from Invasion, which as he gather'd from lamentable Examples (tho' late) would be the best way to keep the like Calamities out of this Nation for the future; which for some Ages past, and at that time did greatly disturb and afflict it, not being expert in Sea-affairs. For when the Romans first conquer'd it, the Britains had no Shipping, but a few small Boats made of Wicker, or Osiers, cover'd with Hides; with which they could make no Opposition to the Romans, nor after to the Danes, who had very strong Ships, as the Times then were, and therefore easily found a secure place to land on so naked Coasts. Egbert indeed is said to have provided a strong Navy about the Year 840. and Alfred thirty or forty Years after is reported to have done the like: But their Ships being either consum'd by the Enemy, or decay'd and lost by disuse and neglect, Edgar builds a fresh Navy, and set out a Fleet of sixteen hundred Sail, as some write, and others say * more; he divided it into four parts, appointing them their several Points to cruize at, thereby to secure his Coasts from Pirates, and all foreign Enemies, himself every Year in part of his Navy, sailing round the Isle, of which he stil'd himself King.

* Three thousand.

He was absolute Monarch of England.

And that he might compleatly reduce the Nation to one Monarchy and Name, he stil'd himself King of Albion, as appears from the Charter granted by him to the Abby of Malmsbury in these words, Ego Edgarus totius Albionis Basileus, nec non Maritimum, seu Insularum Regum circum-habitan-tium, &c. i. e. 'I Edgar King of all Albion, and of the Kings inhabiting the Isles, and Sea-coasts thereof, &c. For having first of all the Saxon Kings made Peace with the Danes, and granted them a quiet Settlement among his own People in all his Dominions, he had a Sovereign Rule over them: And Kenneth King of Scots did him homage, whether for Cumberland and Westmorland, given to that Crown by King Edmund his Father, or for his whole Kingdom, I cannot affirm; and five Kings of Wales did the like for their Country, coming all to him at his Court at Cardiffe: So that he seems the first absolute Monarch of this Land.

The general Peace which he enjoy'd through his whole Reign, procur'd him the honourable Title of Pacificus, and made his Kingdom, always a stranger before to so great a Blessing, very flourishing and prosperous during his time, which was sixteen Years. But it lasted little longer than his Reign; and, as if it had been made for him, as it was by him, was almost bury'd in his Grave. He dy'd young, viz. in the 32<sup>d</sup> Year of his Age, and left his Son Edward, a Child, to inherit his Throne; who, not being able to avoid the cruel designs which his Mother-in-law Elfrida had form'd to raise her Son Ethelred to his Dignity, fell a Sacrifice to her Ambition; and being so robb'd of his Earthly, was untimely translated to a Celestial Crown: He was murder'd by her own Hand in her House (Corfe-Castle) in the Isle of Purbeck, as he was hunting, having lost his Company, and coming thither to visit her, and refresh himself, tir'd with the Chase.

973. ETHELRED, the Son of King Edgar, by his second Wife Elfrida, having gotten the Crown by his Mother's Cruelty from his elder Brother, was put into the full Possession of it by St. Dunstan, who against his Will crown'd him King of England. It is said, that the Holy Man preaching the Sermon before his Coronation, prophetically foretold the Miseries which should follow his unjust Acquisition, in these words; Quoniam aspirasti ad regnum per mortem fratris tui, &c. i. e. "Because thou hast aspired to the Crown by the Death of thy Brother, whom thy wicked Mother hath slain, Thus saith the Lord, The Sword shall never depart from thy House, raging against thee all the Days of thy Life; destroying thy Posterity, till thy Kingdom be translated to another Nation, whose Customs and Language thy People know not: Nor shall thy Sin, and that of thy cruel Mother, and her Accomplices in that bloody Fact, be expiated but by long Punishment. Whether this Speech were thus deliver'd or no, may perhaps be doubted by some: But 'tis certain, it was verified by the Event. For the new erected Monarchy thro' a Divine Curse upon the Governour, fell immediately in pieces, and two Conquests by foreign Nations, within the space of fifty Years followed.

St. Dunstan's Re-proof of his Usurpation.

The Danes, in the first place, being multiplied among themselves, and having much strengthen'd their Interests by marrying with the English in the late Peace, which they enjoyed twenty Years together, found themselves in a better Condition to oppose them with good Success than they had ever been; especially observing that the English were unsatisfied with their King, disaffected to Assaults and Success against the English.

* He hated the Monks, and is said to have banish'd Dunstan for reproving his Excesses: But we must beware how we believe Monkish Writers, when they write of their Enemies.

† In all his Reign no foreign Army disquieted the Peace of this Nation.

‡ But in this Peace the English are said to have learn'd such excessive Drinking, that Edgar was forc'd to make a severe Law against Drinking, That no Man should drink beyond certain Nicks or Marks made in their Pots for that end.

his Government, and divided among themselves, so that 'twas very improbable they could or would make any tolerable Resistance. Wherefore that they might effect an absolute Conquest of the Land, which they had so long attempted in vain, they invited their Country-men out of Denmark to come with all the Assistance they could possibly make for them; who thereupon came in such great Multitudes, that they assaulted most of the Coasts and parts of the Nation at once: So that the State was at a loss how to suppress their Insolencies. Ethelred encountered them with small Forces once, and again, but to no purpose; and therefore was forced to buy his Peace at the Price of 10000*l*. The Danes gladly accepted the Money, but never let the poor English enjoy their Purchase: For this Composition being too manifest a Proof of the English Weakness, and the Danes Strength, they every Year renewed their Invasion on purpose to sell their Peace; which they always did at a dearer Rate every Year than other. This produced the first Tax that was ever laid upon the English, then known by the Name of Dane-gelt; which tho' it was very grievous to the People, yet was continued for many Ages after the Occasion ceased: And in the end (tho' under other Names) became the usual way of Supply for Princes Wants in time of War and Danger.

The first Tax which the English have called Dane-gelt.

Ethelred, by his Gifts, was so far from easing his People of their Troubles, that he rather procured greater Expences. The Danes desires of Money growing greater by their Receipts, inasmuch that Swain King of Denmark, and Aulase, or Anlase King of Norway, thought it worth their while to go in Person upon an Expedition into England to return loaden with Treasure, which accordingly they had: And Aulase, who was a Prince of a milder Disposition, was converted to Christianity and baptized. These heavy Burthens, and grievous Calamities, which the English suffer'd from Foreigners, were much increased by the Disloyalties and Unfaithfulness of Ethelred's own Subjects; his principal Men, who were intrusted in the Defence of the Nation, proving the Betrayers of it, as it usually happens to broken Fortunes, very few are faithful Friends to them. For when after the Example of Edgar his Father, he had provided a great Navy; Elfrick, the Admiral, is said to have given Intelligence of their Strength and Design to the Danes, and so disappointed the whole Intent of it. The Earls Fran, Fritbigist, Godwin, and Turkettle, the Chief Commanders of the Army by Land, being secret Friends to the Danes, discourag'd their Men by Flight from the Battel they had begun, and so caused their Defeat. Edric, Duke of Mercia, who after these was created General of all the King's Forces; was so much the more infamous for his Disloyalty, by how much the King reposed the greater Trust in him: For when he came to engage the Enemy, he feigned himself sick, and left his Army to shift for themselves; who fell into the Danes hands, and left the Country to be their Prey, for which he bore the Name of False.

The Unfaithfulness of his Officers.

Wolnod, or Wilmot, a Nobleman of Suffex; who was for his Misdemeanour out-lawed and banished by the King, infested the Coasts with continual Robberies, having twenty Ships mann'd with Thieves and Pirates. The King sent eighty Sail of his Ships to take him, which being first lamentably torn with a Tempest, were set upon by Wilmot, and being unable to resist were all by him set on fire. This Perfidiousness of the Nobility, tho' it might proceed from their Discontents, Emulations, or disloyal Affections, yet is charged upon Ethelred's Pride and Vice, whom yet we find to have been more unfortunate than really weak; and had he had faithful Ministers of his Affairs, might have gone in the foremost Rank of our English Worthies: For he neglected no Occasion to make a brave Resistance against his Enemies, and to that end made great Preparations both by Land and Sea, brought his Affairs many times to a great Ripeness; but thro' an unlucky Fate, that lay upon him, he never proved successful. So that tho' indeed he was a Prince of good Designs and Arms, yet being unfortunate in his Actions, he bears a Name of Ignominy and Reproach, which all the desperate Battels he fought<sup>b</sup>, the good Constitutions of Government he made, and the great Provisions which he on all occasions made for his Kingdoms Safety, can never rescue him from.

Ethelred of himself no bad Prince.

To the former Calamities were joyned Famine, and a great Mortality, with unusual Inundations of the Rivers and Seas, as if God and Man had conspired together to make this Nation as miserable as the Sins of the Prince and People deserved; and nothing would satisfy, but their utter Destruction.

While the Nation was struggling with these heavy Judgments, Swain King of Denmark, to greaten the Load of their Afflictions, comes with a strong Navy to raise new Sums of Money upon the English, oppressing the poor distressed People till he had a Sum of 48000*l*. granted in an Assembly of the States at London, paid to him; by which means a Peace, or rather a Bargain of Slavery, was made between the two Nations; That they should dwell quietly together, and enjoy their own Liberties and Properties without any Molestation, which was confirmed by solemn Oaths on both sides, and Hostages delivered by the English. The Danes in this Agreement laid aside open Hostilities indeed, but could not dissemble their Thoughts, that they were Masters; and therefore behaved themselves with great Insolency to the English, committed many close Outrages; offered many base Abuses to the Wives and Daughters, not only of the meaner sort, but of the Nobility themselves; with many other intolerable Disorders. These things so exasperated the Spirits of the English, that they resolved upon a full Revenge. One Hune, a great Commander, and valiant Soldier of that time, being sensible of the Weakness of the Nation to right themselves of such Injuries, propounded a secret way of Revenge, by a sudden and universal Massacre of the Danes in all parts of the Land. Ethelred approved the Motion, and advanced the

A Massacre of the Danes.

<sup>a</sup> It is said, That Edric, the False Duke of Mercia, was the Cause and Adviser of this Tax. The Peers, and among them Siricius, Archbishop of Canterbury, were the Promoters of the Composition with the Danes; but Edric to reimburse his Master, devised the Imposition upon the People, which tho' advantageous to himself, render'd him odious to the People, especially after it was redoubled, and yet extorted from them, as it was shortly after.

<sup>b</sup> He was particularly careful of the due Execution of Justice, and made many good Laws for his Judges, injoyning them to do Justice, yet with Mercy; to accept no Man's Person, and take no Bribes: And was so strict in the Observance of them, that having found one Walgeatus, a Judge, whom he particularly loved, to have broken his Laws, he deposed him from his Office.

<sup>c</sup> The Danes every where treated the English no better than their Slaves; forcing them to labour, while they sat at home with their Wives, and like Drones fed on the Honey, which by their indefatigable Industry the poor English had gathered. Nor were they herewith contented, but as an open Reproach of their Cowardice, the Danes required them to call them Lords; which for more Quietness sake they yielded to.

A. D. 1002. Design by giving his Orders for the Execution of it [On the Feast of S. Brice, Nov. 13. 1002. this bloody Tragedy was acted] with so much implacable Fury and Cruelty, as evidently shewed the Rancour and inveterate Anger the English had conceived against them. Neither Temples, nor Altars, Supplications, nor any Bands of Alliance could save them from Slaughter; but where-ever they found the Danes, they immediately destroyed them. Gunbald, the Sister of Swain King of Denmark, who had shewed her self a continual Friend to the English, and by her Mediation procured them a Peace; yet being a Dane, could not escape their Fury, but was slain with her Husband and Son. She being a Woman of a Masculine Courage, met her Death not with Fears, but Threats; telling the Murtherers, that her Blood should cost their Nation dear, and that a severe Revenge should be taken of them for her Death, as it after happened.

Deaths.

The News of this sad and bloody Fact was soon carried over to Swain King of Denmark, who as he repented it not with more Grief than Fury, so he made the speediest Preparations he could to revenge it; having now a just occasion to deal with the English with the utmost Rigour and Severity, who had first shewn him an Example of unmerciful Cruelty. The next Summer therefore (for sooner such an Expedition was not safe to be attempted) he sets forth for England with a great Navy, enter'd the Country in the Western Parts, and after a most barbarous manner ravaged and spoiled it. The English not so courageous to maintain their Fact, as they had been to commit it, yielded up the Possession of their Country to him; chusing rather to submit, than stand the Hazard of a Victory. All the Nation became Swain's, except the City of London, which being strongly fortified, Ethelred held out against him, and made a noble Resistance; till he left them, and fled first into the Isle of Wight and after into Normandy, whither he had sent Emma his Queen with her two Sons, Edward and Alfred, from the Rage of this Tempest. But within two Months after, he was again invited home by his own People upon the Death of Swain, who just when he was ready to have been crowned King of this Island, died; leaving his Son Canutus to succeed him in his Fortunes, and accomplish his intended Designs.

Ethelred being returned home, was soon furnished with an Army; and setting upon Canutus, lying then at Lindsey with his Father's Ships, and English Hostages given his Father a little before, forced him to Sea: At which he being enraged, made about to Sandwich, where he first treated cruelly all such of Ethelred's Friends as he could get into his power, and then grievously mangling the Hostages, he sent them home, himself returning into his own Country with the Spoils which he and his Father had gotten, to make greater Preparations for the prosecution of his purpose the next Year. Ethelred in the mean time did not desist from pursuing the advantage he had got; and to weaken the Danes Power and Interest, he, in a General Assembly at Oxford, caused many of the Danish Nobility to be murther'd; among which was Sigfrith and Morchar, Earls of Northumberland, whom the false Earl Edric (who was never backward to be an Actor of Mischief on either side) having invited to a Banquet at his Lodgings, caused there to be kill'd, and their Followers with them; who, having defended themselves and Master as long as they could, fled into a Church, where they were consum'd in the Flames with the Building.

Canutus having strengthen'd himself with all the Forces he could raise at home, or procure of his Neighbours, with whom he was in League, return'd again to England within the Year; and landing at Sandwich, had all the West parts surrender'd up to him without resistance, who gave him Pledges for their Obedience, and furnish'd him with Horse and Armour. Ethelred lay very dangerously sick, and not being able to oppose the fierce Invader himself, sent his Son Edmund, surnamed Ironside, with a good Army against him. Edmund, a Prince full of Youth and Courage, and every ways fitted to have deliver'd his Country, had he liv'd in better Times, and among faithful People, joyfully march'd against Canute, to try his fortune; but in the way being inform'd, that Edric the False had promised to betray his Father's Fleet to the Enemy, (which he soon after did, going over to them with forty Ships) and being deserted by Utrede, one of his chief Commanders, he was obliged to retreat to London, the only place which retain'd their Loyalty to their King in his Misfortunes. Hither also Ethelred himself, having a little recover'd his Sickness, came with such small Forces as kept their Fidelity to him; but relapsing into his Distemper soon after his arrival, and tired with Troubles, dy'd, having reign'd thirty seven Years, and was bury'd in St. Paul's Church at London, behind the Quire.

CANUTUS, after the Death of Ethelred, (whose long Reign shews, that the Unfortunate often have too long time allotted them, and the Fortunate too little) was by most of the Clergy and Nobility chosen King; only the City of London, with some of the Nobility thereabouts, elected Edmund, and furnish'd him with so good an Army, that through the courageous Briskness and Vigour of his Youth, (which is generally most fierce in the first Attempts) he had much the better in three successive Battels, fought within three Months after he was made King; and had certainly gain'd a fourth at Ashdon or Essendon, had not the Disloyal Edric forsaken his Sovereign, and carry'd over his Party to the Enemy, who, in all probability, had receiv'd a deadly Blow without that assistance, and with it gain'd that fatal Victory, which prov'd the Conquest of England: For here Edmund lost the Flower of his Nobility, and best of his Soldiers, and among them Ulchel the Heroick Earl of Essex; who being a Man of great Worth and Courage, stood up boldly in defence of his Country in the time of Swain, and gave proof that there were both Hope and Possibility of keeping out the Enemy, had not there wanted Union and Loyalty among them.

From this Battel Edmund made his escape to Glocester, to gather new Forces; and was not so utterly forsaken by the English (tho' London by the late Victory fell into the Enemy's hand) but that in a small time he gather'd another powerful Army, and resolv'd to try his Fortune once more with Canute, who was swollen with the great Thoughts of this Victory. Canutus, on the other side, as solicitous to keep the advantage he had gotten, as he was lucky to get it, pursues after him, and overtakes him near the River Severn. Battel, a Motion of Peace was made; or, in case that could not be accepted, a single Combat between the two Kings, to save Expence of Blood; for 'twas most just, that they who were to wear the Honour should decide the Quarrel, which was not likely to be ended, but with the utter extirpation of one of the Nations. A single Combat was consented to by both Kings; and in an Isle, surrounded by the Severn (now call'd Alney) in the sight of the Armies, did they fight for the Kingdom. The Combat was long and equal, but Edmund had the advantage both in Strength and Fortune; for he gave Canute a dangerous Wound, and much over-power'd him; which the Dane craftily concealing, made a proposition of Peace, and won Edmund to throw down his Arms, and come to this agreement, That they would live in perfect Love and Friendship one with another, and enjoy an equal Division of the Kingdom: To confirm which Agreement, they not only mutually swore, but chang'd Cloaths and Arms, to shew the Unity of their Minds; as tho' Edmund were now become Canutus, and Canutus Edmund. A fatal and ignominious Exchange for so free and courageous a Prince, who not only made himself half a King by this Act, but expos'd himself to that Treachery of his Enemies, which he need not have fear'd from their strongest Armies. For in a few Days after this League, he was treacherously slain at Oxford, some say by Duke Eirik, others by his Son, an Evil Egg of an Evil Bird; and so the Kingdom was wholly translated to Canutus; who, tho' he liked not Treason, nor approved of the Act of the Traitor, yet embraced willingly the Purchase of both. He reign'd scarce one whole Year, and left two Sons, Edward and Edmund, and one Daughter, Margaret, marry'd to Melcolm King of Scots.

Canutus the Dane, King
of England.

CANUTUS, the Son of Swain King of Denmark, having thus gotten the absolute Dominion of this Kingdom, govern'd it with greater Justice than he had obtain'd it; putting off his natural Roughness, and conforming to a more civil and smooth Conversation. And that the Nation might be sensible, that he resolv'd, now he was King of it, to study its advantage, he immediately sent away his Navy, and dismissed his hired Soldiers to their own home, and cast himself wholly upon his People; believing, that his Kindness to his People would be a surer way for his Establishment, than the use of Force; which so pleased the Nobles, then assembled at London, that they consented to give him eighty three thousand Pounds in Silver to pay them off, and discharge them.

Canutus puts Eirik
to Death.

At his first Accession to the Crown, his Care was to rid himself as well of his false Friends, as of his avowed Enemies. Eirik, who first came to salute him sole Monarch of England (as if he had told him, that he made him so) he order'd to be beheaded, and his Head to be set upon the highest Pinnacle in the Tower of London; therein making good the Promise he gave him, when he brought him Edmund's Head, That he would advance his Head above all the Peers of the Kingdom. This just Punishment of Treason gave a wonderful Satisfaction to all the Nation, which rejoiced to see his Perfidiousness so well rewarded. After the same manner he, not long after, dealt with the two Earls, Turkill and Erick, who being by him banish'd the Nation, and sent into Denmark, he caused to be Executed upon their arrival there.

But the Love of his People, and the good Opinion of Justice, which he had gotten by the former Actions, were again soon after lost by his Cruelty to the Royal Branches, Edmund and Edward the Sons, and Edwin the Brother of King Edmund; whom in his Opinion being such Impediments to his Dignity, that his Crown could never sit fast, so long as they were alive, he sent to his Brother in Denmark to be murder'd: By which Privacy, tho' he thought to have escaped the Infamy of so foul a Fact at home, yet Suspicion alone soon rais'd him a general Odium among the People. But these young Princes met with kinder usage abroad, than they could have hoped for at home, under Canutus's jealous Eye; for their tender and innocent Years moved their intended Executioner to such Compassion, that he not only spar'd them himself, but convey'd them out of danger, by sending them to Solomon King of Hungary, to be educated in his Court; where afterwards Edward, who survived his Brother, was marry'd to Agatha, the Sister of that Queen, and Daughter to the Emperor Henry II. by whom he had two Sons, Edmund and Edgar, and as many Daughters, Margaret and Christian. Alfred and Edward, the Sons of King Ethelred by Emma, were preserved by Richard Duke of Normandy, their Uncle, and so were out of his reach.

Canutus being thus rid of his Fears, tho', as he was sensible, with a little damage to his Reputation, set himself to recover his Honour again, by becoming a most eminent Benefactor to the Publick; and to that end employ'd all his Thoughts and Revenues to repair the Damages, which the Nation had suffer'd by the Wars, both in its Buildings and Laws. He erected several Churches and Monasteries, and by his Patents endow'd them with plentiful Estates and Provisions, especially in or near those places, where he had obtain'd any signal Victories; that at once he might testify his Devotion and Thankfulness to God. He made many Ecclesiastical and Civil Laws, which he publish'd in the Language of that time: They are very full of pious Admonitions; which testify not only the Piety as well as Justice of the King himself, but also that the best way in his opinion to have Laws observed, was to have them first approved in their Consciences. Among other things he inflicted severe Punishment on all Intemperances of his People, and all Offences of ill

* Edmund had for his part Kent, the Kingdoms of West-Saxons, East-Saxons, and East-Angles; and Canutus had Mercia and Northumbria.

† He was stab'd in the Belly by Earl Eirik's Son, as he was easing his Body at Oxford. Radb. Hist. Wint.

‡ At the Persuasion of Queen Emma, the Widow of Ethelred, marry'd to Canutus.

§ Others say, he was smother'd, and cast out of a Window into the Thames.

¶ Edwin remain'd in Canutus's Court awhile, that King shewing him much Favour; but being a Man of a Morose Temper, for which he was call'd the King of Churlcs, he was never lov'd in the Court, and therefore soon met with Death among his professed Enemies and false Friends; but by what Instruments, we have only Conjecture to inform us.

‡ He, by the advice of Emma his Queen, repair'd the old Monastery at Winchester, and adorn'd it with so much Gold, and Silver, and Jewels, that it was admir'd for the Riches of it. Particularly He is said to have given a Cross worth a Year's Revenue of the Crown. He built Bennet Abby in Norfolk, and St. Edmund's in Suffolk.

¶ These Laws, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, were not so much compos'd by him, as Edgar; but only were more firmly establish'd: They were the Saxon Laws, afterwards more fully enacted by Edward the Confessor, and from him call'd the Confessor's Laws; now for the more part extant in the Magna-Charta.

¶ He caus'd all Clergymen guilty of Murthers, Adulteries, or other foul Crimes, to be degraded; Adulteresses to have their Noses slit, &c.

influence upon good Manners. Just he was in the highest degree, but not Cruel; few of his Laws being Sanguinary, according to the Custom of those Times, which, tho' rough and warlike, yet had a way of preserving good Order in his Kingdom without the Effusion of much Blood. For no Punishments were made capital, but treasonable Conspiracies; but all other Crimes were punish'd by Fines, Banishment, Slavery, or Imprisonment. One Example of his Clemency, among many, is worthy our notice. There was a Law then in force, That whoever had committed Theft, and the Goods were found in his House, all his Family were made Slaves, even to the Child in the Cradle. This Law he abrogated, as most unjust; and enacted, That only the Malefactor, and such as assisted him, should suffer the Punishment; and that the Wife (unless the stolen Goods were found in her Custody under Lock) should not be guilty, or suffer for her Husband's Offence. By these Laws, and other his good Actions, did this King so gain the Love and Affections of the People, that he made as absolute a Conquest of their Hearts, as he had of their Country; and England thought it their Happiness to be his People and Subjects. Nor did he suffer their Affections to cool, but increased them daily by many popular Actions; for he not only paid a singular Reverence and Honour to the Memory of the late King Edmund his Confederate, but severely punish'd all those that had any share in murdering him. Then he marry'd the Wife of King Ethelred, Emma, (tho' his Bed was no great Honour to her, who had lost her former Husband by his Hands) by whose means he secured himself from any attempts of the Duke of Normandy for his Nephews, in regard that she might have Issue by him, who by contract of Marriage were to succeed.

Canutus's Clemency.

Canutus
made King of Norway.

Scarce was this Monarch well establish'd in his Kingdom over the English, but another offer'd it self. The People of Norway contemning the weakness of their King, and conspiring to depose him, broke out into Factions, and revolted. Canutus fastens upon this opportunity, and partly by his great Strength, which he carry'd out of England, and partly by his Money and great Reputation, he so much prevail'd with the People as to choose him their King. And so he became the most Puissant and Renowned Prince in all these Parts of the World, being entitled, King of England, Denmark and Norway. With his Power he enlarged his Magnificence, especially towards the Church, which he sought all Means to advance, either to appease his own Conscience, or ingratiate himself with his People; which at that time, being addicted to Religion, were much pleased with such Acts of Devotion. And having enriched his Kingdom with many Acts of his pious Bounty, he undertakes a Journey to Rome to visit the Sepulchres of St. Peter and St. Paul: All along the Way, he did many Works of Charity, by freeing all Streights and Passages from Toll, which had usually been exacted before of Travellers that passed that way. At Rome he gave many large Gifts to St. Peter's Church, and by his Mediation obtain'd, that the Saxon School, founded there by his Predecessors, Kings of England, should be freed from all Impositions and Tributes for ever. What Entertainment he met at Rome from the Pope,

Conradus the Emperor, and divers other Christian Princes, he gives an account of to his Bishops and Nobility, in a Letter written to them from thence; wherein he earnestly exhorts them to take care in his absence, that Justice be impartially administer'd to all his Subjects, without any regard to his advantage or profit; for he would by no means have his Revenue enlarg'd by the Injuries of others. He also straitly charges them, that the Dues which are owing either to the Church at home, or the See of Rome, be all paid, and discharged before his Return.

Thus did this great Prince, the mightiest and most absolute Monarch that ever yet had sat on the English Throne, the Original of a new Line of Kings, and of a new Government, strive to lay a good Foundation of a lasting Succession in these Kingdoms, and by his good Deeds bring the Divine Favour upon his Posterity. And who would have thought, but he might have been a Root of as long a Descent, as afterward the Norman was, having as numerous a Male-Issue, being better Belov'd, of greater Power and Virtues than he? But it was not in his Fate. He left several Sons, viz. Swain, Harold, Hardicanute; of which, tho' two enter'd the English Succession, yet they enjoy'd it but a little while: So that the Possession, which Canutus had purchas'd at so great Expence of Blood and Labour, was lost in a manner with him.

Canutus's
Greatness, but want of Succession.

HAROLD, the Son of Canutus, after his Father's Death, succeeded him in his Kingdom of England; being, as some say, made King by his Father's Appointment; but as others write, by the Election of the Danish Nobility in an Assembly at Oxford. Godwin, Earl of Kent, who was left Guardian (as he pretended) of the Queen and her Children, with most of the English Nobility, stood for Hardicanute the Son of Emma, or else Alfrid the Son of Ethelred, who is said to have come out of Normandy upon the Death of Canutus to claim the Crown: But Harold, who had gotten Possession of it, had so strengthened himself against all Pretenders, that notwithstanding this Opposition, he was proclaimed and crowned King. The first act of his Reign was to seize the Treasure of his Step-mother Queen Emma, whom he banished out of his Realm; then he put out the Eyes of Alfrid her Son, who had been a Competitor with him for the Kingdom, and committed him to a loathsome Prison, where he died. Earl Godwin is reported to have betrayed the young Prince into the King's hand. The Queen Emma fled to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, her Kinsman, where she remained to the Death of Harold, who reigned but four Years; and then she returned into England with her Son Hardicanute, who accidentally came out of Denmark to visit her at Bruges. Harold died without Children.

HARDICANUTE, after the Death of Harold, his half Brother, was proclaimed King of England. unnatural unnatural Revenge, in causing the Body of King Harold to be taken out of its Tomb, and having severed the Head from it, to be cast into the River Thames: Then he made a strict Enquiry after those who had been instrumental in the Death of Alfrid, his Brother by his Mother. Earl Godwin, and Livingus Bishop of Worcester, were accused of it. [Alfricus Arch-bishop of Canterbury] The Bishop was deprived of his See, but the Earl by a rich Present of a Ship of Gold, made his Protestations of Innocency to be easily credited by the King and the Nobility, among whom he had great Interest. The Bishop finding the Strength of Gold, by a Sum obtain'd his Bishoprick, and so that bloody Act was wholly imputed to the late King.

Not long after this, by the Instigation of Earl Godwin, he imposed a general Grievance on the whole Kingdom by a prodigal Gift, which he bestowed on his Fleet of Danes; ordering every Mariner to be paid eight Marks, and every Captain ten, which he raised upon the State; a Tax so heavy in those Days, that it caused a Tumult at Worcester, wherein the Collectors were killed. Thus by his Vices and ill Actions, he was a Burthen to his Nation, and only an Ease by his short Reign; for he died in the second Year of his Reign at Lambeth, where he was celebrating a Marriage. He was thought to have been poison'd. With him ended the Government of the Danes in England (having continued twenty six Years only under the three last Kings) and so the Power, which no Force could withstand in England, expired of it self, and the Nation was left to chuse a King of their own, without Competition. King of England.

EDWARD the CONFESSOR, the Son of Ethelred, by Emma his Queen, who by the provident Care of his Mother, was sent into Normandy to secure him from the Danish Force, was immediately sent for upon the Death of Hardicanute: And being elected King by the general Consent of the Nation, was crowned at Winchester by Ed-sine Arch-bishop of Canterbury, An. 1042. being then about forty Years of Age. Godwin, Earl of Kent, was a Principal Agent in this Preferment: But for his own ends. The Kingdom (having dearly paid for the Admission of Strangers) made an Order, That he should not bring any Normans with him. The first publick Act he did, was, That he remitted the heavy Tribute called Danegelt, imposed by his Father, which amounted to 40000 l. a Year, and had been paid for forty Years past. He caused a Body of the best, and most wholesome Laws, to be collected out of those of the Mercians, West-Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, and to be written in Latin. He was indeed a Man very exemplary for his Piety, but fit for no time, but those peaceable and quiet Times he lived in: For having been educated with the Nuns of Juniegas in Normandy, he scarce knew himself to be a Man, when he came into England, much less a King. And of this, some give us this notable Instance, That being very angry with a Country Fellow for disturbing his Game when he was a hunting; he said, I would punish thee were I able. And as if he had vowed Continency with the Nuns, with whom he was bred, he was so far from knowing other Women, that tho' he lived many Years in a formal Shew of Marriage with his Wife, yet after his Death she protested her self a Virgin.

The Easiness and Simplicity of the King was Godwin made a means of raising himself and Family to the highest pitch of Greatness by Earl Godwin; who first insinuating, that he was the chief Man that raised the King to his Crown, obtain'd that his Daughter should be accepted in Marriage by the King, by which the whole Nation in a manner came to be governed by the Earl. Syward, Earl of Northumberland, and Leofrick, Earl of Hereford, Men of Spirit and Greatness, took notice of his aspiring Ambition, and seeing him so much for himself, stood up the more for the King. This Emulation proved advantageous to the Nation; for as Godwin sought to greatness himself by the Conquest of Wales for the King; which his Son Harold, Earl of the West-Saxons, effected, by vanquishing the two Welsh Kings, Ris and Griffith; so Syward deprived Macbeth, the Scottish Usurper, of his Life and Crown, and restored Melcolm to his just Right. Robert, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, a Norman, much in Favour with the King, was also Godwin's Enemy: So that not only he missed of his present Designs, but thro' the Sagaciousness of his Enemies, his future Aims were discovered, which they made manifest to the King upon this Occasion.

Eustatbius, Earl of Bullogne, who had married A Disgrace at Dover.
Goda the King's Sister, having been at Court to visit the King; and in his return again to France, his Harbinger, who was sent before to provide him and his Retinue Lodgings at Dover, behaving himself rudely and insultingly to a Citizen, was slain by him. The Earl after arriving with his Company, pursues the Person and slew him, with eighteen more. The City being alarm'd at this piece of Revenge, took Arms, and slew twenty two of the Earl's Servants: At this, the Earl hastens to the King, complains of the Citizens Rudeness, and so aggravates the Matter, that Earl Godwin was immediately commanded with a sufficient Force to go down to Dover, and chastise them for this Insolency. The Earl knowing, that this Sentence proceeded from the Information of one side only, advised the King first to send for some of the Chief of the Citizens to answer the Charge, and according to their Defence, to proceed. This wholesome Counsel was interpreted by his Enemies, as if the Earl favoured the King's Enemies, and designed to make himself popular: And they so far possess'd the King of it, that he began then to have a Suspicion of his Affection to him, and at length looked upon him as aiming at his Crown; wherefore not long after, the Earl was summoned to a Parliament at Gloucester, but neither he, nor any of his Sons would appear: But suspecting, that his Enemies had some ill Designs against him, he raised some Forces,

* By all the Subjects of England, except the Clergy, who thro' the Piety of those Times were exempted from all Taxes, which since have been doubled upon them.

* These Laws are for the most part the common Laws of England, now in use; so called, because they are such Usages and Practices, as by long Experience have been found for the common Good of this Nation: Among these Laws he enacted, That no Person should be molested or troubled with any Law-suits upon certain Festivals: And that Criminals flying to the Church for Safety, should be protected and apprehended by none but the Bishop and his Ministers. With many other excellent Laws.

* His Piety was so acceptable to God, as well as remarkable among his Subjects, that God gave him a Power of healing Diseases miraculously; and from him it is, that the miraculous Gift of healing the Disease from thence called the King's-Evil, is derived to the Christian Kings of England, tho' common to the Kings of France with them, and by as good a Title.

under a Pretence of suppressing the Welsh, who at that time made no Disturbance. Whereupon the Parliament removed to London, and there summoned him again to appear, and dismissing his Forces to come to them, with twelve Men only, he returned them this Answer, That he should be content to dismiss his Forces, do any thing the King would command him, provided it were with Safety of his Life and Honour; but to attend upon them without a sufficient Guard, he was satisfied was for neither. The Parliament having received this Answer, knew no other way to rid themselves of him, but to command him to depart the Realm within five Days, which he did; and with his Sons Swain, Tofto, and Girib, sailed into Flanders, where Tofto married the Daughter of Earl Baldwin V. Harold his eldest Son fled into Ireland. The King puts away his Queen, that she might share in the Disgrace of her Family, and Misfortunes of her Kindred; tho' according to the Description which is given by the Writers of those Times of her, she was most undeserving of that Punishment: For they say, she was a Lady of great Worth and rare Parts, very learned and beautiful, and of as fair a Mind as Body. Earl Godwin, in his Exile (while the Normans and his Enemies had the King's Favour) fell to Piracy; disturbed and plundered the Coasts, and ventured up to London by the River: Where being so popular, that no Forces would oppose him, he was admitted to such a Peace as he would make; which being such, as if not directly, yet in the end would tend to the Ruine of the French and his other Enemies, they thought it their best Course to forsake the Court and Kingdom, but carried with them such a true Notion of the Kingdom's Weakness, thro' the Distractions of the People, and Factions of great Men, as a little after gave them Encouragement to attempt the Conquest of it.

Earl Godwin banished.

Earl Godwin's Revenge upon the Normans.

Earl Godwin being again restored to his Country, and in great Credit with the King, made use of his Interest and Authority to gratify his own revengeful Temper, and injure others. Robert, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and his Normans, he caused to be banished, and did many Acts of Injustice to the People; which did so blacken those peaceable Times, and disaffect the People to the King, that they accounted him among the worst of Governours, who tho' he did no ill himself, yet suffered his Authority to be abused by those that did. The Queen Emma had her share of Trouble in this Reign, suffering much both in her Estate and good Name, thro' Godwin's Hatred to her. Her grand Accusation was, That she had kept Company too familiarly with Alwynie, Bishop of Winchester, and by her scandalous Behaviour disgraced the Royal Line; for which she was deprived of her Riches and Estate, and imprisoned. The Queen, to vindicate her Innocency, was contented to undergo the severe Tryal of a Fire-Ordeal (which was to pass blindfold with her bare Feet over nine Plow-shares, made red hot, and laid at even distance one by another) which she safely performed, and by it recovered her Fame and Honour with the King and Nobles of the Land, who were all Spectators of this miraculous Act: But Earl Godwin's Death put an end to farther Trouble by his Means.

Edward having now reigned near twenty Years, and being pretty well advanced in Age, and being without Issue, began to think upon his Succession, and to secure that in his own Line, sent for his Nephew, Edward called the Out-law, out of Hungary, with his Children. They lived some time in his Court; but Edward died before him, leaving only one Son. Edgar, surnamed Atleling, whom he had by his Wife Azatha, Daughter to the Emperor Henry II. who being very young and bred a Stranger, which are really no just Bar to Right, was neglected at the Death of his Uncle, the pious King Edward, which happened An. 1065. when he had reigned twenty four Years. His Body was interred in the Church of Westminster, which he had newly founded, and his Throne disposed out of his Line to Harold.

HAROLD, the Son of Earl Godwin, the next A. D. Day after Edward's Death, was raised to 1065, the Regal Dignity, and made King; whether by any Title he derived from the Danish Kings, by his Mother, (who was the Sister of Swain, King of Denmark) or by mere Election of the Nobility, it is not easy to determine: But it seems, that the Circumstances of the Times were such, as necessarily required, that the Scepter should be put into the hands of such a Person as was best able to undergo the Burthen of War, and the other great Troubles the Nation was likely to fall into, thro' the various Claims, then put in both by the Dane and Norman for the English Crown; and none could be fitter for it in such a Juncture than Harold, who was judged on all hands the most eminent Man of the Kingdom, both for his Deserts and great Alliance with the Nobility of this Kingdom, both by his own Pedigree and his Wife's; who was Algith, the Sister of Edwin and Morchar, the Earls of Yorkshire and Chester. Neither did he deceive the Expectations of the Nation in electing him; for he took the best Methods to govern the Kingdom well, and made such Provisions for the Safety of the Nation, as the most active and politick Prince could do: And had he had but a favourable Fortune, and faithful and courageous Subjects to second his brave Actions, the Attempts of the Enemies of the Kingdom had been in vain; but the approaching Danger so terrified the Nation, that the Terror robbed them at once of their Courage and Diligence.

The first that gave his Reign any Disturbance was his own Brother Tofto; who in the time of King Edward, being entrusted with the Government of Northumberland, behaved himself with such Pride and Cruelty to the People, that he was banished the Kingdom. Being in Normandy, when his Brother obtain'd the Crown of England, with William Duke of that Country, whose Wife's Harold's Conquest of his Brother Tofto, and Harold King of Norway.

<sup>a</sup> It is said, that Edward as soon as he came to the Throne, depriv'd Emma of all her Estate; only ordering her a necessary Maintenance, for her Cruelty to him in his Adversity, in denying him whatever he asked of her.

<sup>b</sup> The Sentence in such Cases was, That the Person guilty was to walk with the whole Weight of her Body and bare Feet upon the nine Plow-shares red hot, and if she were not burnt she was judged innocent; if she were, she suffer'd farther Punishment: And this was the Sentence pronounc'd upon the Queen, and Tryal she went through, though this Historian seems to understand it otherwise.

<sup>c</sup> It is said, That Earl Godwin's Death was thus: Being at a Banquet with the King; he suspected by some Reflection the King made on him, that he thought him guilty of the Death of his Brother Alfred; and to clear himself of it, he wished that the next Morfel might choak him if he was any Cause of it. The King, we are told, blessed the Morfel, and he eating was choaked.

Sister he had marry'd, he was easily instigated through Hatred to his Brother to invade England; and being furnished with a Fleet and Men, he first assaults the Isle of Wight, and then fell upon the Coasts of Kent, where he plunder'd some of the Inhabitants, but was soon driven off by the King's Navy: Whereupon he withdrew from thence into the North parts, and attempting to land, was so warmly received by Morcar and Edwin, the Earls of Yorkshire and Chester, that they forced him to fly, tho' with loss to themselves. Tofto seeing all his endeavours in vain, and being unwilling to return to Normandy with nothing but ill News, repairs to the King of Scots, to beg his Assistance, but received a Denial; by which he was reduced almost to Despair. In his return he met with Harold, surnamed Harfager, King of Norway, who having conquer'd the Orkneys, was coming with three hundred Ships to invade England, to whom Tofto joyn'd himself, and encourag'd the Attempt. They landed at Tinmouth, and breaking through the faint Opposition they met with in those parts, which were unprovided to encounter an Enemy, march'd into the heart of the Country without any loss. Near Stamford, Harold met them with a strong Army, and after a long and eager Battel obtain'd a remarkable Victory; slaying, besides the two Captains, Harfager and Tofto, the greatest part and worst Men of their Army.

The Duke of Normandy invades England, and conquers it.

William, Duke of Normandy, not discourag'd by the Misfortune of Tofto, was resolv'd not to give over his Claim of the Crown of England, which he pretended was given him by the last Will of King Edward his Kinsman; and therefore, notwithstanding this ill success, provided a great Navy, and strong Army, to make a second Attempt. He landed at Pemsey, not far from Hastings, in Sussex. Harold remained yet in the North; but upon the News of William's arrival, hasten'd with all the Forces he had into the South. At London he met with a Messenger from William, who came to demand his Kingdom. Harold could scarcely hear the Message with patience; but checking his Pailon, he charg'd him to depart out of his Country: And immediately mustering his Army near London, he march'd against the Invader. About seven Miles from Hastings, was the Controversie decided between Harold and his Competitor, William Duke of Normandy; upon whom, tho' Fortune cast the Victory, yet never Battel was more bravely fought on the part of the English; who, rather than fall under the Slavery of the Normans, dy'd 69074 upon the Spot, few or none escaping. Strange it is indeed, that so great a Kingdom, as England was at that time, should at one Blow, by so small a Nation as the Normans were, be quite subdu'd, so that it could never make any considerable Resistance against the Conqueror. But the Causes and Reasons are very apparent to any that consider the Circumstances of Things, and Nature of the People: For besides the Divisions that were among the Nobility at that very instant, when Danger was so near them, that nothing but the closest Union could save them, the People of the Nation in general, by living long secure from any Enemy in peaceable Times, were grown unexperienced and negligent in Arms, and generally render'd weak and effeminate by Luxury and Idleness; the Clergy grown Licentious and Illiterate; the Nobility given to Gluttony, Whoredom and Oppression; the Comunalty addicted to Drunkenness and Disorder. And 'tis said, that in the last Action of Harold at Stamford, he lost his bravest Men; and the rest were discontented, because Harold retained the Spoil to himself: So that he came to this Battel with many raw undisciplin'd Soldiers, and a discontented Army, which was an occasion of this lamentable Loss. Besides, the Normans had a peculiar way of Fighting with long Bows, with which the English being wholly unacquainted, were chiefly overthrow'n. And yet their own Writers report, how that the main Body of the English Army (consisting of Bills, their chief and ancient Weapon) held so close together in one Body, that no Force could dissolve them, till the Normans (making a shew of Flight) drew them into Disorder, and so got the Day.

The Body of Harold being obtain'd of the Conqueror, by the Request of his Mother, who sent two Monks of Waltham-Abby to beg it of him, was after much search found among the Heaps of dead Bodies, and bury'd in the same Abby which he had himself built. He was a very unfortunate Prince; his Reign was full of Miseries and Troubles; he Ruled but little, but lost all. He left four Sons, Godwin, Edmund, Magnus, and Wolfe. The two Eldest fled away after this Battel into Ireland, and from thence made some Attempts upon the Western Coasts of England, but to little purpose. With this King ended the Saxon Line, after it had been in England five hundred Years, from the first coming of Hengist, and his Settlement here. And from the Commencement of the Norman Race do I intend to begin my History.

* Harold Harfager claim'd the Crown of England as his Right by Canutus. He is said to have been slain by Harold's own hand.

* Harold's Army being to pass over a Bridge, to encounter his Enemies, one Norwegian kept the Bridge a considerable while against his whole Army, and slew forty Men before they could get free passage over it.

* That it was but a meer Pretence, appears from the most serious words which he spake upon his Death-Bed, concerning his Right to the English Crown: 'Twas not an Hereditary Right that put me in Possession of this Honour; but by a desperate Engagement, and much Bloodshed, I wrested it from the Perjur'd King, Harold; and having slain, or put to flight all his Abettors, made my self Master of it.

* It seems, it was the Custom of the English in their Wars to give the most considerable and valuable part of their Booty to their Captains, and leave the rest to their Soldiers; which Harold, through Coverousness, or perhaps Necessity, at that time seizing upon, gave a Discontent to his Soldiers, when he had most use of them.

* They are said to be Osgod and Ailricke.

* She offer'd him its weight in Gold for the Body, which Duke William refus'd.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF WILLIAM I.

The State of England by the Norman Conquest.

BY the Conquest of England by William Duke of Normandy, there was so great a Change made of the ancient Laws, Customs, Language, Writing, Forms of Battels, Buildings, yea every thing but Religion; that there cannot be a fitter Period of History, than to begin with his Entrance upon the Government: For with a new Race of Kings, England put on a new Face of Affairs, and was so much changed, as if it had been metamorphiz'd into another Kingdom. It grew more victorious abroad, and refin'd at home. The Danes indeed united it under one Form of Government, and made it the most terrible of all the Kingdoms of the North: For whereas before, for five Hundred Years, it was busied at home in civil Wars and Factions. Canutus, by his Mildness, brought it to submit to him as their Head; and employing their victorious Arms abroad, brought the Kingdom of Norway into Subjection to him: But the Normans coming upon them, enlarged their Dominions beyond the Seas, and added the goodly Provinces of the South † to their Command. Nor did they less improve things at home; for they brought in greater Civility into common Converse, antiquated their old Custom of intemperate drinking, and instead of their Roughness and Excesses, implanted Temperance and a generous Desire of Reputation and Honour. Now the English began to dispise their little homely Cottages, and to build themselves stately Houses, magnificent Churches and Monasteries, to provide neat and good Furniture, and to erect Castles and Towers after the Norman Fashion. They no longer hunt in common, as they did before, but they inclosed Parks for their private Pleasures: And in fine, they took up all the Norman Fashions and Habits; and tho' there was a greater Mixture of many Nations, than ever before, yet they all so eagerly complied with the Norman way of living, either thro' Fear or Novelty, that they immediately seemed but one. The Saxon Language in the general still remained; but was soon mixed so much with the French (all the Terms of Building, Hunting, Handicrafts, Cloathing, and War, with the Names of all such Instruments and Weapons as were used in them, being wholly in that Language, and the Character of the Letters altered to the Roman and French) that the Tongue seemed quite changed, and exactly conformed to the new Scheme of things, and is now hardly to be known. But that we may know both the Man and the Nation which subdued us, I will look back a little upon the Original of both, and give you this Account of them.

The Normans were a People which came out of Norway and Denmark, and consequently of the same Manners and Fashions with those Northern Countries: Which thro' their promiscuous Use of Veneries, without any ties of lawful Marriage, produced such great Abundance of People, that they were forced frequently to arm out great Numbers of them to seek themselves such Habitations as they could by War and Violence obtain. Such a Colony was sent out in the time of King Alfred, under the Command of one Rollo, or Roul, a great Captain among them. These Adventurers having left their own Country, first landed in England (which always lay open to Invaders) and hoped to have found good Entertainment there: But contrary to their Expectation, meeting with fierce Opposition, they were content to leave them with a small Booty of Cattel, which they had got from them, and use their Forces another way. From hence Rollo sailed against Rambalt, Duke of Friesland, and Reignier, Duke of Chaumont and Hainalt, with whom he had many sharp Contests, and did much Mischief in their Country; but not being able to gain a Place of Settlement, he passed along the Coast of France, and entering the Mouth of the River Seine, ravaged the Country up as high as Rouen, where the People having not long before been miserably afflicted by Hasting, or Hading (another of these Danish Invaders) were extremely affrighted at the Approach of a new Army: In-somuch, that the Arch-bishop of Rouen, by the Instigation of the People, offered him the Obedience of that City, and the adjoining Country thereabout, upon condition that he would defend them, and administer Justice according to the Laws of Christ, and Customs of the Country: For Charles the Simple, who was then King of France, not being able to protect them against this Invasion, because his Forces were employed against the Enemies of his Crown, was obliged to suffer them to settle in that Place; and in a short time, he grew so powerful, that he attempted the Conquest of Paris itself, and notably foil'd the French Captains in several Skirmishes: So that Charles was forced to come to an Agreement with him, and yield up the whole Country of Neustria to him, which from the Normans was called Normandy. Rollo being thus gotten into the peaceable Possession of a Dukedom for himself, and a convenient Habitation for his Normans; began to establish Laws, and settle so well a formed Government, that he made his Name ever after in great Honour and Reverence among his People, and laid a Foundation of a firm Succession for his Posterity. Not long after he had thus set things in order, he was converted to Christianity; and being baptized, received the Name of Robert from his God-father Robert, Brother of Eudes, late King of France, who then was a Competitor with Charles for the Crown; who is said to have assisted Rollo underhand in his Attempts upon France, tho' afterward he alledged it as a Crime against Charles, that he had given away his Country, and favoured Strangers. From Rollo descended six Dukes of Normandy in a direct Line, who reigned an hundred and twenty Years, viz. William I. Richard I. Richard II. who had two Sons Richard and Robert, who ruled successively.

* Yet our Historians say, That some Novelty in Religion came into the English Church by this Conquest; for the English before, had the Scriptures read in their Churches in a known Tongue, prefer'd the Original Hebrew before the Latin Version; had no Prayers for the dead, or for the Pardon of Sins, or the Relaxation of the Pains of such as were thought to be in Purgatory, which they believ'd not; worshipp'd not Saints, tho' they had an honourable Memory of them; had the Communion in both Kinds; the contrary to which Doctrines crept in by the Norman Conquest.

† North-men, being the Flower of the Swedes, Danes and Norwegians, Northern Nations. These People infested the Coasts of England, France, Ireland, and Holland, with Piracies so much in the Times of Charles the Great, that it was made a Petition in the Publick Litanyes to deliver them from the Normans. From the Rage of the Normans, Good Lord, deliver us.

Robert, the last of them, having ruled eight Years, either out of Devotion, or to expiate some secret Sin, which lay heavy upon his Conscience, took up a Resolution to visit the Holy Sepulchre: And that he might set all things in order for his Departure, assembled all his Nobility to acquaint them with it. They dissuaded him much from it, not only because he had no Children; but because Alain, Earl of Britain, and the Earl of Burgundy; were already in Contest about the Succession to his Duchy: So that upon his Death or Departure, their Country was like to become a Seat of War, and a Prey to Ambition, which they thought he was bound in Conscience by all means he could to prevent. The Duke not at all removed from his Intention, desired them to rest contented; telling them, 'That he had a Son, which tho' not begot in lawful Marriage, he did not doubt but he was his own Child, and that he would invest him in his Duchy, as his Heir before he left them; and desired, that they would acknowledge him such, and submit to him as their Prince. The Earl of Britain, (saith he) notwithstanding his Competition for my Throne, yet such is my Confidence in him, I will make him his Governour, and President of Normandy, and the King of France his Guardian; and so I will leave him to God and your Loyalty. Soon after the Bishops and Barons did their Homage to the young Prince, named William, who was the sixth Duke of Normandy after Rollo, being begotten by Duke Robert on Arlet, a beautiful Virgin, but of mean Degree, in the City of Falaise. After this, the Duke delivering the Child to Henry the First, King of France, with his own hand, and causing him to do him Homage for his Duchy, committed him to his Royal Faith, and so enter'd upon his intended Journey; at the end of which, as soon almost as he came, he died. William, his Son and Successor, being thus left at nine Years old, became subject to all the Afflictions and Calamities of Minors, the Nobles of

made Duke of Norman- dy.

Normandy fell into great Factions and Quarrels; which while the chief Officers thought to allay by his Presence (having obtain'd him by much Entreaty from the King of France) they increased. For presently upon his coming among them, there followed the murdering and poisoning of their Governours, Intrusions into Offices, supplanting and surprizing his Person, by the Nobility, who were proud and haughty, not able to endure the Precedency and Greatness one of another.

But these Troubles about his Person, were far less than several others, which he was forced to encounter in the Defence of his Right to the Succession; which being stained with his illegitimate Blood and Birth, render'd him obnoxious to the Contests which better Claims might commence. And of these, the first that appeared against him was Roger de Fresney, a Person of great Worth and much Experience in Military Affairs, having been a Captain in the Wars against the Saracens in Spain: He brought a fair Pedigree from Rollo, to justify his Claim to the Duchy, and by feasting the Nobility of the Normans, got a great Interest among them. Hereupon he begins to urge it to them, That it was a great Wrong and Injury to the Posterity of Rollo, who had gotten the Dukedom by his Valour and Courage, to have a Bastard to be preferred before him, who was a Legitimate Descendant from him; and no less Disgrace to so brave a People as the Normans were, to suffer themselves to be so govern'd; especially since they had others, who in a direct Line were come from their former Dukes, Rollo, William, and Richard, and no less worthy of that Dignity, than their present Prince. By these means he had got a considerable Party, and being impatient of delay, brought his Claim soon to be decided in a Field Battel. Roger de Beaumont headed the young Prince's Forces against this Competitor, and by his Conduct gained so compleat a Victory, that all Fear from him was utterly extinguished; himself, two Brethren, and the greatest part of his Army being slain. This Action so advanced the Reputation of the Duke, that the King of France began to be jealous of his rising Power; and therefore (contrary to his Trust reposed in him by Robert) he first takes from him the Castle of Tbuilliers and demolished it; pretending some Wrongs and Injuries to be done by the Garrison that lay there to his Subjects, and then openly assisted his Base-born Uncle, William Earl of Arques, against him; lending him a powerful Army to vindicate his Claim to the Dukedom, tho' he came off in it with as great a Loss as Dishonour. For Count Guiffard, the Duke's General, drew the French into such an Ambush by a Stratagem, that he destroyed the whole Army, and left but few to relate their Misfortune at Paris, to the great Grief of that King; and Arques being conquer'd by the young Duke, not yet seventeen Years old, fled to seek his Fortune with Eustace Earl of Bullogne, where he found but cold Entertainment, Favour generally changing with Mens Fortune, and few regarding Men overthrown. These Enemies being subdued, a greater Danger succeeds by a private Conspiracy. There lived with Duke William a young Lord of his own Age, named Guy Son of Regnault Earl of Burgogne, and Alix Daughter to Richard II. Duke of Normandy; who being sensible of his Title to the Dukedom, was persuaded by some stirring Spirits to endeavour to obtain

* He is said to have poison'd his Brother Richard, and tho' he had a Natural Affection for his illegitimate Son William, yet 'tis not improbable; but that his Sin, which he committed in begetting him on Arlet the Daughter of a Skinner of Falaise, might trouble his Conscience; and to expiate for these Sins, he resolv'd upon this Pilgrimage, a thing much us'd in his time.

it, which they told him was by right his, and usurped by the Bastard. These Admonitions kindled the young Man's Ambition, which to gratifie he had a now lucky Opportunity; for having lately composed a Quarrel between two of the greatest Lords of Normandy, Viscount Neel and the Earl of Bessin, with much Prudence and Caution he had gain'd the Love and Friendship of both Parties, with some Disgust to Duke William, who seemed to disdain them by not taking notice of it. These he easily brought to joyn with him in a Conspiracy to murder the Duke suddenly, and by Surprise; which probably they had done, had they not been discovered by a Fool, who not being excluded their Consultations, because he was thought not to have Wit enough to take notice of it, went at Midnight to discover the Plot to Duke William; who observing the Fright the Fool was in, and considering what Prudence it was to avoid Dangers in the least suspected, immediately took Horse and fled to Falaise. The Conspirators not discouraged, tho' they were a little disappointed, pursue him; and tho' they could not overtake him, yet they raised so strong a Faction of all sorts of People, that he was forced to leave his own Dominions, and fly to the King of France to beg his Aid and Assistance against them. His Request was not easily obtained, because that King was afraid of his growing Greatness; but the Duke putting him in mind of the faithful Services his Father had done him; That he himself was his Homager, and held his Crown under him, and could fly to none so properly as him for help against his mutinous Nobility; That this Rebellion, if not repressed, would be of dangerous Consequence to his own Kingdom, with many other Arguments to shew the Importance and Necessity of a Relief, so prevailed with the King, that he was contented to go in Person with a powerful Army against the Conspirators, whom they found in the Valley of Dunes, ready to encounter them; and so there began a Battel with equal Resolution on both sides. In this Fight one Guillefson, Uncle to Viscount Neel by his Mother, forced his Horse into the Battallion of French, and struck the King from his Horse with his Lance; and tho' he himself was dismounted by Count St. Paul, and his Horse slain by Castillon, who came to rescue the King from the Danger he was in; yet he made his Escape out of the Press, and fled into Apulia, with divers others. The King being incensed with this Blow, spared not to avenge himself on his Enemies, and Duke William was not inferiour to him in any daring Attempt. The Victory was a long time wavering; till Ralf de Tesson, to gain the Duke's Favour, betrayed the Army of the Conspirators, and so they were conquer'd. Divers of them, whose Hearts were too great to yield, fled over the Mountains into Italy to Robert Guiscard, their Country-man, who of a private Gentleman, became Supreme Lord of Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily; and had he lived, was in a fair way to have been Emperor of Constantinople; but dying left his Dominion in Italy to Roger his second Son, Beaumont his eldest being then engaged in the Holy Wars, where he became Prince of Antioch. To this Guiscard these rebellious Normans were very welcome, and none more than Guillefson, for the late desperate Attempt he made upon the French King; because as he sought to increase his Army by entertaining them, so he was most pleased with the bravest Men. Guy de Burgogne having escaped the Fight, fortified his Castles of Briorn and Vernouille, but in the end was forced to surrender them and himself to the Duke's Mercy; who dealt so favourably with him in sparing his Life, and allowing him a Pension, that many others submitted themselves to him, and thereby secured their Lordships and Estates, but he demolished their Castles to secure their Obedience.

William having thus settled his own Dominions in Peace, had but little Enjoyment of it before a foreign Enemy gave him a Disquiet. Jeffrey <sup>William annoy'd by foreign Enemies.</sup> Earl of Anjou, making War upon the People of Poitou, encroached upon the Neighbouring States; and among others seized upon Alençon, Dampfront, and Paiffais, Cities belonging to the Dutchy of Normandy. William, who was always for getting and never for losing, immediately levies an Army, and first recovers Alençon, where (because the besieged scornfully reproached him for his Mother and Place of Nativity; crying out, when they saw him, La Pel, La Pel, i. e. a Skin, a Skin, in reference to the Skinners of Falaise, of whom his Mother's Father was one) he used them with great Cruelty. Then he laid siege to Dampfront, and hearing that Count Martel was coming with great Forces to relieve it, he sent Roger de Montgomery, with two other Knights, with this Message to the Earl; That if he came to visit Dampfront, he should find him Porter to keep him out. Whereunto the Duke returned this Answer; Tell the Duke, to morrow by break of Day, he shall have me the e on a White Horse ready to give him Battel, and will enter Dampfront, if I can; and that he may know me, I shall have a Shield of Or, without any Device. Roger replies, Sir, You may spare the pains; the Duke will be here ready to meet you on a Bay Horse, with a Streamer of Taffata on the top of his Lance to wipe your Face. And then they parted. The Earl made all the Preparations for next day he could; and in the Morning, as he was ordering his Army for Battel, News was brought him that Dampfront was taken: Upon which he immediately departs, and in his Passage homeward, was in a narrow Streight set upon by Viscount Neel, and great part of his Army cut off; by which good Service that Earl regained the Duke's Favour, and kept it ever after. Dampfront being taken, the Duke with his Engines and Forces removed to Hambriers, a Frontier Town of Count Martel's, and by the way (had he not discovered it himself) had been utterly destroyed by an Ambush, which cost him a great many brave Men to get himself free of; at which he was so enraged, that he rushed himself into the midst of his Enemies, and making at Count Martel, beat him down with a Blow of his Sword, clave his Helmet in funder, and cut off one of his Ears, and yet escaped out of the Press; and in the issue utterly defeated the Anjovins. While he was thus busy against his Enemies abroad, another Conspiracy was formed against him at home, by William Guelan Earl of Mortaigne, who was descended from Richard the Second, and William Earl of Eu and Montreul, a Branch from the Family of William, Brother of the said Richard, and Esselin, Countess of Montreul. The first was only vehemently suspected, the other was proved guilty; and being banished, his Estate was seized, his Earldom of Mortaigne was given to Robert, and that of Eu to Odo (after Bishop of Bayeux) both his Brethren by his Mother. These Assaults from abroad, these Scorns and Conspiracies at home, he pass'd through before he was two and twenty Years of Age; and thus his Enemies made him, whom they fought to undo. And now, having dispers'd all outward and visible signs of Enmity both at home and abroad, he dare not promise himself Safety; but to secure himself, and strengthen his Kingdom against all ill Practices for the future, he summon'd a Parliament of Prelates, Barons, and Gentlemen, and caused them to take an Oath of Allegiance to him, and raze their Castles; which done, he marry'd Matilda, Daughter of Baldwin V. Earl of Flanders; yet not without some ensuing trouble. For his Uncle Manger, Archbishop of Roan, excommunicated him for marrying within the degrees of Consanguinity, which were forbidden by the Church, Matilda being the Daughter of Eleanor, his Father's Sister: To expiate for which Offence, by a Dispensation from Pope Victor, he was enjoin'd to build an Hospital for blind People, and two Abbies, one for Men, and the other for Women; which he did at Caen in Normandy.

Duke William's Marriage.

The King of France's Wars against Duke William.

The success which William had against his Enemies on all sides, made him so formidable to the neighbouring Princes, that France it self began to be very jealous of his growing Power; and having naturally no Love for the Normans (whom in scorn they call'd Treuwans) incited their King, who himself was forward enough to repress a Person grown so much more powerful than the other Princes of his Dominions, to find out some pretence of Quarrel with him. This was an easie matter to do, where their Dominions had so near Confines; and therefore in the first place he accuses him of having done many Wrongs and Injuries to his Subjects bordering on his Dukedom; and particularly, he resented his late oppressing of Count Mawel: And that his Cause might look the more plausible, he alledged, "That it concerned him in Honour and Justice to have that Province, which held of his Crown, to be govern'd by a Prince of lawful Blood, according to the Christian Doctrine, and Laws Ecclesiastical; and therefore resolv'd to depose Duke William, and settle a Legitimate Prince. Hereupon he rais'd two powerful Armies, gather'd from all parts of his Kingdom, and sent them against him; the one by the River Sein, and the other by the Country of Bessin; that his Dukedom being encompassed on all sides, he might not possibly escape. The Duke in the mean time was not unmindful of his own defence against so Potent an Enemy, and having gather'd a good Army, divided it into two parts; with the one he sent out his Brother Odo Earl of Eu, Walter Guifford Earl of Longueville, and others, into the Country of Caux; and with the other part he went himself towards Eureux, intending to oppose the King of France, who was at Mante. The Cattel, and all other portable Provisions, he caused to be removed out of the flat Country into the Cities and Castles, not only to furnish themselves, but incommode the Enemy. The French Army march'd on towards them from Beauvais to Mortimer, where, finding the Country stor'd with all manner of Provisions, they staid that Night, and feasted themselves with plenty of Good Cheer; thinking that the Norman Army was with their Duke at Eureux. Odo, who commanded the Army in Caux, having intelligence of the French Army's Dissoluteness and Security, made use of that opportunity to oppress them; and marching all the Night, fell upon them about break of Day with that suddenness and fury, that they slew near three parts of them, being in all forty thousand,

took many Prisoners, and among them several Persons of Note, and put the rest to flight, leaving their Horses and Baggage to the Normans. This Defeat caused the King to return home in Anger and Rage; but upon cooler Thoughts, he desist'd from Revenge: And upon the delivery of the captiv'd French, agreed to a Peace with the Duke, and restor'd to him the Castle of Tbuilliers, which in his Minority he had taken from him. Count Martel, tho' very much disheartned by the loss of the French Army, yet did not desist from making some Attempts to recover the Towns the Duke had taken from him; but found that it was to no purpose without a greater Army than he had, or could raise, the Normans being so powerful. Wherefore the next Spring, he went to importune the King of France to assist him against the Duke, telling him, That the Normans were grown so insolent by the Victory they had stollen, not gotten fairly of the French, that there was no living by them; that they made the French ever since the Subject of their Sports and Songs, as if the King of France, through the loss of a few Men, was quite retired, and had rather stick to a dishonourable Peace, than appear again in the Field against them. These Importunities, and the Relation of the Abuses and Reproaches of the Normans, so prevailed with the French King, that he rais'd another Army, much bigger than the former, in which were three Dukes, and twelve Earls; and notwithstanding he had so lately made a solemn Peace with the Duke, and confirm'd it with an Oath, yet he enter'd Normandy in Harvest-time, over-ran and ravag'd all the Country along the Coast to Bessin; from whence he march'd to Bayeux and Caen, designing to pass the River Dive at Verneville, and destroy the Countries of Anges, Lyseux, and Roumois, as far as Rouen. Coming to the River, he found the Causeway leading to it long, and the Bridge narrow; and therefore, that he might get over safely, he sent over his Van-guard first, and to secure his Rear-guard, commanded by the Duke of Berry, he himself stays behind at Caen, till his People and their Carriages were pass'd over. Duke William all this while was employ'd in fortifying and victualling his Towns, and particularly of Palaise, where he himself intended to reside. He had no Army in the Field, but a Running Camp, which he kept ready to take all Advantages. He was sensible of the Calamities of his People by the French, but had not Strength to oppose them, till he had some advantageous Offer, which he was resolv'd not to neglect. And long it was not before he had one: Being inform'd of the Passage of the French Army over the Bridge on the Dive, wherefore marching all Night with ten thousand Men, in the Morning early he set upon the Rear-guard with so sudden a cry and fury, that they who were on the Causeway hearing the Noise behind, thrust their Fellows forward to get over the Bridge, with so great a crowd and noise, that they broke it, and many were drowned in the River. They who were gotten over could not return to help the rest; nor the King, by reason of the Marshes on both sides, yield any Succours to his People, but was forced with Grief to behold the miserable Slaughter and Captivity of his People; among whom six Earls were taken, of which the banish'd Earl of Eu was one, who having gotten into the King's Favour, was created by him Count de Soissons. This ill success stuck so close to the French King's Heart, that he dy'd not long after with Grief, which render'd Duke William so formidable, that tho' many had Will, yet none had Courage to disturb his Peace for a long time after; which brought great Prosperity to Normandy.

The King of France raises another Army against Duke William.

Duke.

Duke William's Affairs in Peace.

Duke William enjoying Peace was not less active than he was in War, tho' in Works of a better nature: For now he employ'd his time in ordering his State and Government, and adorning his Country with sumptuous and beautiful Buildings, erecting Churches and Monasteries, and endowing them with large Estates. He had before built two Monasteries at Caen, and now in these peaceable times he gather'd Reliques from all parts to furnish them with, and built himself and Wife a Tomb in them. He also frequently feasted his Nobility, and those of them that he observed to be Men of Worth, and able to serve the State well, he prefer'd and rewarded; by which means he gained the Love and Affections of his Nobility, and People so generally, that they were all entirely his, and ready to do any thing he could command or desire. In this serene part of his Life and Reign he made a Journey into England, to visit his Kinsman, King Edward, who in Consideration of his Preservation and Education in Normandy by Richard the Second (Grandfather to them both) gave him most Noble and Royal Entertainment. At this interview he shewed himself to the English, and without doubt took himself a sharp aspect of the State and Affairs of England: To be sure so much was done by the King, or Harold in his Name, at this meeting, as gave the Duke ground to claim the Kingdom by the Donation of Edward, after his Death: What it was, could not be found out exactly. It is certain, that Harold going into Normandy did make some Promises to the Duke, and confirm'd them with an Oath upon the Evangelists and the sacred Reliques at Roven; and thereupon Adeliza, the Duke's Daughter was affianced or betrothed to him, and Welnot his Brother left as a Pledge for the Performance: Which shews the matter was of great Importance, and perhaps might be concerning the Kingdom; but it was never pretended otherwise to be made over to him but by Will; and therefore these Promises of Harold's are thought only to assure him of his assistance in gaining the Kingdom. But, however this be, it is against the Law and Custom of the Nation to dispose of the Kingly Power by Will; and therefore, if any such thing were, it was of no Validity. For the Crown of England is held not by a Paternal Right, but by the Law of the Realm, which allows no power of disposing the Throne to its Kings, but admits the next lineal Heir to the Possession of it: For every Successor is not said properly to be Heir of the King, but of the Kingdom, which makes him so, and can't be depriv'd by any Act of his Predecessor. Nor indeed did William afterward establish his Right upon King Edward's Will, but set up that Pretence only to make way for his Arms, by which he intended to compass his desires. As soon therefore as he heard of the Death of King Edward, and that Harold was chosen and crowned King, "he call'd together the States of Normandy, and acquaints them with the Right he had to the Crown of England; and solicited them to contribute their utmost assistance for the recovery of it, and the deposition of Harold, the perjur'd Usurper of it. And to encourage them in the Attempt, he represented to them how great probability there was of success; he had a numerous Party in the Nation for him already; the People were under great Distractions and Divisions, which made them weak and easie to be overcome, as he was inform'd by sure Intelligence: And what Honour, Wealth, and Greatness would it add to their Nation, to be Masters of such a rich Kingdom as England was, which they had now an opportunity put into their hands to be, if they had but that Wisdom to make use of it. These fair Speeches, tho' very plausible and encouraging, yet induced very few to like the Undertaking; and those only such as had been long Soldiers, and had no Estates to uphold them in Peace, so that they would run any hazard to better their Fortunes: All the rest were of different Opinions; some were for Peace, and thought it sufficient for them to hold and defend their own Country, without running an hazard to conquer others, and these were generally the Richest sort; others were willing to contribute toward the Charge, but yet so sparingly as would little advance his design; others were so tired with Wars, that they were loth to begin the same Troubles afresh. The Duke was a little discouraged at this opposition and faintness among his Subjects, but resolv'd to try another method before he gave it over. Having found several of his Friends very forward in the Enterprize, and seemingly willing to venture all with him, he begins with them, and asks them what they would contribute towards this Expedition? William Fitz-Auber made the first offer, promising him to furnish out forty Ships with Men and Ammunition, the Bishop of Bayeux forty, the Bishop of Mans thirty; and so several others, according to, or rather beyond their Abilities. By these Persons Examples he drew in the rest of the Bishops and Nobles, with whom he treated about it severally to joyn in the design, and caused all the Sums contributed to be register'd; by which means he at length rais'd such an Emulation among his Subjects, as that they, who a little before would do nothing, grew now ambitious who should do most. Nor was he so prevalent with his own Subjects only, but by his winning Persuasions and large Promises he engaged most of the greatest Princes and Nobles of France to venture not only their Persons but Estates with him, viz. Robert Fitz-Harveys Duke of Orleans, the Earls of Britain, Poitou, Ponthieu, Bologne, Mayne, Never, Hiefms, and Aumal, Seigneur de Tours, and even his mortal Enemy, Martel Earl of Anjou, was as forward as any. The King of France, whose Interest it had been to have crush'd this design, was a Minor, and under the care of Baldwin Earl of Flanders, whose Daughter the Duke had marry'd, and who would not hinder his design, if he could not farther it; yet to blind the young Prince and French Court, he promised to hold England, if he conquer'd it, in dependence upon the French King, as he did Normandy. The Pope, who was Alexander the II<sup>d</sup> at that time, he brought to applaud his Enterprize, by promising him to hold it of Duke William's Preparations for the Crown of England.

Duke William visits Edward King of England his Cousin.

The Rights of the Kings of England to their Crown.

The King of France and Pope encourage him.

* King Edward and William were Kinsmen, but not in the degree which Mr. Daniel writes: For Emma, the Mother of King Edward, was not the Daughter of Richard the Duke of Normandy, but the Sister; and so Richard the Second was not his Grandfather, but Uncle, which our Author expressly mentions in the Life of Canutus.

Some relate, that Edward, while he lived in Banishment in Normandy, made William a Promise of the next Reversion of the Crown of England; others think he did it at this Visit, being not likely to have Issue, and adopted him for his Heir. This William declared himself, as he march'd through Wallingford to London, That the Bounteous King Edward had by Adoption made him Heir to the Crown of England, and now God had by his Providence given it him. But in his Dying Speech he says, That the Royal Diadem, which none of his Predecessors wore, he got not by Right of Inheritance, but by Heavenly Grace.

Harold, being a Prisoner in Normandy, had promis'd William upon Oath, that he might gain his Liberty, to secure him the Kingdom of England, if Edward dy'd without Heirs; and hereupon was affianced to Duke William's Daughter, which Promise he not performing, was accounted Perjur'd.

That this was a meer Pretence, to procure the Concurrence of the Pope, appears from the Letter he wrote to Gregory the VIIth this Pope's Successor; wherein he disowns, that he had ever any such Intention to submit his Kingdom to the Pope.

the Apostolick See, if he was successful; whereupon the Pope sent him a Consecrated Banner, a Golden Agnus Dei, and one of St. Peter's Hairs. The Emperor Henry IV. also sent him a considerable Body of Men, under the Command of a German Prince. And thus in eight Months time having collected a very numerous Army, not out of Normandy only, but out of France, Flanders, and Germany, sufficient to proceed in his intended Expedition; he summon'd them to their Rendezvous at St. Valery in Normandy, from whence he transported them into England in 896 Ships, as some write; Providence ordering such a strange Concurrence of Dispositions to effect the wonderful Change it had decreed to be now made in England.

A. D. 1066. Duke William having had a victorious landing, and conquer'd Harold's Army at Hastings, October 14. 1066. as is before spoken of in the Life of Harold, march'd directly without any opposition to London; where Edwin and Morcar, the Earls of Northumberland and Mercia, (two Brothers of great Honour and Dignity in the Kingdom) had done their utmost to excite the People to stand up in defence of their Liberties, and make Edgar Atheling, the next of the Royal Issue, who had Right to the Crown, King, to preserve the Kingdom from Servitude and Conquest. Many of the Nobility had consented to this Proposition; but the Bishops being averse to it, and wavering, because they had heard a good Character of the Duke's Piety and Bounty to the Church, and so doubted not of his Favour to their Function, so dishearten'd the Nobility, and damped their Resolutions, fearing lest their backwardness should make them fare the worse, if through their Divisions the Duke should at last subdue them, that they also yielded to Necessity, and gave over all thoughts of Opposition; by which means the Commons being destitute of an Head, could not move but irregularly: So that all degrees of Men being either corrupted with Hopes, or transported with Fear, their poor Country was left naked to the Will of a Stranger. Wherefore at his approach to London the Gates were set open, and the Archbishop Stigand, with the Bishops his Brethren, the Nobility, Magistrates and People, joyfully received him with all outward Demonstrations of Subjection, and Promises of Obedience: He at the same time returning all Assurances of a mild and good Government over them, and protesting that he would rule with Justice and Equity. On Christmass Day next following he was crowned King of England at Westminster, by Aldred Archbishop of York, because Stigand was not thought<sup>a</sup> Canonically invested in his See, altho' he was a great Promoter of this Alteration. At his Coronation, according to Custom, the Bishops and Barons of the Realm took their Oaths of Allegiance to him, obliging themselves to be his true and loyal Subjects; and after, he also (being required to do it by the Archbishop of York) swore solemnly, standing before the Altar of St. Peter, That he would govern all his People in his Dominion with Justice; That he would enact just Laws, and see that they be duly executed. Nor did he ever violate this his Oath by any arbitrary Actions, as an Absolute Conqueror, but as a Regular Prince, conformed to the ancient A. D. Orders of the Realm, and was content to derive 1066. his Title to the Kingdom rather from King Edward's Will (tho' a weak and fictitious one) than from his Sword. And tho' he was in after-times stiled the Conqueror, yet it was rather done thro' flattery, than by his own desire, as was evident from the whole course of his Government; for he introduced none of the Alterations, which followed after, by violence, but mildly and gently, by way of Reformation, as tho' the Changes arose from Necessity, not his own Will or Design; and he would abolish or innovate nothing that might be preserved with advantage to his People.

In the Spring after his Coronation and Settlement, he found it necessary for him to go into 1067. Normandy, to settle Affairs there, and put the Government of that Country into such a frame, as might not require his Presence, or take him off from the management of his Kingdom of England, which would require all his Care. And for the better security of the Peace and Order of his new-gotten Kingdom, which he had reason to believe would not hold steady in their Subjection long, he took Hostages of the English for their Obedience, committed the Government of the Kingdom to his most trusty Friends, Odo his Brother Bishop of Bayeux, and his Cousin Fitz-Auber, whom he had lately created Earl of Hereford, and took with him into Normandy all the chief Men of England, who were the most likely to head any Revolt, viz. Edgar Atheling, Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury, the two great Earls Edwin and Morcar, with many other Bishops and Noblemen. And to lighten his Charge, and empty his Court, he took along with him all the French Princes who had been Partners with him in the Adventure, and others of the Normans, who were grown now unnecessary to him, rewarding them for their Labour and Assistance, as far as his Treasure would reach, and made up the rest with fair Promises. During his absence all that Summer, nothing was attempted against the Government, only Edric, surnamed the Forrester, having obtained the help of the Welsh Kings, plunder'd and spoil'd the remote parts of the County of Hereford. All the other parts of the Kingdom were quiet; hoping, that since by their change of Governours they had found little or no alteration in their ancient Constitutions, their Laws and Liberties remaining the same as they were before, this Change would prove rather for the Advantage than Inconvenience of England, by the addition of a new Province, and enlarging its Dominions beyond the Seas, especially since the Normans were but a small People, and liv'd in a plentiful and fruitful Country, large enough for themselves; so that England was not, in all probability, likely much to be pester'd with them.

Having settled Affairs in Normandy, he return'd 1067. again into England towards Winter, where he met with a harder task to compose things well, than what he had finished. The Normans and others who had assisted him in the hazardous adventure of getting the English Crown, were very big with Expectations of Rewards and Preferments, which he knew must be satisfy'd in some measure; and <sup>a</sup> Yet Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, is said by Brompton to have refus'd to Crown him, because he had no Title; and Frederick the Stout Abbot of St. Albans, a Saxon of the Royal Blood, fortify'd his Abby with Trees to resist him, as though he would have fought against so great a Conqueror alone, saying, That if others had done their duty, the Duke of Normandy had not been here.

<sup>b</sup> Stigand had obtain'd the Arch-bishoprick through Simony, and held it with the Bishoprick of Winchester, contrary to the Canons: For which, as Simeon of Durham and Florence of Worcester affirm, he then lay under the Pope's Displeasure; and by the Pope's Legates, with the King's consent, he was soon after deposed.

<sup>c</sup> Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, and Earl of Kent, by his severe Government, forced the English to rebel, and to invite over Eustace Earl of Bologne to assist them. Eustace prov'd unsuccessful, and Edric the Forrester rose against the Normans in Wales; but on the King's Return the Welsh submitted.

A. D. 1067. yet he thought it would very prejudicial to him to wrong his new Subjects (whom he desired to keep as easie as he could) to do it; for it was impossible for him to defend what he had got without them. This was a greater trouble to him than his Battel of Hastings, knowing what he gave the Normans must be either with the loss of the English Estates or Preferments. Wherefore he took this prudent method to satisfy all Parties: He resolv'd to put no Man out of their Places, nor deprive any Man of his Estate, unless any had forfeited them by revolting from their Obedience; which he made good, as appears by the Controversie between one Warren a Norman, and Sherburn of Sherburn-Castle in Norfolk; whose Castle the King had given to Warren, upon an Accusation of Treason brought against Sherburn: Yet when Sherburn made it evident to the King, That he never bore Arms against him; and pleaded, That he was his Subject as well as Warren, and held his Lands by that Law which he had established among all his Subjects; The King gave his Judgment against Warren, and order'd, that Sherburn should peaceably enjoy his Lands: So that he contented himself with what Vacancies had happen'd, either by the Death of such as were kill'd in the Battel, or by the Flight of such as had left the Kingdom in discontent, or were with the Sons of Harold. These Men's Estates and Places he dispos'd to the Normans. And as for such Gentlemen as he design'd to prefer, but had no opportunity at present to do it, he settled them in the Abbies till he could provide for them; whereby he not only lessen'd his Charge at Court, and remov'd the Grievance of the People by a multitude of greedy Expectants; but he had a Guard upon the Clergy, who being of great Interest with the People, were most likely to create Disturbances.

The Nobility of England discontented.

But the English Nobility could not be contented with a bare Possession of their Estates and Honours, so long as they found so great an Eclipse of the Royal Favour towards them, by the Imposition of Norman Favourites, who growing more numerous every day, they concluded would in time turn them out of all. These Surmises and Fears produced a Conspiracy among them to fly, some into Scotland, others into Denmark, to try whether by the assistance of those Princes they could recover their lost Fortunes at home, and resettle themselves in their ancient Greatness; of these the chief was Edgar Atbeling (call'd England's Darling, for the Love the People had generally for him) who with his Mother Agatha, and two Sisters, Margaret and Christiana, intending to retire into Hungary, their Native Country, were driven by contrary Winds into Scotland, where he was kindly received by Malcolm, then King of the Scots, partly because Malcolm had formerly known the Miseries of an Exile Condition, (in which he had been kindly entertain'd in the English Court) and partly because he fear'd the Power of the Conqueror of England might be dangerous to him: Whereupon he enter'd into a League with Edgar for the publick Safety, and marry'd his Sister Margaret<sup>a</sup>, by which the Blood of the Saxon Kings was preserved, and at length united in the Norman Line in Henry II. and so became again English. To Edgar, now being in Scotland, came the Earls Edwin and Mercar, Hereward, Gospatrick, Siward, with several others<sup>b</sup>; and shortly after Stigand and Aldred Arch-bishops, with many of the Clergy. These Malecontents having gather'd an Army by the help of Malcolm enter'd those parts of England which lie on the North of Humber in the third Year of this King's Reign, and made a strong Essay towards the Recovery of their lost Country; but not being done before the Government was settled, they were so far from doing any good by their weak attempts, that they really gave him but a better occasion to settle himself firmly, and become at last, what at first he really was not, a Conqueror of England. For while all the Southern parts remain'd in peace under him, and he was in possession of their Estates, which he immediately dispos'd to the Normans, they did but force their Brethren to become their Enemies, and enable the Normans to ruine them. For the Earldom and Estate of Edwin in Yorkshire was given to Alain Earl of Britain, Kinsman to the Conqueror, the Archbishoprick of Canterbury was conferr'd on Lanfranc Abbot of Caen, and that of York on Thomas his Chaplain; and all the rest, both of the Clergy and others, which were out of the Nation, had their Places in it supplied by the Normans.

Many Insurrections happen'd about this time. Two<sup>c</sup> of Harold's Sons landing with Forces in the West<sup>d</sup>, made great havock among the People; and Githa, King Harold's Mother, being at Exeter, caused that City to rebel. At Oxford also there was a Commotion, but they were not able to stand long against the King's Power. The most prosperous and successful Invasion was by Edgar Atbeling with his Lords out of Scotland, who enter'd England with a good Army, and encountering Robert Earl of Mortaigne, who was sent by the King to oppose their progress into the Nation, slew him with seven hundred Men at Tork. The King hearing of this defeat, took his Journey Northward with all expedition; but before he could arrive there, the Invaders had received a large addition to their Army from Swain King of Denmark, who had sent three hundred Ships to their assistance, under the Command of Harold and Canutus his two Sons; William first sets upon the Danes, and either by force, or corrupting their Commanders, made them useless; afterwards he fell upon the Lords Army, much weaken'd by the loss of their Confederates, and puts them to flight; and that the Country might not for the future harbour his Enemies, he laid it waste all along between Tork and Durham, which are distant about sixty Miles. And the same methods he us'd on all the Coasts, where any fit places for Invaders to land were, and then return'd to London. After this Victory most of the Lords came in, and submitted themselves to the King upon the publick Faith before given them, and were conducted by <sup>e</sup> Fredericke, Abbot of St. Albans, to <sup>g</sup> In this furious Devastation, the King shew'd such a respect to John of Beverley, that all his Lands were spar'd: The rest of the Country was so wasted, that the People were forc'd to eat Cats and Dogs to support Life.

<sup>h</sup> Fredericke himself was a leading Man in this Revolt, having had all the Lands between Barnet and London-stone, which belonged to his Abby, seiz'd by the King; but it seems after this Victory he came in with the first, and was made use of to bring others to the King's Favour.

Barkamsted, where having retaken the Oath of Allegiance they were pardoned by the King, and promised a Restitution of his Favour; and the King himself to pacify their unquiet Minds, took his Personal Oath again before Arch-bishop Laufanc and the Lords; That he would observe the ancient Laws of the Realm established by his Royal Predecessors, the Kings of England, and especially those of Edward the Confessor. By which means these turbulent Dispositions were calmed for a while, but did not long continue so: For whether out of some new Hopes given them by Prince

A. D. 1071. Edgar (who was still in Scotland) or grown desperate at the Non-performance of the King's Promise and Breach of Oath, or some other Reasons, they brake out again. Earl Edwin going toward Scotland, was murdered by his own Men. The Lords Morcar and Hereward, got into the Isle of Ely, intending to fortify it for their Winter Quarters; and to them Earl Syward, and the Bishop of Durham out of Scotland, joyned them: But the King, who never gave time in growing Dangers, immediately beset the Isle; and having made a Bridge two Miles long to carry his Army over, surprized them so soon, that they all yielded themselves to the King's Mercy, except Hereward, who marching with his People desperately through the Fens, escaped and got into Scotland. The rest were sent into several Prisons, where they died, or remained Prisoners during the King's Life. The Lords, who persisted Loyal upon this last Submission, were received into Favour, and had honourable Employments bestowed on them. Edric the Forester (who first rebelled in his Reign) was admitted into the greatest Trust about the King's Person. Gospatric he made Earl of Northumbreland, and sent him General of his Army against the King of Scots, who plunder'd and had subdu'd Tisdale, Cleveland, and Cumberland. Waltheof, Son of Earl Syward, was so highly esteemed by him, as that he married him to his Neice Judith; tho' in the Northern Commotion he had been a Principal Actor, and in defending the City of Tork had cut off the Head of several Normans as they enter'd in at the Breach, to the Admiration of all. So great a Friend was he to Virtue, even in an Enemy.

King William went against Scotland. A. D. 1072.

Things being thus a little compos'd at home, the King observing that Scotland had been a continual Retreat for his Enemies, and in many of the Disturbances he had in his Realm, afforded the Malecontents Assistance; and that Edgar Atheling resided in that Court to observe all Advantages to dispossess him of his Throne, he en-ter'd that Kingdom with a powerful Army, resolving either to rid himself of those his Enemies, or lose his Life. Malcolm seeing the Danger he was in, and the Miseries his Subjects were likely to endure in other Mens Quarrels, for which he was not like to receive any Satisfaction, made Overtures of Peace, which King William was willing to accept, having met with such Difficulties in passing the Marthes, as made his farther Enterprizes very discouraging. Wherefore entering into Articles with Malcolm, That he should enjoy the same Dominions, and in the same Bounds as formerly, that all Delinquents on both sides should be pardoned, they returned home.

Shortly after this Peace so lately made, Prince A. D. 1073. Edgar (whose long abode in the Scottish Court had made it become English almost; for by reason of the great resort of the English thither, who were prefer'd there and intermarried with the Nobles of that Nation, the Language and Customs of England became much in Fashion: And here 'tis said the Titles of Duke, Earl, Baron, and Knight, were first began) came voluntarily in, and submitted himself to the King, who was then in Normandy, and was restored to his Grace and Favour; inasmuch, that he allowed him an Estate suitable to his Greatness, which Edgar was so grateful, as to recompense with a peaceable Behaviour ever after. This Submission, tho' fortunate enough for the King, was thought very unseasonable and foolish in Edgar: For in the Absence of the King, Roger Fitz-Auber the young Earl of Hereford, contrary to the King's Command, married his Sister to Ralph Waber, Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk; and at the solemnizing of it, the two Earls conspired with Eustace Earl of Bologne (who privately came over to the Nuptials) Earl Waltheof, and other English Lords, to call in the Danes, and by Force keep out the King from his Kingdom. This Conspiracy was the more like to have taken effect, because the King did not suspect any such Treachery; especially from those whom he had so greatly advanced. But Odo's watchful Eye, which observed every Motion of the English, as became his Place of the King's Vicegerent, soon spy'd the Design; and by the help of the Bishop of Worcester, and others, kept so strict a Guard upon them, that they could never unite to perfect it, but perceiving themselves discover'd, were forced to fly. Roger Fitz-Auber was taken, and some say executed, and so was Earl Waltheof; though 'twas thought, he was the principal means of the Discovery: But such was * Roger Hoveden says, the English Nobility petition'd to be govern'd by their own Laws, beseeching him by the Soul of King Edward, who bequeath'd him the Kingdom, and whose Laws they were, to grant their Petition; to which he consented, by the Advice of his Barons. He chang'd the Laws afterwards, and brought in the Norman; commanding them to be made use of almost through the whole Kingdom. The Danish Laws had prevail'd in the Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge, and he permitted them to be still current there, because they had more relation to his own than those of the Saxons.

b The Monks of Ely invited the Lords into their Isle, that they might be a Guard to their Possessions against the King; but he having conquer'd them, was the more severe to them, and requir'd of them 700 Marks to confirm them to them: Which Sum, when they came to pay it, wanting only a Groat-weight, he made them pay 1000 more. The Abbot of St. Albans fled to the English Lords in the Isle of Ely, and died there Anno 1077.

c The Saxon Annals, and most of our Authentick Historians, place the Reduction of Ely in the Year 1071.

d Malcolm also did the King Homage for some part of his Kingdom.

e Holinhead, from Hen. Huntington, writes Vol. III. p. 10. That 'twas agreed by the Treaty of Aburneth, That King Malcolm should do Homage to King William for the Realm of Scotland.

f Our Historians say, his Allowance was a Pound of Silver a Day, Sir John Hayward calls it twenty Shillings. He made his Submission, as Florence of Worcester and Holinhead after him write, in the Year 1073. and, says the above-mention'd Hayward, having large Livings in the Country, he there mellow'd to Old Age in Pleasure and Vacancy of Affairs. He was after that concern'd in several Wars in Normandy and England, and according to the Saxon Annals, was taken Prisoner at the Battle of Tenchebrai, with Robert Duke of Normandy Eldest Brother to William the Second and Henry the First. William of Malmbury says of him, that he was condemn'd at Court for his Easiness or Simplicity, and remitted his Pension of twenty Shillings a Day for a Horse; about the middle of King Henry the First's Reign, he retir'd from Court, and pass'd his Old Age privately in the Country.

g Sir John Hayward calls him Ralph Fitz-Auber; and says, 'twas the same who furnish'd forty Ships for the King's first Voyage to England: If so, it must be the Father who married the Daughter; and not the Brother, the Sister to the Earl of Norfolk. Florence of Worcester and William of Malmbury call him Roger de Bretevil.

A. D. 1075. the ill Disposition of the Times, that nothing could be thought a fit Remedy for the Disease, but such a desperate Cure*. The suppressing of the Plot at home did not free the King from the Inconveniences of the Confederates Power abroad, who were joyned with them to expel the King, as most of the Neighbouring Princes by their Actions did after shew. For the King of France defended Dole in Britain (a Castle of Ralph Waber's) against the King of England, and employed the Earl of Bologn to encourage the Conspirators. The King of Denmark sent a Navy of two hundred Sail under the Command of his Son Canutus, and others. Drone, King of Ireland, furnished Harold's Sons with sixty five Ships: And Malcolm, and the Kings of Wales, were ready to lend their Assistance had there been occasion. And though they were disappointed, yet it put the State to very great Charge, the King being obliged for his own defence, to maintain (besides his Normans) many Companies of French Soldiers, under the Command of Hugh the French King's Brother.

A. D. 1077. These were all the Wars which King William had within his Kingdom, saving that in the eleventh Year of his Reign he subdued Wales, and made the Kings thereof to do him Homage. The Wars he was engaged in abroad arose from his Son Robert, with whom he was forced to contend for his Dominions in France: For Robert, who was by his Father appointed his Deputy to govern the Dukedom of Normandy and County of Main in his absence, was so much affected with the Glory of a Command, that he assumed to himself the supreme Government of the Province, causing the Barons to do him Homage as Duke and not as Deputy; and enter'd into a League with the King of France, who glad of this Opportunity to disunite a People, grown too great for him, so fed the Ambition of the young Prince, and engaged him upon such Profuseness and Expence, that he was obliged to impose heavy Exactions upon his Subjects to supply his Extravagances; which though they got him the Name of Curtois, yet it raised such Discontents among the Normans, that they preferred their Complaints of his ill Government and violent Exactions to his Father. The King hearing this, hastes with his Forces into Normandy, designing to surprize his Son; but Robert having Intelligence of his coming, and being furnished with two thousand Men by the King of France, lay in ambush in the way through which he was to pass, sets upon him, put his Army to Flight, and in the pursuit happens to encounter with his Father, whom he unhors'd and wounded in the Arm with his Lance, before he knew who he was: But when by his Voice he discover'd 'twas his Father, he made hast to remount him, humbly begging Pardon for his Offence. The King readily granted it, and upon Submission for his Misgovernment, took him to Rouen with him; and having settled him in his Charge again, he returned with his Son William (as soon as they were both cured of their Hurts receiv'd in the Fight) into England.

The King had not been long at home, but fresh Information was brought him, that Robert was fallen into his former Courses, usurping the absolute Government of his Dukedom, and exacting great Taxes of the People; and to justify his Actions pleaded, that his Father had promised him before the King of France, to make him their Duke, when he had conquered England. At which News the King being moved, thought not fit to give his Designs time to ripen, but made all the Preparations he could to return into Normandy. In his Passage, he was driven upon the Coasts of Spain; but at length recovering Burdeaux, and landing with great Preparations, his Son Robert came immediately and submitted the second time. But the King thought it not safe to trust him with the Government of Normandy again for the present, till he had taught him to obey better; and therefore taking him along with him home, employed him in his Wars against Scotland, which began to annoy his Dominions, and then sent him after some time again into Normandy to govern it; but joyning his youngest Son Henry with him in the Charge and Power, and reposing greatest Trust and Confidence in him. These two Princes being a little settled in their Government, went to visit the King of France at Constance, where they tarried some days. On a certain day after Dinner, Lewis the French King's eldest Son, and Prince Henry to recreate themselves, play'd a Game at Chés, and Henry won so much of him, that Lewis in Anger call'd him the Son of a Bastard, and threw the Chés-board in his Face: Henry hereby provok'd, snatch'd up the Chés-board, and struck Lewis with that Force as drew Blood, and had killed him, had not Robert timely interposed between them. This petty Brangle between two hot Youths, not only enraged the People so much against the Norman Princes, that they hardly escaped their Fury by their swift riding; but it kindled a Quarrel between the two Kings, the Fathers, and was a Cause of the first War between the English and French. For presently the King of France, joyning with Robert, who was as impatient of a Partner, as an Head, entered Normandy, and takes the City of Vernon. Whereupon the King of England, with his usual Expedition invades France, and subdues the Countries of Zaintonge and Poitou, and so returned to Rouen. Robert made rebellious, as much or more by Instigation as Inclination, could not stand out against his Father, but goes the third time, and submitting is reconciled to him. This was a great Disappointment and Trouble to the King of France; nevertheless, being ashamed to lay down his Arms dishonourably, he summons King William to do him Homage for his Kingdom of England; but he replied, That he was ready to do it for his Duchy of Normandy, but for England he would not, because he had it of none but God and his Sword. But this would not satisfy the King of France, who sought an Occasion to quarrel, and therefore he invades Normandy again, and the King's other Territories; but with such Loss, as made him willing to conclude a Peace, which proved but short. For the King of England being fallen into a Sickness through Labour, Age, and Corpulency, of which he lay some time at Rouen, the French King being young and lusty, sporting * This Conspiracy so exasperated King William, that ever after he carried himself cruelly towards the English, of whom, says William of Malmshury, he had scarce found any faithful. He adds, from this time England became the Habitation and Dominion of Strangers, and the Foreigners engross'd all Honours and Riches so much, that about seventy Years afterward there was no Original Englishman an Earl, Bishop or Abbot.

His Government in Peace.

Having given an Account of the Wars of this King, together with his Conduct and Succeſs in them, I ſhall ſhew what Courſe he took in ſetting the Kingdom, and eſtabliſhing a Government after he had ſuppreſſed the ſeveral Invaſions and Conſpiracies made againſt him in the North and other Parts of the Realm. It is certain he was ſo fond of the Laws and Cuſtoms of his own Nation, that he began his Reign with them, and would certainly have abolithed all the Engliſh Laws and introduced the Norman, had not the Nobility and Commons looked upon it as a great Grievance; and by Petition beſought him in moſt humble manner, by the Oath he had taken at his Coronation, and by the Soul of S. Edward, from whom he had the Crown and Kingdom, and under whoſe Laws they were born and bred, That he would not make them ſo miſerable, nor be ſo ſevere to them, as to judge them by a Law they underſtood not. This earneſt Addreſs had ſo great an effect upon the King, that he was pleaſed to confirm his former Promiſes by his Charter, and gave Commandment to his Judges, to ſee that the Laws of S. Edward be inviolably obſerved throughout his Kingdom. But notwithſtanding all this Compliance, and a ſeeming Confirmation of the old Laws, which was alſo after done by the Charters of Henry I. and II. and King John; yet there followed ſo great an Innovation in the Laws and Government of England, that the People really had nothing of them but fair Promiſes. For the Body of the Common Law, with the whole Practice of it, came out of Normandy, notwithſtanding all Objections that can be made to the contrary. And whereas before the Conqueſt, the Laws by which the Engliſh were govern'd were written in their own Tongue, and ſo eaſie to be underſtood by all; now they were tranſlated into Latin and French, and practis'd wholly in the Norman Form and Language, on purpoſe to make the People to learn that Speech for their defence, which otherwiſe they would not do. And tho' indeed the King labour'd all he could by other means, as well as that, to make the Nation uſe the French Language, viz. enjoin- ing Children to be train'd up in no other Language, Grammars in Schools to be made in French, all Petitions and Buſineſs at Court in French, no Man regarded but he that ſpoke French; yet ſoon after his Death the whole Nation return'd to their old Engliſh, and nothing remain'd of French but in the Law, which is at this day the only remaining Badge of the Norman Conqueſt. New Terms, new Conſtitutions, new Forms of Pleading, new Offices and Courts were introduced by the Normans; a People of more impatient and litigious Spirits than the Engliſh, who being much engag'd in War, judg'd it much better to ſpend their Peace in Devotion and good Fellowship, than by intricate and tedious Forms of Law make Peace it ſelf a Trouble, and a Con-

troverſie about Property, as pernicious as the bloodieſt Battels. For the Laws of the Engliſh before this were plain, brief and ſimple, without Intricacies and Perplexities; commanding, not diſputing; deciding, not confounding: Their Grants ſhort, but full, ſhewing them a clear meaning People, and of honeſt and good Intentions. As for their Tryals in Caſes Criminal, where manifeſt Proof fail'd, they continu'd their ancient Cuſtom uſed among them before their Converſion, to decide them by their Ordeal, i. e. a Right Doom, (for Or ſignifies Right, and deal a part or portion) "Of this ſort of Judgment they had two kinds; Ordeal by Fire for the better ſort of People, and Ordeal by Water for the meaner ſort: That of Fire was to go Blindfold over certain Plowſhares, made red hot, and laid at uneven diſtances one from another; that of Water was either hot or cold, in the one to put their naked Arms to the Elbow, and into the other to be caſt headlong: According to their eſcape or hurt they were judg'd; ſuch as were caſt into Rivers, if they ſunk, they were judg'd Innocent; if not, Guilty, as ejected by the Element. Theſe Tryals they call'd the Judgment of God, and they were perform'd with ſolemn Prayers. In ſome Caſes the Perſon accused was admitted to clear himſelf by receiving the Eucharift, by his own Oath, or the Oaths of two or three credible Men; but this was allow'd only to Perſons of Note and Ability. The uſual Opinion among them being this: That Men of Ability had a greater regard of Honeſty. Beſides theſe, they had a Tryal of a Camp-fight, or Duel, (which the Lombards, a German Nation, introduced alſo into Italy) permitted by the Law in caſes of Safety, Fame or Poſſeſſions. All theſe Tryals ſhew the Engliſh to be ignorant of any Forms of Law, and to have no Imperial or Pontifical Conſtitutions to determine Affairs by. But theſe ſorts of Judgments and Tryals had their period ſoon after the Conqueſt. Thoſe of Fire and Water were at firſt diſuſed, and at laſt abrogated by the Pope, as a Pagan Invention, and an Impious Law; that of Combat out-liv'd the other, but very rarely ſuffer'd to be uſed. All Actions, both Criminal and Real, began to be wholly determin'd by the Verdict of twelve Men, according to the Cuſtom of Normandy, call'd an Enqueſt, where the ſame Cuſtom is uſed with the ſame Cautions to the Jurors, as among us at this day. Some indeed hold, that this manner of Tryal was in uſe in this Kingdom long before; and to prove their Opinion, alledge a Law of King Ethelred's, Father of the Confefſor, wherein he requires his Subjects in their Gemotes or Conventions, monthly held in every Hundred, that twelve grave Men of free Condition, ſhould, with the Greve, or chief Officer among them, ſwear upon the Evangelifts to judge every Man's Cauſe aright. But theſe Men were to be Aſſeſſors with the Judge, and no Jurors, as the manner of the Normans was. And indeed had there been any ſuch Form, we ſhould have heard of it more in their Laws and Practice.

But whatever Alterations he made in other Matters, yet in thoſe Laws which had been made by the Saxons for the preſervation of the Peace, and for the good Order and Security of the Kingdom (which are of the greateſt importance to Kings) he made no change, becauſe he found ſuch excellent Conſtitutions made by the wary Care of former Kings, that he had none ſo good, and better could hardly be invented by Man, eſpecially the Burrough-Law, whereby every Freeman of the Commonalty was ſurety for the Behaviour of

A. D. 1087. Reg. 21. each other, after this manner: The whole Kingdom was divided into Shires or Shares, and every Shire subdivided into Hundreds, every Hundred consisting of a considerable number of Burroughs, Villages or Tithings, each containing ten Householders; of which, if any one committed any unlawful Actions, the other nine were to attach him, and bring him to punishment; if he fled, he was enjoyn'd to appear within thirty one days; if in the mean time he were apprehended, he was to restore what he had taken away; otherwise the Head-Burrough or Tithing-Man was to take with him two of the same Village, and as many of the three next Villages adjoining, (viz. the Tithing-Man, or Head, and two other principal Men) and before the Officers of their Hundred clear himself and the Village of the Fact, making good the Damage done by the Goods of the Malefactor; and if they were not sufficient, the Burrough or Tithing must make up the rest; and besides take an Oath, that they have not been accessory to the Fact, and to bring the Offender to Justice, if they knew where he was, or could get him. Besides, every Master of a Family was to be surety for all his Family; and if any Servant was call'd in question, his Master was to make him answer it in the Hundred where he was accused; if he fled, the Master was to deliver up what Goods were left in his Custody to the King: If he himself were accused of aiding his Servant, or to be privy to his flight, he was to clear himself by five Men, otherwise to forfeit all his Goods to the King, and his Man to be out-law'd. By these Tyes was the State so firmly joyn'd together, and the Order and Peace of the Kingdom so well secur'd, that no Society of Men in the World liv'd in greater Order and Peace. For after this Establishment, not only all Thefts and robberies, which were common before, were wholly suppress'd, but we never read of any popular Insurrections; which doubtless was a great cause that the Normans had so speedy a Settlement in England, more than the Romans or Saxons. By these Laws there was such a strict Guard put upon every Man's Behaviour, that no Man dare be guilty of any Treasonable or Criminal Action, and so they could not make any considerable Resistance against the Invader: Otherwise, 'tis probable, the Conquest of England had cost the Normans as dear as it did the Romans, Saxons, or Danes. But King William executing the English Laws severely, and withal depriving the Commonalty of all Weapons of War, forbidding all Night-meetings under grievous Penalties; enjoyn'g every Man at eight of the Clock in the Evening to put out his Fire, and go to his rest; raising divers Fortifications in several parts of the Kingdom to suppress all Commotions, and putting such Persons into all Places of Command and Judicature as he knew faithful to his Interests, made his Kingdom such as he would have it.

Alterations made by King William in the English Government. As to the Judicial part of Government, he new modell'd it; and whereas the Bishop and Aldermen were absolute Judges in every Shire, and the Bishop in many Cases had a share of the Fines impos'd for the King, the King stripp'd the Bishops wholly of their Judicial Power, and confin'd them within their Province to their own

Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction and Care of Souls. The Aldermen's Right he took quite away; and where- as all Causes were to be determin'd before in their Reg. 21. Gemotes, or monthly Conventions in every Hundred, he order'd, That four times in the Year on certain Days all Business should be determin'd in such Places as he should appoint, by Judges constituted by him for that purpose, from whom, as from the Bosom of their Prince, all Persons should have Justice. What difference of Tenures he made in Men's Estates, is visible from the knowledge of the old English Customs. The Saxons had only two kinds of Tenures, Boke-Land and Folk-Land; the one a Possession by Writing, the other without: That by Writing was as Freehold, and by Charter, Hereditary with all Immunities, and this was chiefly for the Nobler sort; that without Writing was to hold at the Will of the Lord, oblig'd to pay certain Rents and Services, and this was for the common People. Inheritances descended not to one Heir, but after the German fashion, was equally divided among all the Children, which they call'd Land-skiften, i. e. Part-Land; a Custom still retain'd in some part of Kent, by the Name of Gavelkin, or Gif-eal kin, which it is said the People of that County gain'd from the Conqueror by this Stratagem. As means. The King was passing through their Country to Dover, the People (by the advice of Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury, and Abbot Egel'sin<sup>d</sup>, who told them they would lose all their ancient Laws and Liberties, and be involv'd in perpetual Slavery by the Conqueror) encompass'd him on all sides with Boughs in their Hands, to the great surprize as well as fear of the King, who expected no such hostile Attempts. Out of the midst of them came Stigand and Egel'sin, and presenting themselves before the King, told him, That the Multitude surrounding him was the whole People of the Country gather'd together with Boughs in their Hands, as Olive-Branches, to procure Peace and Liberty, or else to entangle him in his Passage; resolving to lose their Lives, rather than their Freedom, which if he would secure to them they would submit as good Subjects. The Conqueror seeing his Danger granted their Desires, and promised them the continuance of their Customs and Liberties; which, if at first permitted, are now not better secured than to the rest of the Kingdom. Those Tenants, which were at the Will of their Lords, he multiplied, and made their Case more miserable than before, till by their clamorous Petitions he was forced to relieve them. Their Case was this: All Persons that were engag'd in any Rebellion, and were pardon'd with the enjoyment of Life, yet having their Estates taken from them, became Vassals unto those Lords to whom their Estates were given; and if by their labour they attain'd any Portion of Ground, they held it only so long as it pleas'd their Lords, who often took it from them by Violence, and contrary to all Right. This the King redress'd; and commanded, that whatsoever such Persons had attain'd to by their Labours, or gotten of their Lords by their good Services, or agreed for by any lawful Compact, they should hold inviolably during their whole Lives.

This King having thus settled Laws for the Government of his People, his next Care was <sup>a</sup> And for this end he caus'd in every City, Town and Village, a Bell to be rung at that Hour, which was call'd by the French, Coure-feu; and after by Abbreviation by the English, the Curfew-Bell; in Latin, Ignitegium.

<sup>c</sup> He assign'd the Bishops a separate Jurisdiction, to try all Causes relating to Religion by the Canon-Law in Courts proper to themselves. The Grant is in Mr. Fox's Acts and Mon. p. 154. and in Mr. Selden's Notes on Eadmer. It was not a new Jurisdiction, but a separate manner, for the Exercise of it.

A. D. 1087. for himself, to raise a sufficient Revenue for the Maintenance of his Crown and Dignity, which he judged could not well be done, but by an exact Knowledge of his Estate, and a general Survey of the Kingdom. King Alfred had given him a Precedent, but his Survey recorded in the Doom-book at Winchester was defective and imperfect; wherefore he having gotten a sufficient number of very skilful Men, and furnished them with a large Commission, sent them out into the Kingdom to take a particular Account of his own Possessions, and every Man's Estate else in the Kingdom, the Nature and Quality of their Lands, their Estates and Abilities, with the Descriptions, Bounds and Divisions of all the Shires and Hundreds; and this was drawn up into one Book, and brought into his Treasury, then newly called the Exchequer (as the supreme Court of Normandy was) whereas before it was termed Talée, and had the Name of Dome-book* (Liber Judiciarius) given it, a Record ready upon all Occasions for Taxes, or other Uses. All the Forests and Chases of the Kingdom he seized into his own hands, and exempted them from all Laws, but his own Pleasure; making them Retreats for Kings, to recreate himself in, and his Successors, and inflicting most severe Punishments upon any that should presume to destroy his Game: And that his Command might be the greater, he increased the Number of them in all Parts, and on the South-Coasts dispeopled the Country for thirty Miles together, and of old Habitations and ancient Estates; to the great damage of his People, made a New Forest, as it is called to this Day; an Act which got him much Hatred among his People, yet used by his Successors (who chose to imitate his Tyranny rather than his Virtues) till it was remedied by the Charter of Forests, granted by Henry the Third. Soon after the general Survey of the Kingdom, he levied a Tax of 6 s. upon every Hide of Land throughout the Nation; and after some times exacted the old Tax, commonly called Dane-gelt, which was an Imposition of two Shillings upon every Hide or Plough-land, raised at first to bribe the Danes, and after continued for the ordinary Supply of the King's Occasions in War or Peace. He imposed also upon some of his Subjects a Tax then first called Escuage, which was a Sum of Money taken for every Knight's Fee for Stipends and Donatives for Soldiers. But all these Taxes he levied but seldom; knowing, that Subjects never heartily love, however they may fear those Princes which are burthensome and chargeable to them. He had no Revenues by Fines and pecuniary Mulcts, unless such as arose by the Breach of his Forest Laws and for Murther, which he laid upon the People upon this Occasion. In the beginning of his Reign, the Hatred and Malice of the English towards the Normans was such, that if they found them alone in Woods or any remote Places they murdered them; and notwithstanding all the severe Courses the King could use, the Malefactors could not be discovered. Whereupon the King ordered, That the Hundred where any Norman was found dead, and the Murtherer not discover'd, should pay to the King 28 or 30 l. according to the Extent of it, that by this general Punishment he might deter particular Men, or hasten the Discovery of the guilty, by whom so many must suffer Damage. The Revenues which were paid by the Tenants of the Crown for the Provision of the King's Household, not in Money, but some in Wheat, Malt, Beefs; others in Mutton, Hay, and Oats, &c. was duly and exactly taken according to the Quality and Quantity of every Man's Lands throughout the whole Kingdom. Other Incomes than these there was none belonging to the Crown but what was raised by extraordinary Fines, and of those Cities and Castles where Husbandry was not used.

From the Church he gat considerable Sums, but by Extortion rather than Justice, the Kingly Power never before extending so far, and therefore no Law or Precedent enabling him to do it. And the first thing he did in that kind was, he seized the Plate, Jewels and Treasure of all the Monasteries of England, pretending that the Rebels and their Assistants had conveyed their Riches into them as privileged Places, to defraud him of them. He made all the Bishopricks, and Monasteries also, that held Baronies (which before had been exempted from all secular Services) to contribute to his Wars, and other Necessities of State, which may be the Reason that in all the Histories of those Times, which were written by Church-men interested in them, he bears the Name of an Oppressor and cruel Exactor, with other Marks of Infamy; tho' if things were rightly weighed, the Nature and Necessity of his Affairs may be an Advocate for him, and in many things excuse him. He was indeed an excellent Prince, but the Name of Conqueror blasted the Appearance of all his Perfections; and though he had the Advantage of a long Reign, to blot out the Severities of his Entrance to the Crown out of Mens Memories, yet he could never gain the Affections of his People so heartily to him as his Sons did, who were much inferiour to him in real Worth.

How he was furnished with Ministers of State for the Management of the important Affairs of his Reign, though Time hath deprived us of a very exact Knowledge; yet 'tis not to be doubted, but that being a Man of good Judgment himself, he had able Persons employed under him: For weak Princes make bad Choices usually, but understanding Kings are always stored with able Ministers. The principal Persons entrusted by him were Cdo Bishop of Bayeux and Earl of Kent, Lanfranc Archbishop of Canterbury, and William Fitz-Auber Earl of Hereford. Odo was his Vicegerent in his absence, and had the management of his Treasury. He was a Man of great Reach, and of an active Spirit; high indeed in the Favour of his Prince, and by his Place; but yet very ambitious, and aiming at greater things: For having gather'd a vast Treasure of Money by his Avarice, and so profitable an Office, he design'd to buy either the Popedom, or the Kingdom of England, after the Death of the King his Brother. The Popedom came first in his way, and to it he had strew'd his Path with Gold at Rome; but when * There are several different Opinions why it was call'd Doomsday-Book; its first Name was the Rolls of Winton, because it was kept in the City of Winchester, and afterwards Doomsday-Book, i. e. Liber Judiciarius, or The Book of Judgment. The Author of the Black Book in the Exchequer supposes, That the Name of Doomsday was first given to this Book, because 'twas no more lawful to depart from what is in it, than from the Day of Doom; but Sir John Hayward thinks 'twas so call'd from Domus Dei, a Place in the Cathedral of Winchester, in which this Roll was kept.

b This Fact, which was done merely to promote his Pleasure, was look'd upon by the Nation as one of the most intolerable and inexcusable pieces of Cruelty, that not only he himself, but ever any Prince did; for he destroyed thirty six Parish-Churches, with the Houses and Possessions of so many Townships, to make them Habitations for wild Beasts.

c Knights Fee was Lands given by a Prince to such as had well deserved of him in his Wars. These Donations were first used by the Romans, who at first gave them only for Term of Life, and after to them and their Heirs, and from the Romans they came in use in France and Britain. See Sir Henry Spelman's Remains publish'd by Dr. Gibson.

A. D. 1087. he was going, as he imagin'd, to take Possession of it, the King stopp'd his Journey, and taking him from the midst of a great Confluence of Noblemen and Gentry, who were to attend him thither, imprison'd him; excusing the Action to the Churchmen, by telling them, that he imprison'd him not as Bishop of Bayeux, but as Earl of Kent, an Officer accountable to him; but soon after released him, because being on his Death-Bed he would leave his Kingdom at Peace to his Son. But the Bishop disappointed his Intention, and became the Instrument of many Dissentions among his Children, partly in Revenge for what he had suffer'd from their Father, and partly out of Envy to Lanfranc, whose Counsel in his greatest Affairs the King chiefly us'd; and therefore meerly to oppose him he took the contrary courses to him, and sided with Duke Robert his Nephew; with whom (after having pass'd many Changes of Fortune with him) he went to the Holy War, and dy'd at the Siege of Antioch. Lanfranc was a Man of as universal Goodness as Learning, born in Lombardy, but brought hither by a kind Providence to do England good; for tho' his Preferment by the King might seem to lay some Restraints upon him, and require a greater Observance, yet by his Gravity and Piety, he gat himself so great Reverence with the King, that he feared not to oppose Odo the King's Brother in his Encroachments upon the Church; yea, in all he could, so intervened between the Kingdom and the King, that he saved the Nation from many rigorous Exactions and severe Impositions. For he that conquer'd all others was a Captive to Lanfranc's Goodness. He reform'd the Irregularities of the Clergy, and introduc'd Gravity and Piety among them, according to the usage of his Country, in this joyning in Alterations with his Master, tho' more for the best. And to raise Devotion among all sorts, he did what possible he could to furnish his Church with the most exquisite Ornaments he could procure; he caus'd Religious Houses to be built with greater Conveniency and State, and began the founding of Hospitals. Having long labour'd by indefatigable diligence to keep things in an even Course, during the Reign of the Conqueror; and after his Death, seeing his Successor (who was establish'd in his Throne by his means chiefly) to fail his Expectation, and foreseeing by his long Experience the ill tendency of the present Management, he began (with his Friends) much to lament the tediousness of Life, which he shortly after was remov'd out of by a gentle Sickness, which neither hinder'd his Speech nor Memory; a thing which he often desir'd of God. William Fitz-Auber, who (as is above mention'd) was a principal Counsellor and Instrument in the Invasion of England, and for that end furnish'd the King with forty Ships at his own Charge, was a Man of a great Estate, but of an Heart larger than any Riches could suffice. He was so liberal to Soldiers, that the King himself often check'd his Profuseness; and so kind, that he made a Law, (for that Power the Noblemen of those times had in their Provinces) that in the County of Hereford no Man of War or Soldier should be fined for any Offence whatsoever, above seven Shillings; whereas in other Countries, upon the least Offence given their Lord, they were forced to pay twenty or twenty five Shillings. He was a most eminent Earl, a chief Counsellor in all State Affairs, both of England and Normandy, and always in highest Favour with the King; yet was not contented with these Honours, but through hopes of greater Riches and Command, went over into Flanders, where, by marrying Richeld the Widow of Baldwin VI. Duke of Flanders, he design'd to get into that Government in the Minority of Arnulph her Son: But Robert de Frison his Uncle, who was call'd to govern by the People, because of the Exactions of Richeld, kept so strong possession of that Dukedom, that Fitz-Auber was forced to recover it by the Sword, which before he had done he was by surprize slain. And indeed it was the Fate of the Conqueror to see most of those Men, who had been the principal Actors in all his Fortunes, dead before him, as Beaumont, Montfort, Harcourt, Hugh de Gourney, Viscount Neele, Hugh de Mortimer, Count de Vannes, &c. Himself last of all, having lain sick a little time at Rouen, and dispos'd of his Estate, dy'd in the seventy fourth Year of his Age, and one and twentieth Year of his Reign. His Corps, tho' of so great a Monarch, is said to have lain three Days quite neglected, his Servants minding more to provide for themselves, than to attend upon him: At last his youngest Son Henry caus'd it to be convey'd to his Abby at Caen. He was well attended to the Gates of the City; but there happening a Fire just at their entering into the Town, the Corps was again wholly deserted, the Company all running to quench the Flames. After that was done, and the Body was carry'd to the Monastery, and ready to be bury'd, a Gentleman of Note stands up, and with angry Countenance forbids his Burial in that place, claiming the Ground for his Inheritance, descended to him from his Ancestors, but taken from him at the building of that Abby; appealing to Row, their first Founder, for Justice; whereupon Henry was forced to compound with him for an Annual Rent. So hard was it for him, who had so large Dominions in his Life, to find a small place for his Burial, which he could not get but by Purchase: Men esteeming a living Dog more than a Dead Lyon, and most ready to trample upon those dead, which they fear'd most when they were alive.

He had a numerous Issue by Maud his Wife, viz. four Sons and six Daughters. To Robert his eldest Son he left the Duchy of Normandy, to William his third Son the Kingdom of England, and to Henry his youngest all his Treasure, with an Annual Pension to be paid him by his Brothers. Richard, who was his second Son and his Darling, * Yet was not this King so blindly devoted either to Lanfranc's Wisdom or Piety; for when Lanfranc labour'd much with him to swear Fealty to the Pope, as holding the Crown of England from him, tho' he look'd upon it as rather a piece of his Piety than Policy, yet he would never be induc'd to do it, because, as he alledg'd, none of his Predecessors the Kings of England had ever done it. The Letter he wrote to the Pope on this occasion is to be seen in Mr. Selden's Notes on Eudmerus. He was so jealous of his Power both in Spirituals as well as Temporals, that he would not suffer the Archbishop to call a Synod without his Leave.

* And for this Reason 'tis very probable it was, that when Gregory the VIIth impos'd Celibacy upon the Clergy of England, and commanded that none should hear the Masses of any that were marry'd; Lanfranc was very moderate in putting the Injunction in practise, and would part none of the Clergy from their Wives, tho' he would ordain none that were marry'd; as judging, perhaps, that true Piety could hardly thrive, nor the Clergy ever become regularly good, if Marriage were strictly forbidden.

* This Account of his Age is taken from Polydore Virgil, and is not true. William of Malmbury says, 'twas in the 59th Year of his Age; Ordericus Vitalis, in his sixty first Year; and Sir John Hayward, in his sixty fourth.

* His Corps was abandon'd as soon as the Breath was out of his Body by all his Servants; and 'twas not his Son Henry that caus'd him to be convey'd to Caen, but William Archbishop of Roan: The Corps being first embalm'd at the Charge of one Herlwyn, a Country Knight.

* Anselm Fitz Arthur.

* Henry his youngest Son paid Fitz Arthur one Hundred Pounds for the Ground.

* In his Dying Speech he said, He would constitute no Heir to the Realm of England, but would commend it to God; because he possess'd not that Honour by Right of Inheritance, but by the Instinct of God, Effusion of Blood, and Perjury of Harold. Yet he wish'd that his Son William, who had been ever obedient to him, might flourish in it; and to that end, he sent him with a Letter to Lanfranc. He left Henry five thousand Marks only. Ord. Vital.

a Prince

A. D. 1087. a Prince of great Hope, was slain by a Stag as he was hunting in the New Forest in Hampshire; the first Instance how fatal that Place would prove to the Royal Family, which had been made out of the Estates, and by the Wrongs of so many: For not long after William Rufus was slain there also by an Arrow, and Richard the Son of Robert Duke of Normandy brake his Neck by a Fall there, very sad Allays to those Pleasures, which we take by other Mens Injuries, yet the deserved Rewards of Injustice and Oppression. His eldest Daughter Cicilia was made a Nun, Constance the second was married to Alain Earl of Brittain, Alela to Stephen Earl of Blois, by whom among other Issue she had King Stephen. In her Age she became a Nun, according to the Devotion of those Times, in which the Persons of greatest Quality did not refuse a Retirement for Religion sake. Gundred the fourth Daughter was married to William de Warren Earl of Surrey, the other two Ela and Margaret, died before Marriage.

His Person. He was of a proportionable Stature, comely Personage, and good Presence either riding, sitting, or standing, till by Age he grew corpulent and unweildy; of so healthy and strong a Constitution, that he never had any Sickness till a few Months before his Death. He had so great a Strength of Body, that very few could bend his Bow; and tho' he was above fifty Years old when he enter'd England, yet his Age had not in the least impaired him, as his Activity and indefatigable Labour in the Expedition proved. He was of an undaunted Courage, sagacious Wit and ripe Judgment, as his many Encounters with the French and Danes do evidently shew, who were a People more powerful both in Men and Shipping than himself; yet by his Policy and Bravery he was able to match, if not overmatch them both. His Devotion was very exemplary and admirable, as the Clergy of that time, who never loved him, do acknowledge. His great Mercy appeared in often pardoning and receiving into Favour those who had rebelled against him; and tho' he was troubled with so many Rebellions by the English Nobles, yet he never executed but one of them, and that was Waltbeof, who had notoriously broke his Faith with him twice before; and those whom he kept Prisoners in Normandy as the Earls Morchar and Siward, with Wolfnotb, the Brother of Harold, and others, he (out of Compassion to them) released a little before his Death. He was so far from Suspicion (a great sign of Magnanimity) that he allowed Edgar his Competitor for his Crown the Freedom of his Court, at his Desire furnished him out for the Holy War, where he behaved himself bravely, and got great Reputation by his Actions from the Emperors of Greece and Germany, which might have been accounted dangerous, because of his relation to the latter. He was a Benefactor to nine Abbies of Monks, and one of Nuns, founded by his Ancestors in Normandy; and during his Reign were founded either by his Encouragement, or Charge, seven Monasteries and six Nunneries in the same Province. With those Forts (as he said) he furnished Normandy, that they might fight against the World and Flesh. In England he founded one great Abby near the Place where he got the Victory over Harold, and in Memory of it, call'd it Battle-Abby; and two Nunneries, one at Hincbing-Brook in Huntingdonshire, and the other at Armitbway in Cumberland, besides many other publick Works. He was very magnificent in his Festival Entertainments, which he observed with great Solemnity and Ceremony, which naturally beget Reverence; keeping his Christmas at Glocester, his Easter at Winchester, and his Whitsuntide at Westminster, whither he then summoned all his Nobility, that Embassadors and Strangers might see his State and liberal Expences, and was always at those times very mild and obliging. These Ceremonies William Rufus kept up, but Henry laid them aside.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of William I.

IN the eleventh Year of his Reign, on the 27th of March, there was a general Earthquake in England, and in the Winter following a Frost, which continu'd from the 1st of November to the middle of April. On the 16th of the same Month a Comet appear'd about six in the Morning, in fine Weather.

In his 15th Year another Earthquake happen'd, the more terrible because it came with a hideous Noise; and in his 20th Year there fell such abundance of Rain, that the Floods were universal thro' the Kingdom; and the Springs rising in several Hills, so soften'd and decay'd the Foundations of them that they fell down, and some Villages were overwhelm'd in their Fall. Sir J. Hayward.

In the last Year of his Reign Holinshed reports, there was a burning Fever among the People, a Murrain among the Cattel, and at the same time Fowl, as Cocks, Hens, Geese, and Peacocks, fled from their Owners Yards to the Woods, and became wild. On the 7th of July, St. Paul's Church in London was burnt.

In his Reign William Bishop of Durham founded the University College in Oxford. The Use of the Long-Bow, which render'd the English Nation so famous afterwards, was brought first into England by this Prince.

The most Illustrious Persons in the Reign of William the Norman were

Waltbeof Son of Siward, Earl of Northumberland; Ebrick Sylvaticus, or the Forester; Edwin Earl of Mercia, and Earl Morchar, brave Englishmen, and zealous Assertors of their Liberty against the Normans; of whom the most famous were Roger de Breteuil Earl of Hereford; Ralph de Wayir Earl of Norfolk, and Roger Mowbray the Norman Earl of Northumberland.

Of Men of Learning: The most Eminent in his Time were

land in Lincolnshire; Osborn a Monk of Dover, who wrote the Life of Dunstan; Robert Bishop of Hereford; Folcard a Benedictine Monk, he wrote the Life of Sir John of Beverly; Arch-bishop Lanfranc, who, tho' a Lombard by Birth, was an Englishman by Affection, he wrote this King's Life. In his time also flourish'd Marianus Scotus, born in Ireland in the Year 1028. He wrote an English History and a general History of Europe interwoven with it, which he brought down to the Year 1083. He left Ireland Anno 1056, and went to Germany, where he became a Monk of St. Martin's Convent at Mentz, and died there Anno 1086. Sir James Ware. Irish Writers.

* In the Year of our Lord 1542. the Bishop of Bayeux, Abbot of St. Stephens in Caen, order'd King William the First's Tomb to be open'd, wherein his Body was found whole, fair and perfect, his Limbs large and big, and his Stature taller, and Bulk bigger than that of ordinary Men.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF WILLIAM II.

A. D.
1087.
Reg. 1.

William
Rufus made King of England.

WILLIAM the II<sup>d</sup>, Son to the Conqueror, being with his Father at Rouen at his Death, had his desires so fix'd upon the Crown of England, that neglecting his Father's Funeral, he hasten'd with all speed thither, and by the Mediation of Lanfranc, and his own large Bounty and Promises, obtain'd it<sup>b</sup>, according to his Father's Will, whom by his dutiful Behaviour he had much endear'd to himself, especially after the Abdication of his eldest Son Robert. He was a Prince more Gallant than Good; and having been bred up to Warlike Actions, in which he was generally on the fortunate side, was rough and proud by Nature, and grew much more so by the addition of Sovereignty, which enabled him through the heat of Youth to do several irregular Acts, to his own eternal Dishonour, as well as the loss of his Subjects Love: Coming to the Crown not by Succession, and Right of Primogeniture, but by his Father's Will only, (for his elder Brother Robert was alive, and the Kingdom by Inheritance belong'd to him) he found it absolutely necessary to hold the Possession of it by the good-will of his Subjects, which he knew no better way to purchase than by large Promises of Favours and Kindness, and large Gifts to those that were more likely to be wrought upon to disturb it. His Subjects consisted of two sorts of People, Normans and English: The Normans were to be engag'd to him chiefly by Money; and therefore to gain them he went presently after his Coronation to Winchester, where his Father's Treasure<sup>c</sup> lay, and emptied it out all to them; by which profuse Liberality, tho' he gain'd the Love of many, yet he lost more than he won, his Fund being not large enough to content all, and made himself so poor ever after, that through meer necessity he was forc'd to be burthensome to his Subjects, and made use of many dishonourable ways of extorting Money from them. The English were to be secured by nothing so much as the Grant of their ancient Liberties; wherefore he gave them larger Promises than was suitable to his State and Dignity, which afterward failing in the performance of, he got himself more hatred than otherwise he would have had; yet he settled himself for the present, till Time discover'd that.

Robert Duke of Normany being settled in his

Dutchy<sup>d</sup>, which was the height of his Ambition in his Father's Life-time, was not contented with that only after his Death, but grudg'd to see himself a small Prince, and his younger Brother a potent King: Whereupon he contriv'd the speediest ways he could to recover his Inheritance, and ruine his Brother's Fortune in the beginning of it. He knew he had a strong Party for him in England, and his Uncle Odo, Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, and some others of the Nobility, were at hand to encourage him to it: But he wanted Money for so great an Enterprize, which he had no other ways to raise so speedily, as by taking it of his younger Brother Henry, to whom his Father and Mother had left a great Treasure. Of him therefore by engaging the Country of Constantine, a Province in Normandy, he borrow'd such large Sums, as enabled him to levy a good Army for England. But William newly invest'd in his Crown, tho' well enough prepar'd for any Invasion, yet chose rather to purchase a present Peace (by the Mediation of the Nobility on both sides) till Time had better settled him in his Government, than to raise such Heats on both sides by a War as could not be easily allay'd; and so an Agreement was made, That William should hold the Kingdom of England during his Life, paying Robert three thousand Marks per Annum. Robert having thus compounded the Difference with his Brother William, turn'd his Forces upon his Brother Henry, by whose help he had rais'd them, and took the Country of Constantine from him, without paying the Money for which it was engag'd. This Injustice from Robert was very pleasing to William, who hearing of it upbraided Henry with the Gain of the Usury of that Money which he had lent to deprive him of his Crown. Henry being thus deserted by both his Brothers, and having no place to live in free from danger from them, he surprized the Castle of Mount S. Michael, and fortify'd it; getting assistance from Hugh Earl of Britain, who for his Money supply him with plenty of Soldiers out of Britain, who spoil'd and ravag'd the Countries of Constantine and Bessin.

Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, being return'd into England from his Imprisonment in Normandy, and restor'd to his Earldom of Kent, was not yet contented in so much an inferiour station to what he <sup>a</sup> The Nobility were more inclin'd to Robert than William, but by Lanfranc's Piety and Persuasions were gain'd to fix at last upon William, and so he was crown'd by Lanfranc, Sept. 6. 1087.

<sup>c</sup> 'Tis said, the Treasure consisted of sixty thousand Pounds in Money, (a prodigious Sum in those Days) besides Jewels, Gold and Plate.

<sup>d</sup> Duke Robert was in Germany when his Father dy'd, and by his absence gave his Brother William time to settle himself in the Throne of England.

To this end he enter'd into a Plot with as many Norman Lords as he found inclineable to a Change, to set up Robert Duke of Normandy, and sent for him to come over with speed with all the Power he could bring out of Normandy. In the mean time these Conspirators, to distract the King's Forces, and so leave Robert an easie entrance into the Kingdom, began in divers parts of the Nation to revolt from their Allegiance. Geoffrey Bishop of Constance, with his Nephew Robert de Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, fortify'd Bristol, and took in the Country round about; Robert de Bigod made a strong Party in Norfolk; Hugh de Grandemont gather'd Forces about Leicester; Robert de Montgomery, Earl of Sbrensbury, had a considerable Body of Welshmen, and others thereabouts, with whom he set forward; and being accompanied with William Bishop of Durham, Bernard de Newmarch, Roger Lacy and Ralph Mortimer, took Worcester, and secured themselves in it. Odo himself fortify'd the Castle of Rocheſter, and made good all the Coasts of Kent. So that had Robert come with his Army out of Normandy, as they expected, and in the midst of these Distractions pursu'd his Claim, he had infallibly got the Crown; but he staying too long, gave the King time to confirm his Friends, undermine his Enemies, and strengthen himself by the assistance of the English, to whom having granted a release from their former Tribute, eased them of their Grievances, and restored them to their ancient Freedom, in hunting in all his Woods and Forests; he made them so entirely his, and so ready to serve him, that he soon became powerful enough to vanquish all the Conspirators; by which the Normans were convinc'd, that the English could easily have conquer'd them, had they had an Head to lead them against them. Montgomery came over to the King, and the rest were soon repress'd. Odo's Faction in Kent was the strongest, and the last conquer'd. The King coming with his Army against them, first attack'd the Castle of Tunbridge, and took it; then Penſey, where Odo was, who was forc'd to yield it to the King, and promised that the like should be done at Rocheſter, by Eustace Earl of Bologne, and the Earl of Mortaigne, who held it out against him. But when he was brought thither to effect it, the Besieged taking him in, detain'd him, and held out stoutly against the King's Forces, upon a false Information, that Duke Robert was landed at Southampton; but at last were forced to resign, and retire into France, and Odo was compelled to abjure the Kingdom. The danger being thus blown over in England, William, to keep his Brother employ'd at home, and discourage him from all future attempts upon the Kingdom of England, transports an Army into Normandy to waste and disturb his Brother's Dominions. At his first Entrance he obtain'd S. Valery, and after Albemarle, with the whole Countries of Eu, Fescamp, the Abbacy of Mount S. Michael, Cherburge, and other places. Robert in this distress seeks for aid from Philip King of France, and was promis'd it; but as he was marching towards Normandy with his Army, King Wil- liam by Money so prevail'd with him to stand Neuter in the Quarrel, that he return'd without doing Robert any good; by which means he was forced to clap up a dishonourable Peace upon these Articles, concluded between them at Cane in Normandy, viz. 1. That King William should hold the County of Eu, Fescamp, and other places, which he had bought, and were deliver'd unto him, by William Earl of Eu, and Stephen Earl of Aumerl, Sister's Son to William the First. 2. That he should assist Robert to recover all those Places which belong'd to his Father, and were taken away from his Dutchy. 3. That such Normans as had forfeited their Estates in England, by joyning with Robert, should be restor'd to them. 4. That the Survivor of either of them should succeed to the Dominions both of England and Normandy.

After the Conclusion of this Peace by the Mediation of the King of France, and while King William's Army remain'd in the Field, Robert desired his assistance against his Brother Henry, who still kept the Fort of Mount S. Michael, and defended himself in it. The two Brothers besieg'd it forty Days, with little damage to either side. But King William himself, who walking one day on the Shoar by the Castle was so violently assaulted by three Persons, who among others sallied out of it, that his Horse was kill'd, his Breastplate broken, and himself cast on the Ground; being hardly able to defend himself, till his Men could come to his rescue. In the end Henry was reduced to extrem want of Drink and Water, altho' he had sufficient quantities of other Provision in the Fort, and sends to Duke Robert, whom he knew to be of the more mild and compassionate Temper, to permit him liberty to supply himself with them. Robert immediately sends him a Tun of Wine, and grants him a Truce for one Day to furnish himself with Water; which, when William understood, he was displeased. But Robert reply'd, That it was very Inhumane to deny a Brother Meat and Drink, who crav'd it; for if he perish'd, they had no other Brother: Which words wrought so upon William, that not long after they sent for Henry, and came to an agreement, That he should hold the Country of Constantine in Mortgage till Robert had paid his Money; for which a Day was appointed, when he was to receive it at Rouen. This Agreement King William farther'd, that he might draw as much Treasure from Robert as he could, whom by this Voyage he had not only impoverish'd, but possess'd himself of a safe and continual Landing-place in part of his Dutchy, and caused him to banish out of Normandy Edgar Arbeling, whom Robert kept in his Court to awe his Brother. Besides, he so prevail'd with Robert, either by Promises of Money, or other ways, that he brought him with him into England, and carry'd him along with him in his Expedition against Malcolm King of Scots, who had invaded his Dominions in his absence; but the Difference being adjusted without Arms, they soon return'd. And Robert not long after went into Normandy again, much dissatisfy'd at his Disappointment by his Brother; and because he had not Money to discharge his Brother's Debt, according to his Promise, he was resolv'd to get a Discharge from it without; and meeting Henry at Rouen upon the day appointed, committed him to Prison; and to get a Release, forced him to renounce his Claim to * Duke Robert, on his arrival in Normandy, made him Governour of that Province.

† William of Malmſbury says, Henry was forc'd to surrender the Castle for want of Water, on condition he might go where he pleas'd; after which he retir'd into Bretagne, and thence into the French Vexin, shifting from place to place, with only a Knight, a Chaplain, and three Gentlemen attending him.

‡ The Peace was made by the Mediation of Edgar, which restor'd him to the King's Favour; one Article of the Treaty was, That King Malcolm should do Homage to King William. Sir J. H. Or, as Florence of Worcester writes, That Malcolm should yield the King the same Obedience as he had done to his Father, King William.

A. D. 1093. Reg. 6. the Country of Constantine, and swear to pretend no Title to any thing in Normandy. Henry having by this means got his Freedom, fled to Philip King of France, and complain'd of this gross Injustice done him by his Brother; Philip gave him kind Entertainment, but he remain'd there not long, before a Knight of Normandy, named Hacbard, undertaking to put him into the strong Fort of Dampfrent without the knowledge of his Brother Robert, convey'd him in disguise out of that Court, and caus'd the Town and Castle to be resign'd up to him; by which soon after he made himself Master of the Country of Passays, which lay about it, and a good part of Constantine, having the private assistance of his Brother William, Richard de Rivieres, and Roger de Manneville. Duke Robert seeing Henry again set up against him, levies an Army to recover Dampfrent; but finding that he was supported by his Brother the King of England, he enveighs against him, as false and perfidious to him, and they became more bitter Enemies than they had ever been before. William being incens'd at this, pass'd over into Normandy with a great Army, but rather to terrifie than fight his Brother, (for William, tho' he desir'd to be great with the Sword, yet car'd not how little he made use of it, if he could obtain his ends by any other means.) Many small Skirmishes pass'd between them; but in the conclusion, a Peace was propounded, to which William seem'd very averse, that he might obtain what Conditions he pleased, and sent for greater Forces into England, as if he resolv'd to continue the War; but Robert being deserted by the King of France, was forced to accept of a Peace at home upon any terms; which being made up, William order'd that his Army which he had sent for out of England, and was come to the Sea-side ready to embark<sup>a</sup>, should be disbanded, and upon the Payment of ten Shillings a Man dismissed to their homes; which being gladly comply'd with, he was enabled to discharge his Expences in Normandy, and see the French King.

1094. Reg. 7. King William having by this arbitrary Peace with his Brother secur'd himself from all Troubles in Normandy, resolv'd to turn his Arms upon two Enemies at home, the Scots and Welsh; intending to restrain the former from hurting him and subdue the other. Malcolm, King of Scots, had several times in the King's absence in Normandy much depopulated and wasted the Northern Parts of England, and was again entred into the English Marches as far as Chester, destroying the Country all along. William hasten'd to oppose him, and after many Rencounters they were brought to an Interview; both Kings being more willing to have a Peace than seek it. The two Kings met at Glocester, but William carrying himself at a great distance, and expecting to have his Demands granted in every Particular, made Malcolm not only less yielding, who before was content to have the Confines of both Kingdoms determined by the Primates of them; but being incens'd at the Disdain which William had shew'd to him, tho' a Sovereign Prince, as well now as before, went home; and raising a great Army enter'd Northumberland, resolving to destroy that Country and go farther. Robert de Mowbray, Earl of that County, seeing his Territories so miserably harass'd and depopulated, and being a stout and valiant Soldier, A. D. raised what Force he could to oppose him with- 1094. out the King's Order; but not being strong Reg. 7. enough to enter a pitch Battel with him, lay in ambush for him where he was to pass, and fell upon him so fiercely and boldly, that he slew Malcolm himself and his eldest Son Edward<sup>b</sup>, the Grief of whose Deaths soon after brought the good Queen Margaret to her End. After the Death of Malcolm, the Scots chose Dufwald his Brother King, and drove all the English out of their Nation, which were come thither either to attend the Queen, or secure themselves from the Conqueror, and were preferred by Malcolm. But King William, to bring the Kingdom into their Legal Succession, and have a King which might be beholding to his Power, assisted Edgar the second Son to Malcolm (who had served him in his Wars) to obtain the Crown due to him as Heir by Succession to it, and at length expelled Dufwald; and the Nation received Edgar, but destroyed all the Men which he brought with him out of England, capitulating with him, that he should never more entertain English or Normans in his Service.

The State of Scotland being settled according A. D. to his Mind, he next turned his Arms upon 1095. Wales; for which he could not want a just Oc- Reg. 8. casion, the Welsh being ever struggling for their Liberty, and attempting a faint Revenge upon the English and Normans. He went himself in Person upon this Expedition, with a purpose of depopulating that Country, which was so troublesome to him; but the Welsh flying some into Mountains, and others into the Isle of Anglesey, avoided his Fury. The King sent Hugh Earl of Shrewsbury, and Hugh Earl of Chester against the latter, who got the Isle into their Power by Surprise, but used their Victory with horrid Cruelty and Barbarity; putting out the Eyes, and cutting off the Noses, Hands and Arms of their poor Captives without Mercy, or Distinction of Age or Sex. But this Inhumanity was by a just Providence revenged upon Shrewsbury almost in the very Fact: For Magnus, Son of Olaus Son of Harold Harfager, who had lately taken the Isles of Orkney, and was coming to land at Anglesey in his Passage that way on the Sea, being opposed by these Earls with that small Force they had, wounded the Earl of Shrewsbury in the Eye with a Shot, and beat him into the Sea; so that he suffer'd a double Death for the unspeakable Cruelties he had been guilty of to others<sup>c</sup>. This War being hardly finish'd, a Conspiracy broke out in the Heart of the Kingdom, contriv'd by Robert Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, William D'Ou, and many others, whose Design was to have destroy'd the King, and raised Stephen Earl of Albemarle, his Aunt's Son, to the Crown. This Plot was greater Trouble than Danger to the King; for by his speedy advance against them, and onset upon them with the greatest Strength of the Kingdom, which joyned with him to suppress them; he quash'd their Design, and got most of the Conspirators into his Power, which he punished with a Severity equal, if not beyond the Crime. The Earl he committed to the Castle of Windsor; William D'Ou, at a Council at Salisbury, being overcome in a Duel (the Tryal then used in such cases) had his Eyes put out, <sup>a</sup> King William the Second did not want more Forces than he had; but to raise Money, he levy'd twenty thousand Englishmen, and commanded them to march to the Sea-side to be shipp'd for Normandy: When they came there, he caus'd Ralph his Treasurer to offer them, that to save the Nation so many Men, and themselves the Perils they were to run, as many of them as wou'd pay ten Shillings shou'd be discharg'd; upon which, they all paid down their Money and went home. Mat. Paris.

<sup>b</sup> This Fight was near Alnwick in Northumberland. Str John Hayward says the Scots were so encumber'd with Plunder, that the English had no difficult Task to defeat them.

A. D. 1095. and his Privy Members cut off; William de Al- meric, his Sewer, a Man of a goodly Personage and allied to him, was condemned to be hanged;
 Reg. 8. tho' both in his Confession to Osmund the Bishop<sup>a</sup>, who was present, and to all the People as he pass'd along to his Execution, he gave such Proofs of his Innocency, that he was thought to have suffer'd wrongfully from the King, who was so anger'd by this Revolt, that he not only punished the Actors with too much Severity, but retained an implacable Temper of Mind ever after.

1096. And certainly this ill Humour would have
 Reg. 9. created him continual Disturbances at home, had
 The Holy War began, and how. there not happen'd a very fortunate Juncture of Affairs, which not only eas'd him, but most of the Kingdoms of Europe, which were broken in pieces with Factions and Schisms of their most troublesome Members. Pope Urban being sensible of the lamentable Distraction of Christendom, thought it the best Expedient to end them, to draw their Thoughts and Designs another way, and to that end called a Council at Clermont in Auvergne<sup>b</sup>; where having propounded to the Princes and Bishops assembled, the miserable Condition of the Christians at Jerusalem under the Turks, he earnestly exhorted them to join their Forces to recover the Holy Land out of the hands of the Infidels, telling them, 'That it 'was an Action not only just, but such as would 'get them an indelible Honour in this World,
 'as well as Eternal Glory in a future. This Motion being seconded with the earnest Persuasions, and active Zeal of Peter the Hermit of Amiens;
 and meeting with a general Inclination to Religion, and such Acts of Goodness, prevailed so much with all sorts of the People, that none were accounted to be of any real Worth or Piety, which desired to be excused from the Expedition: Infomuch, that many great Princes pass'd away their whole Estates, and left their Kingdoms to engage in this noble Action; and all sorts of People flock'd so fast to this Service, that in a little time they made up an Army of three hundred thousand, or, as some say, seven hundred thousand Men. Godfrey of Bouillon, Nephew and Heir to the Duke of Lorraine, a generous Prince, bred in the Wars of the Emperour Henry IV. was the first that offer'd himself to undertake this famous Voyage, whom his Brothers Eustace and Baldwin were resolv'd to accompany. Their Example invited Hugh le Grand, Count de Ver- mandois, Brother to Philip King of France, Ro- bert Duke of Normandy, Robert Frison Earl of Flanders, Stephen Earl of Blois, and Chartres Ai- mar Bishop of Puy, William Bishop of Orange, Raimund Earl of Toulouse, Baldwin Earl of Hai- nault, Baldwin Earl of Reibel, and Garnier Earl of Gretz, Harpin Earl of Bourges, Ifoard Earl of Dy, Rambald Earl of Orange, Guillaum Count de Forests, Stephen Earl of Aumaul, Hugh Earl of
S. Poll, Rotron Earl of Perche, and some others, out of France, Germany, and the Countries ad-joyning. Italy sent Bobemond Duke of Apulia;
 and England, Beauchampe, with many others, whose Names are now lost. Spain could afford none, because they were greatly afflicted at that time with the Inroads of the Sarazens. Most of Reg. 10. these Princes and Noble Persons sold or engaged their Dominions and Possessions to furnish themselves out for this brave Attempt. Godfrey sold the Dutchy of Bologne to Hubert Bishop of Liege, and Metz to the Citizens. Baldwin his Brother A. D.

 sold the Earldom of Verdon to Richard Bishop of 1097.
 that Province, and Eustace sold all his Estate to Reg. 10.
 the Church, Harpin Earl of Bourges sold his Earldom to Philip King of France, and Robert mortgaged his Dutchy of Normandy, Earldom of Main, and all he had, to his Brother William King of England<sup>c</sup>. Thus did the Pope weaken not only the Empire, and eas'd the Church of that long Contest about Investitures of Bishops; but also mightily enriched the Ecclesiastical Persons, who purchased most of the Temporalities, which the Undertakers left, and so became much greater than they had been before; especially in France, and afterwards in England, when Richard the First undertook the same Voyage. This War, notwithstanding it was attended with infinite Hazards and Difficulties, Pressures and Wants, was kept on foot almost three hundred Years,
 and by it were consumed an infinite Treasure, and most of the bravest Men of these Western Parts of the World, especially in France; for in Italy and Germany the Pope kept many back by Dispensation, who were his Friends, and would else have gone, merely to maintain his Cause against the Emperour; who yet struggled with him, but at last the Pope prevailed. The Zeal of these Christian Princes was admirable, but did little or no good; for instead of driving the Enemy out of the Christian Countries, they discover'd their own Weakness, and en-courag'd the Infidels to make their Attempts upon Europe, of which since they have gained some of the fairest Provinces.

By this War William was rid of his elder Bro- William ther, and a troublesome Competitor, had the gets Nor-Possession of Normandy during his Reign, and mandy. became an absolute Prince in both. But this want of an outward Enemy made him take Liberty to do many irregular and arbitrary things, whereby he lost the Love of his People in general, and brought upon himself the Hatred both of the Clergy and Laity. For to raise this great Sum, which he had agreed to furnish Ro- bert with for his Journey into the Holy Land, he made use of the most rigorous and unjust ways of exacting Money of the People, seized upon the vacant Livings and Preferments of the Clergy, and kept them in his own hands to enjoy the Profits of them. After the Death of Lanfranc, he kept the Arch-bishoprick of Canterbury vacant four Years, and had held it longer; but that falling sick of a dangerous Distemper at Glocester, the Clergy in his Sickness convinc'd him so much of the Sinfulness of the Fact, that he vow'd that he would fill up all Vacancies if he recover'd, which indeed he did, but with some Unwilling-ness. Anselm, an Italian born, but bred up in Anselm
Normandy, was preferred to the See of Canterbury: made Arch-
 But what through his own Stubbornness and the bishop of King's firm Adherence to his Regal Prerogative, Canter- he never enjoyed it quietly. For between them bury.
 began the Controversy about Investitures of Bishops, and other Privileges of the Church, which was so hotly maintained by his Successors; and Anselm not yielding to the King's Will, or rather Right, was forced to leave the Nation; and the King assum'd his Bishoprick again, and took all the Profits of it, and after this became so arbitrary a Possessor of Church-Livings and Preferments, that he held in his hands at one time, His Aus-beside the See of Canterbury, the Bishopricks of Winc.

A. D. 1097. Winchester and Sarum, and eleven Abbies, of which he had all the Incomes. What he disposed of to others, fell usually to their Shares, who would give most Money for them, and took Fines of Priests for Fornication. He vex'd Robert Bluet Bishop of Lincoln with Law-Suits, till he paid him 5000 l. And tho' he had much impoverish'd his Clergy, yet when he had laid this Tax upon them to pay his Brother, and they complain'd of Want, he answer'd them, That they had Shrines of Gold in their Churches, and for so bold a Work as this War against the Infidels was, they should not spare them. He also took Money of the Jews, to cause such of them as were converted to Christianity to renounce it again, making greater benefit of their Apostacy than Conversion; wherein he discover'd something worse in his Nature than Covetousness, which is Atheism. Besides the Taxes which he impos'd upon the Laity, he set Informers to take notice of any small Irregularities committed by them, and inflicted severe Penalties upon them. And tho' these Actings were very odious and tyrannical, yet he wanted not some of great Name and Station to countenance them, as Ranulph Bishop of Durham, and some other Bishops, who suffer'd themselves to be corrupted, contrary to their Profession, to oppose the Clergy and awe the Laity. By these ill means he gather'd great Sums of Money, which he as lavishly expended, either in his Buildings, (which were the Castle upon Tine, the City of Carlisle, Westminster-Hall, and the Walls of the Tower of London) or else in his Prodigal Gifts to Strangers, as the King of France, and others, which brought him to extream want.

His Person and Countenance.

He was of an indifferent Stature of Body, and well set, his Complexion was ruddy, and Hair inclining to yellow, whence he had his Name Rufus; he was bountiful to Soldiers, but austere to the Churchmen; he was of a rough and violent, but yet very courageous Spirit; of which we have this convincing Proof: As he was one day hunting, a Messenger came in all haste out of Normandy, and told him how the City of Mans was surpriz'd and taken by Heli, Count de la Flefche, (who by his Wife pretended a Right to it, and was assisted by Fulke D'Angiers, the old Enemy of the Dukes of Normandy) but the Castle held out valiantly for him; yet, if it were not timely relieved, must surrender. The King immediately bid the Messenger return with all speed, and assure them in the Castle, that he would be with them in eight days, if Fortune hinder'd him not. And presently having inquir'd which way Mans lay of a Norman that stood by, rid directly towards the Sea-Coasts. His Attendants, tho' they admir'd his Resolution, yet advis'd him to stay a while to provide things necessary for the Journey, and a Force answerable to his design: But Reg. 17. he reply'd, They that love me will follow me. Being arriv'd at Dartmouth, and desirous to go on Board a Ship ready to carry him over, the Master told him, That the Weather was so bad, and Sea so rough, his Passage would be very dangerous: But he said, Tisb, set forward; I never yet hear'd of a King that was drowned. Whereupon the Master setting sail, he arriv'd at Harfleur by break of Day, sends for his Captains and Men of War to attend him at Mans, and accordingly arriv'd there upon the Day appointed. Count de la Flefche, after his coming, was not able to hold out the Siege, but after some Skirmishes released the City, and was himself taken by a Stratagem, and brought a Prisoner to Rouen. Here being brought into the King's Presence, the King jested upon him to his Face, as not having Courage or Policy enough to withstand him; at which being more enrag'd, than cast down, he said, That he was made a Prisoner more by Chance than Force; and that, were he at liberty again, he would leave the King but little Land on that side the Sea. The King hearing these words, instantly set him at liberty, and giving him a good Horse, bid him go and do his worst. Which brave Act had such an effect upon the Count, that he gave over all Opposition, and came soon after to a Peace with the King. After this Success, the King return'd home with great Jollity, feasted his Nobility magnificently in his new Hall at Westminster, which was then lately finish'd, with which he found fault for being built too little; saying, That it was fitter for a Chamber, than a Hall for a King of England; and took a Platform to build it larger. After these Demonstrations of Joy were over, he spent some time in settling his publick Affairs, and then betook himself wholly to the Pleasure of Peace; and being a hunting with his Brother Henry in the New-Forest, Walter Tirrell a Norman, and his Kinsman, shooting at a Deer, (whether mistaking his Mark or not, is uncertain) shot him to the Heart, and so he immediately dy'd, in the thirteenth Year of his Reign, and the forty fourth of his Age. A Prince, who for the first two Years of his Reign, while either through Fear or Design he follow'd the wise Counsel of Lanfranc, behav'd himself as one of the best of Princes, and might have had an absolute Government of all his Subjects, if he had continu'd to seek it by endearing Acts; but seeking to establish it by Force, made both himself and People miserable.

Westminster-Hall built.

His Death in New-Forest.

* Yet that he approv'd not the Simoniack Buyers of Church-Promotions, though his Necessities put him upon such sinister means and ways of raising Money, appears from this Instance: That the King having the Presidency of an Abby in his hands, which he resolv'd to dispose of, two Monks came to him, and bid him large Sums for it, striving to outvie each other in purchasing it; a third stood by, as an Attendant of him that should be prefer'd, the King asked him, What he would give? To whom the Monk answer'd, Nothing, because I have vow'd Poverty. This Answer pleas'd the King so well, that he presently gave it him; shewing, that tho' he let them have Promotions who bought them, yet he thought those deserv'd them best that would not purchase them.

† This King was not at all oblig'd to the Monks for the Character they gave of him, neither were they oblig'd to him for his Favour. He hated their Covetousness and Arrogance, and had more Religion, or less Superstition, than any of them; if what is said of him be true, that he should openly declare, He believ'd no Saint could profit any one in the Lord's sight; and that neither he nor any wise Man would make Intercession either to Peter, or any other for help. || Walter Tyrrell, says Ordericus Vitalis a Norman, was a French Knight, a Native of Pontoise, a City in the Pais Vexin François, of the Province of the Isle of France.

¶ Sir John Hayward relates the Circumstances of it thus: As he was hunting at Choringham in the New Forest he struck a Deer lightly with an Arrow, and stay'd his Horse to look after the Deer, holding his Hands before his Eyes, because the Sunbeams dazzled his Sight; another Deer crossing the way, Sir Walter Tyrrell shooting at it too carelessly, or too steadily at the King, shot him full on the Breast, and kill'd him, the 2d of August, 1100.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of William II.

IN his second Year there happen'd a dreadful Earthquake through the whole Kingdom, which was follow'd by a great scarcity of Fruit, and so late a Harveſt, that Corn was not full ripe at the end of November. Sir J. Hayw. Hiſt. Will. II.

On the 5th of October, in the Year 1091. there fell a violent Storm in ſeveral parts of England, eſpecially at Wincheſcomb in Gloceſterſhire, where the Steeple of the Church was thrown down by Thunder and Lightning, and the Crucifix with the Image of the Virgin Mary was broken to pieces. The Hurricane was follow'd by a noiſome Stink. Holinſhead.

Sir John Hayward adds, That there was alſo a thick Smoke which darken'd the Sky.

On the 17th of the ſame Month there happen'd a Storm of Wind, which was then S. W. the ſame that blew in the late Tempeſt, ſo dreadful to the whole Nation; and yet this we are about to mention ſeems to have been more fatal in the City of London, where it threw down above five hundred Houſes, and blew off the Roof of Bow-Church in Cheapſide, by the fall of which two Men were kill'd. The top of the Steeple at Salisbury, and many Houſes were blown down. Holinſhead.

Sir J. H. ſays, It threw down ſix hundred and ſix Houſes in London; and that ſome Beams of Bow-Church twenty eight Foot long were driven ſo deep into the Ground by it, that not above four Foot remain'd in ſight. The Tower of London was alſo much broken. He adds farther, The next Year Oſmund Biſhop of Salisbury finiſh'd the Cathedral Church of Old Sarum, and the Steeple was fir'd by Lightning the fifth Day after the Conſecration of the Church: Which, perhaps, gave occaſion to Holinſhead's ſaying, that the damage was done to Salisbury Church at the ſame time that the Roof of Bow-Church was blown off.

The Year 1094. was very remarkable for the Number and Faſhion of gliding Stars, which ſeem'd to daſh together in manner of a Conflict. Sir J. H. Holinſhead, who is very particular in his account of the Seaſons, Weather, Plagues and Famine, goes farther, and affirms, That there was this Year ſo great Mortality of Men and Beaſts in England and Normandy, that the Ground lay untill'd in many places, which cauſ'd a ſevere Dearth.

Grifly and hideous Sightſ were ſeen in England, as Hoſts of Men fighting in the Air, Stars falling from Heaven, and other ſuch Wonders. The Ignorance and Superſtition of thoſe Ages have, we ſuppoſe, heighten'd the Terror of the unuſual Accidents in the Phænomena of Nature: But we are not of the Opinion of thoſe, who think there is nothing uſeful or entertaining in an Account of ſuch extraordinary Events and Appearances, nor are they below the Dignity of Hiſtory.

In the Year 1095. the eighth of this King's Reign, a Comet appear'd for fifteen Days together, the Tail pointing to the Eaſt. And in this Year Peter the Hermit preach'd up the Cruſade againſt the Infidels.

In the laſt Year of his Reign the Sea overflow'd in divers parts of England and Scotland; many Villages, Caſtles and Towns, much People, and a vaſt number of Cattel were overwhelm'd. At the ſame time the Lands that belong'd to Godwin Earl of Kent, Father to King Harold, were overflow'd and cover'd with Sand; and ever after they were call'd Godwin's Sands, as at this day Goodwin by Corruption. The Heavens often ſeem'd to flame with Fire, and frightful Forms and Apparitions were ſeen in the Air.

In this Reign the Monastery of Bath was joyn'd to the See of Wells, by John Biſhop of that Dioceſs; and the Church of Coventry to the Biſhoprick of Cheſter, by Robert Biſhop of that See.

The moſt Famous Warriors in his Reign were

Robert de Mowbray Earl of Northumberland,
Roger de Montgomery Earl of Sbrensbury, Robert de Bigod, Hugh de Grandmeſnil, Roger Lacy, Ralph Mortimer.

For Learning there were few or none Eminent in his Time, except

Turgotus, Prior, Arch-deacon, and Vicar General of the See of Durham, who wrote a Chronicle of that Biſhoprick. He was afterwards Biſhop of St. David's.

'Tis obſervable, that the Engliſh Names are already loſt in the Liſt of the moſt noted Barons of England: All whom we have mention'd, and thoſe we muſt have nam'd, had we inſerted more, being Normans.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF HENRY I.

A. D.
1100.
Reg. 1.

Henry the third Son of the Conqueror chosen King of England.

HENRY the youngest Son of William the First, being present at his Brother's Death, and born in England (which contributed much to his Advancement) was elected<sup>a</sup> and crowned King within four days after his Brother's Decease; it being reported, that Robert, who should have succeeded William<sup>b</sup>, was chosen King of Jerusalem; and 'twas not probable, that he would leave that Kingdom to govern this. But however, left Robert's return from the Holy Wars (who was indeed in Apulia, and hasting home) should shake the present Inclinations of all People to settle him in the Throne, Henry used all Expedition possible to settle himself in the Possession of it, which accordingly he effected; and that he might secure himself the firm Allegiance of the People, he began his Government with Acts of Kindness and Benefit to them, being a Prince not only learned, as those times were, from whence he was called Beau-Clerk<sup>c</sup>; but also of a mild Disposition and crafty Judgment; so that he knew how to make them good Subjects, after they had once made him their King. And to effect this, he first began with the Clergy, and all Vacancies in the Church, which his Brother through Covetousness had reserved to himself, he filled up with learned and pious Men; Anselm he recalled from his Banishment, and restored him to the Arch-bishoprick of Canterbury, and in general settled the Church in all the Privileges which had been taken from it by his Predecessors. The Laity he not only freed from the Oppressions and heavy Exactions they had long lain under, but punished those Men who had been forward Instruments of promoting them, which mightily pleased the People. And because Ralph Bishop of Durham, a Man who by his Cunning and fair Tongue had raised himself from a very mean Condition to great Preferments and highest Employments under the late King William, being his chief Counsellour, was generally looked upon as the only Person who put his Master upon these intolerable Exactions and Irregularities, and so was odious to all; he committed him to a freight and loathsome Prison. All dissolute and vicious Persons were expelled his Court, and the People were allowed to use their Lights again after the Cover-feu Bell had gone, which William had prohibited them to their great Discontent. Many other<sup>d</sup> good Laws and Orders he made for the Government of his Kingdom; and to make himself the more popular and beloved of the English, he married into the Royal Blood of England, by taking to Wife, Maud the Daughter of Mar-garet, the late Queen of Scots, Niece to Edward Arbelling, and so descended from Edmund Iron-side, a Lady of admirable Virtues and Goodness, worthy of so good a Mother, yet hardly won from her Vow of Virginity to become a King's Wife.

Reg. 1.

Henry married into the English
Royal Line.

Henry having thus secured his Interests in Eng-land, as much as possible, was scarce settled in his Regal Honour, but that Robert returned from the Holy Wars into Normandy, and was received with a general Applause by his Subjects there. The News of his Arrival much loosen'd the Affections of many from King Henry, especially of the Norman Nobility; who either out of Conscience, or Discontent, desire Robert should be their Governour. In the first Year Robert only threaten'd, but in the second he arriv'd with a strong Army at Portsmouth to recover his Right, and to him flock'd great Numbers of Henry's Subjects, especially Normans; so that the Armies on both sides were very powerful. But when the two Brothers met, and were to en-counter each other, Proposals of Peace by Henry's Craft, were made to Robert (who was a very tender hearted Man, and easily won to it, though very valiant) to save the Expence of Christian Blood; and it was concluded upon these Terms, 'That since Henry was born after his Father had obtained the Crown of England, and so was the eldest Son of William as King, though he was the youngest of him as Duke, and was now invested in the Regal Dignity by the Consent of the Kingdom, he should enjoy

Robert's rethe Holy War.

1102.
Reg. 3.

<sup>a</sup> He went to Winchester and seiz'd the late King's Treasures, from thence he posted to London, where by the Interest and wise Management of Henry Newburgh Earl of Warwick he was elected King. William of Malmesbury.

<sup>b</sup> Robert behav'd himself with such Courage and Conduct in this Expedition against the Turks, that when the Christians had taken Jerusalem, and thought it necessary to prefer one of the Christian Princes to be King of it; it was with general Consent tender'd to Robert, but he having just before heard of his Brother William's Death refus'd that Dignity, and hasten'd homeward to assume his Kingdom of England. Our Historians generally think, that Robert cross'd Providence by this Refusal, for he not only lost England but Normandy, and was unfortunate in all his Actions ever after.

<sup>d</sup> He restor'd King Edward's Laws with some Amendments, and added several others much for the Benefit and Liberty of the Subject, as about the Punishments of Theft with Death, false Coining and Adultery with Loss of Eyes and Members, Marriage of Widows, and the Daughters of the Gentry, all which may be found more largely in Speed's Lives.

<sup>e</sup> Maud, Daughter of Malcolm King of the Scots by Margaret, Sister to Edgar Etheling and Daughter to Edward Son to Edmund Iron-side, was next in Descent from the Saxon Kings to the Inheritance of the Crown of England, Edgar dying without Issue; by her Marriage with King Henry the Saxon and Norman Lines were united together, both in Blood and Title to the Crown.

And that all, whether English or Normans, that had taken part with Robert, should have their Pardons and enjoy their Estates and Liberties. Things being thus amicably composed, Robert a Prince of a generous and free Temper stayed in England two Months, enjoying the Delights and Pleasures of his Brother's Court without any sign of Envy or Ill-will, and then returned about Michaelmas into Normandy.

Henry's Contest with Anselm.

Reg. 4.

Henry being thus freed from his greatest Fear, and settled in his Throne by Right, began to stand up more stoutly in asserting his Prerogative against the Opposition of Arch-bishop Anselm, who refused to consecrate that Bishop that the King had preferred; alledging it to be a Violation of the sacred Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, lately decreed (at Rome) concerning this Business. The King not willing to forego his Due, sends an Embassage to Pope Paschal, to represent his Right to the Investiture of Bishops and Collation of Ecclesiastical Dignities, which he received from his Predecessors Kings of England, who never were molested in this Prerogative, but of late. Anselm immediately follows the Embassadors to Rome, there to make good his Cause; which so anger'd the King, that he banish'd him the Kingdom, and took his Bishoprick immediately into his hands. The Pope boldly vindicated the Power assumed by the Church, but in the end seeing the Resolution of Henry, and knowing that it was not in his Power to constrain him (who was engaged with the Emperor and other Princes in a Contest of the same Nature) he resolved to deal with him by Persuasions to draw him to his Will; and to that end, with kind Letters solicits him to relinquish his Claim and promises him most solemnly, that he would further him in any Matters concerning his State. The King considering the Proposals, and having some Designs in hand, which he judged might be better effected by the Connivance of the Church, consents to the Pope's Desires, and became an Example to other Princes of yielding to him in the same case: So Anselm was recall'd; and his Ambassadors return'd with large Presents from the Pope.

A Rebellion against Henry.

While these things were in hand, and transacting at Rome, there burst out a Rebellion at home, which as it tended to the Destruction of the Authors of it, so it brought the King more easily to his ends than otherwise he could have expected. Robert Belesme, Earl of Shrewsbury, Son to Roger Montgomery (a fiery young Man) presuming upon his great Strength and numerous Friends, fortified his Castles of Shrewsbury, Bridg-North, Tick-bill and Arundel, and combining with the Welshmen, deny'd the Obedience and Subjection to the King. Henry enraged at their Attempt, gathers a strong Army, and marches towards him; and within thirty days, partly by Force and partly by Promises, dispersed all his Associates, and took all his Castles, except that of Arundell, wherein were Belesme himself with his Brother Arnulphus and Roger de Poytiers, which held out something longer; but at length was forced to yield upon Condition, that they might retire safely into Normandy, which the King readily granted, seeing he lost nothing but two or three troublesome Men, which were better any where than at home. Their Departure made well for the King, for he immediately seized upon the Earl's Estate, which made a considerable Addition to his Revenues; and being come into Normandy, he made way for his obtaining that also. For as soon as he came thither, he enter'd into a Familiarity with one of like Condition and desperate Fortunes with himself (an exiled Person) whose Insolency had likewise stripp'd him of all his Estate in England, and much wasted that in Normandy, viz. William Earl of Mortaigne, Son of Robert half Brother to William the First. These two Earls, with their Adherents, committed many Outrages, assaulting the King's Castles, unjustly detaining the Estate of Richard Earl of Chester, a Minor, and the King's Ward, and spoiling several other parts of the Country; and tho' they were complain'd of to Duke Robert, yet no redress was made, the Duke being either past Action, or giving himself up to a Monkish Sluggishness. Henry therefore was appealed to by the Normans, who sending for his Brother, reproved him sharply for his Sluggishness; which Robert took so ill, that giving vent to former Discontents, he joyned with those mutinous Earls, and resolved upon a fresh Revenge upon his Brother. The King being troubled in Conscience at the Foulness of a Quarrel with his own Brother, was very dubious what to do, till Pope Paschal sent him some Letters to persuade him with all the Arguments of Wit and Invention to engage in this War, which he said, would not be a civil Dissention, but a noble and memorable Benefit to his Country. The Countenance and Approbation of the Pope put Resolution and Alacrity into the King, and now he proceeds boldly not as against a Brother, but a most dangerous National Enemy, passes into Normandy with his Army; and after many Difficulties and Losses of many worthy Men in a great Battel near the Castle of Tenchebray, defeated his Enemies and won Normandy, on the same day by Computation (wherein forty Years before) Normandy had over-run England. Robert, who stood in a fair Possibility of two Crowns, was now deprived of his Duchy, brought a Prisoner into England and committed to the Castle of Cardiffe; where to add to his Misery, he had the Misfortune of a long Life, living after this Loss twenty six Years not only in Confinement, but most of it in utter Blindness; his Eyes being put out soon after his Imprisonment for endeavouring to make an escape. He was a Prince of great Excellency and Valour, of which he gave so many Proofs in his Voyage into the Holy Land, that he had the second Command in the Army, and was very nigh being elected King of Jerusalem. But his Disobedience to his Father, and his Profuseness in his Expences, for which he sold, or engaged his whole Duchy, are great Stains to his Credit, and made him thought so unfit for Government, that his Brother Henry had the Commendation of most Men for taking it from him.

And now Henry being gotten to the highest pitch of Power and Dignity, an absolute King of England and Normandy, was so formidable, that none dare disturb his Peace; so that he lived many Years in the most flourishing Prosperity, gathered a great Treasure, and held a friendly Correspondence with all neighbouring Princes. Scotland was obliged to be quiet, not only upon * This Opposition was in a Synod call'd by Anselm at London, wherein he depos'd several Bishops who had been invested in their Sees by the King, and decreed, that none so invested ought to be consecrated.

<sup>c</sup> Some Authors report, that 'twas not his Eyes which were put out, but the Earl of Mortaigne's.

A. D. 1106. Reg. 7. the account of his Match with Maud, but also because he was a Benefactor to their Kings, and sav'd them from Usurpations. Wales, tho' he was titular Lord of it, yet was not subject to him, but now and then gave his Arms a little Exercise; but at length by his Wisdom he found out an effectual way to check their turbulent Humour. For, 1. He planted within the Body of their Country a Colony of Flemmings, who being admitted into the Nation by William, who marry'd their Country-woman, and used their assistance in subduing the Kingdom, and after allow'd them to dwell in Cumberland, had been routed from their Habitations, by the Sea breaking in upon them, and were become now burthenfome Guests to the Kingdom, and much disturb the Natives. These People, who were both numerous and stout, he settled among the Welsh, and so not only eased his own People of their Grievance, but also put a curb upon that People to keep them in awe; for they soon made room for themselves, and kept all the adjoining Countries in fear of them. And then, 2. He took the chief Men's Sons in the Country for Hostages, and so forced them to be quiet. As for France, he had no suspicion of Disturbance from them, because their King Philip gave himself up wholly to Ease and Luxury, and minded not Warlike Affairs, though his Son was thought to be of an active Temper, and might alter things when he came to the Crown. With the Earl of Flanders he had some difference, but it proceeded no farther than Words, which happen'd upon this occasion: The Conqueror in Recompence of the good Service which Baldwin V. Earl of Flanders had done him in his Expedition for England, gave him three hundred Marks per Annum, and continu'd it to his Son after him.

1107. Reg. 8. This present Earl Robert was of a Collateral Line, but yet being grown indigent by the Holy Wars, in which he had engag'd himself, and finding that such a Sum had been paid to his Predecessors, demands it of King Henry as his due; but the King, who was very slow at parting with Money, sent him word, That it was not the Custom of the Kings of England to pay Tribute; if they had allow'd Pensions to any Persons that had deserv'd well of them, they were temporary, and ended with them. This Answer much displeas'd the Earl; and tho' he liv'd not to shew his hatred, yet his Son did it, by assisting William the Son of Robert in his attempts to recover the Duchy of Normandy from King Henry. In this serene part of his Reign he settled his Affairs so firmly at home, that he never had any Disturbance among his Subjects after.

Henry's Quarrels with the King of France. But the Changes of the World brought a mutation in Henry's Affairs abroad. For after the Death of Philip King of France, Lewis the Gros's his Son succeeded him, and soon after his accession to the Crown began a Contest with him about the City of Gisors, which lies on the River Epre, and belong'd to his Duchy of Normandy. Henry being a Politick Prince, and knowing that he had a powerful Monarch to grapple with, not only provided an Army to oppose his Enemy, but strengthen'd himself by good Alliances, which he had a favourable opportunity to do just at that Juncture. For there happen'd at that time a Quarrel between the Pope and the Emperor Henry V. whom tho' the Pope had encourag'd in a Rebellion against his Father

Henry IV. and so had rais'd him to the Throne, A. D. 1108. (for he conquer'd his Father, and kept him in such straight Imprisonment, that he dy'd) yet he ex-Reg. 9. torted so many Privileges of the Empire from him, that repenting of what he had done, because he was reproach'd for it by his States, he rais'd a mighty Army, and marching into Italy, constrain'd the Pope and his College to acknowledge the Rights of the Empire in that form as Adrian had done to Charles the Great, and Leo to Otho II. according to the Decree of the Council of Rome, and made him take an Oath of Fidelity between his Hands, as to the true and lawful Emperor. The Contest between the Pope and Emperor. But the Pope, as soon as Henry was gone, call'd a Council, makes void this Acknowledgment, as done by Force, and shortly after deceas'd. Calixtus the Son of the Count of Burgogne succeeded him in the Papacy; and being a Frenchman call'd another Council at Reimes, where by an Ecclesiastical Decree Henry was declar'd an Enemy of the Church, and degraded of his Imperial Dignity. This made Henry the Emperor have a jealous Eye of Lewis, as a Favourer of his Enemies, who being most his Subjects, had pronounc'd such a Sentence against him; and to strengthen himself against a growing Party, desired a Marriage with Maud, the Daughter of Henry King of England, who was then an Infant of about five Years old. Besides this Enemy, Lewis had in his own Kingdom several of his Nobility about Paris, as the Counts of Crecy, Pissaux, Dimmartini, Champaigne, and others, who presuming upon their Franchises within their own Seigniories, of which at that time there were many in France, would be absolute Lords, and not be under the awe of a Master. These Henry took under his Protection; and that Lewis might not move against him, but with near as much prejudice to himself, in his own Confines, as he could do to him, lent them assistance against their Sovereign. The Emperor, who being become his Son-in-Law, was easily sway'd by his Interest or Persuasions, he incens'd to that degree, that he immediately rais'd a mighty Army to assault his Dominions, and joyn with Henry, who had made as great Preparations. This Storm hanging over the French King's Head, and almost unavoidable, much terrify'd him, and finding himself unable to grapple with such Enemies, he first deals with some of the German Princes, represents to them the Danger and Mischiefs of a War, undertaken upon a meer Suspicion, and in a Heat, without any just ground, and moves them to induce the Emperor, that they may first treat about it, before they began the War. The Princes prevail'd so far with the Emperor, as to send Ambassadors to signify his Discontent; to whom the French King declar'd, That it was a great grief to him to see the two greatest Pillars of the Church (viz. the Pope and Emperor) at variance, because by it the Ruine of the whole would almost inevitably follow: That he was a Friend to them both, and would very gladly be a Mediator for Peace between them for the good of Christendom; but would not, nor ever had been any means to increase the Dissentions between them. This Answer so pacify'd the Emperor, who was glad to have a Mediator between the Pope and himself, that he laid aside the Thoughts of a War with him; and not long after, by his intercession, the Pope and Emperor came to an Agreement, which

* In Ross-Hundred in Pembrokeshire, where their Posterity still continue, retaining so much of their old Customs and Language, as distinguishes them plainly from the Welsh or Britains; they were first planted in Northumberland, and remov'd to Wales, as Florence of Worcester writes, in the Year 1111.

<sup>b</sup> But it was only for the present; for in the fifteenth Year of his Reign they made several Inroads into England, two under Owen ap Cadogan, when they invaded the Possessions of Gilbert Strongbow Earl of Strygil; and two not long after under Griffith ap Conan, when they fell upon the Estate of Hugh Earl of Chester, which turbulent Humour so enrag'd Henry, that he vow'd utterly to root them out, yet upon their submission he pardon'd them.

A. D. 1108. was sealed at Wormes, to the Pope's advantage; for the Emperor yielded up his Right to Investitures of Bishops, and other Benefices, to him. The King of England was very much displeased at this Disappointment, but however did not give over his Designs against Lewis, giving the greater support to the Faction in Lewis's Kingdom, especially to Theobald Count of Champagne, who being strengthen'd with his great Alliance to Stephen Earl of Blois, and Fulke Earl of Anjou, was most likely to make the boldest Opposition to the French King. Lewis on the other side endeavour'd as eagerly to undermine Henry's Power in Normandy, and to that end conspir'd with William Earl of Flanders to restore William the Son of Robert Duke of Normandy to his Father's Dominions, to whom by Right the Inheritance belong'd. Many great and bloody Battels were fought between these two Princes, with the expence of much Blood and Treasure; till at length, both being tired with the Fatigues of War, willingly came to conclude a Peace by the Mediation of the Earl of Anjou, whose Daughter William, King Henry's Son, was about to marry; and upon the Consummation of the Peace was made Duke of Normandy, for which he did Homage to Lewis, and marry'd the Duke of Anjou's Daughter; and so France and Flanders became his Friends.

Peace made between King Henry and the French
King.

1116. But these Troubles were scarcely blown over, and this happy Conclusion made, but there follow'd such a sad Accident, as turn'd all the prosperous Successes and Joys into Mourning. William, the only Son of Henry, who was but just settled in his Dukedom, a Prince of seventeen Years of Age, going into England a little time after his Father's departure, accompany'd by Richard his bafe Brother, Mary Countess of Perch his natural Sister, Richard Earl of Chester, and his Wife, who was the King's Niece, and many other Persons of Quality, and their Attendants, to the number of an hundred and forty, besides fifty Mariners, setting out at Barbfleet, were all cast away at Sea, only a Butcher escap'd. The Prince had recover'd a Cockboat, and was in possibility of being sav'd; but being mov'd with the lamentable Cries of his Sister, he went back to the sinking Ship to take her in, where so many crowded with her into the Boat to save themselves, that it sank with its Load, and so all perish'd in the Waters. What Reflection this heavy Judgment might cause in the King's Conscience, is hard to know; but certainly it made such Impressions of Grief upon his Mind, that he was never seen to laugh after: And tho' he made all the haste he could to repair the Breach made in the Succession, by marrying Adalicia, a young beautiful Lady, Daughter of the Duke of Lovain, and of the House of Lorrain, yet the Loss prov'd irreparable, for he never could have a Child by her.

Troubles
caus'd to the King by the Prince's Death.

But the Death of Prince William created the King not only inward, but outward Troubles, by breaking his Alliances, and unsetling his Affairs in France and Flanders. Normandy it self wa- A. D. ver'd much in their Allegiance, many adhering 1116. to William his Nephew, to whom many more Reg. 17. were in Conscience inclin'd, than dare shew it. His great Confederates went over to the King of France. Fulke Earl of Anjou quarrell'd with him for his Daughter's Dower. Robert de Mallet his chief Counsellor, and a Man of great Trust under him, fell from him, and conspiring with Hugh Earl of Monfort, invaded and seized upon his Dutchy. But such was his great diligence and working Head, that he soon reduced things into a quiet frame. The two Earls he took by surprise, and made them his Prisoners; and Death rescu'd him from the Claims of the Duke of Anjou, who was a considerable Prince, as we may Reg. 27. judge by the King's matching first his Son, and after his only Daughter, then an Empress, into his Family, as we shall presently come to relate. The King of France continu'd his Opposition, and entertain'd William, Son of Robert Courtois, wherein all the danger lay; and first aids him in Person with great power to obtain the Earldom of Flanders, to which he had a fair Title by the defect of Issue in Earl Baldwin, who was slain in a Battel in France against King Henry. But Wil- 1126. liam, as if he had been not only Heir of his Fa- Reg. 27. ther's Dominions, but Misfortunes, being admitted to the Government, miscarry'd in his management of it, was depose'd by his People, and at length slain in a Battel by them. And so ended the Family of Robert Curtoise.

While these things were transacting, News Henry the came to the King, that his Son-in-law Henry the Emperor was dead; whereupon he presently sent for his Daughter the Empress home, with intention to settle the Succession of his Kingdom upon her; and for that purpose summon'd a Parliament, which met at Windsor, wherein an Oath was administer'd to all the Lords of the Land, to be true to Her and her Heirs, and to acknowledge and obey them as the right Heirs to the Crown. This Oath was first taken by David King of Scots, Uncle to Maud, and Stephen Earl of Bollogne, and Mortain, the King's Nephew, on whom he had bestow'd great Possessions in England, and advanced his Brother to the Bishoprick of Winchester. And to make all secure, he had the same Oath imposed in another Parliament at Northampton. His next Care was to provide Heirs, 1133. and thereupon marry'd her to Jeffrey Plantagenet Reg. 34. Earl of Anjou, by whom he liv'd to see her have two Sons. So that all things now seem'd settled and quiet, but only the King's own Dreams, which were said to be very terrifying, and in which he would rise, take his Sword, and act as if he were to defend himself from some Enemy; which shew'd, that his Conscience was very uneasy and fearful.

His Government in Peace was always of the Henry's Government in best sort; for he kept his Kingdom in such order, that whatever Troubles he had from abroad, he

The Original of Royal Progresses.

He made several Progresses into the most remote Parts of his Kingdom, to see how his Realm was ordered; and therefore, when he was in England, he kept no certain Residence, but celebrated the solemn Festivals in several Parts of his Kingdom, that all might enjoy his Company and share in his good Cheer. He never would extort any Sums of Money arbitrarily from his People, but always raised such Taxes as his Necessity required by the Consent of his People; which he assembled in Parliament first at Salisbury,

The beginning of Parliaments.

His Reforms.

Anno Regni 15. consisting of three Estates, according to the Custom of Normandy, as it continues to this day. He was a very sober Prince himself, and carefully repressed the Excesses of his Subjects, as long Hair, and other loose Fashions. He was very frugal and sparing in his Expences, chusing rather to pinch himself than his People; and tho' he had many great Charges of War, he never had but two Taxes in his long Reign, one for his War in France, and the other of three Shillings upon every Hide of Land for the Marriage of his Daughter to the Emperour. He kept indeed some Bishopricks and Abbies void in his hand, as that of Canterbury five Years together.

His ways to raise Money.

By an Act of Parliament, Anno Regni 30. he was permitted to punish the Marriages and Incontinency of Priests; but for a certain Fine he allowed them to enjoy their Wives, which much displeased the Clergy, and hinder'd the Reformation intended. He changed the Punishments of Malefactors by dismembering, into Pecuniary Mults. The Provisions of his House, which used to be paid in kind, he had rated and received that Money to support his Charge, to the great Content of his People, and with the Consent of his States. He assumed to himself the Liberties of hunting in his Forests, and besides renewing the former Penalties, made a Law,

His Orders for his Forests, and Original of Parks.

'That if any Man in his own private Woods killed the King's Deers, he should forfeit his Woods to the King. But he permitted the richer sort to inclose Parks, and gave them an Example first himself, in making one at Woodstock, which was the Original of that Grievance. His Expences were chiefly in Wars, and upon several great Fortifications in Normandy. His Buildings were the Abby of Reading, and the Manour of Woodstock, with the Park belonging to it, which he inclosed with a Stone Wall of seven Miles in Circumference.

His chief Counsellors. Roger Bishop of Sarum.

His most eminent Counsellors were Roger Bishop of Sarum and the Earl of Mallet, both Men of great Experience in the Affairs of the World. Roger was entrusted always as Viceroy, to govern the Kingdom in his absence: He had managed his Money and other Household Affairs, when he was a private Man and a poor Prince, with that Fidelity, that he put him into the greatest Trust when he was a King; which he discharged with Policy, Honesty and Judgment. He had the Title of Justitiarius Angliæ Totius: Of his magnificent and noble Mind we have some Marks in the Remainers of Buildings erected by him, especially in the Devises in Wiltshire, where is the Ruins of a most noble Fabrick, built after the manner of the Romans. He built also the Castles of Malmsbury and Sherburn, two strong and sumptuous Fabricks; he repaired the Castle of Salisbury, and new-wall'd it about, all which he lived to see taken from him and seized into the next King's hand, as things unfit for him either to raise or possess, and are now deformed Heaps of Rubbish. Besides this, he walled in Old Salisbury, and repaired the Church there.

Robert Earl of Mallet was the Son of Roger Beaumont, who of all the great Men that followed William the First in his Civil Wars in Normandy, refused to attend him in his Expedition into England, though he was invited to it with large Promises, saying, 'The Inheritance left him by his Fathers was sufficient to maintain his State at home; and he desired not to thrust himself into other Mens Possessions abroad. But his Son Robert was of another Mind, and had a mighty Estate in England and Normandy. He was a Man of good Judgment, and his Direction in most weighty Affairs of State was always used as most profitable. His Frugality, both in Apparel and Diet, was very exemplary, and much influenced others, being a Man of so great Note: But in the end he fell into Disgrace (the usual Fate of Grandure) being engaged in a Rebellion against his King, and died stripp'd of his Estate.

Besides these, he was served with a Potent and Warlike Nobility, who by his Example were led to further his Designs in France for the Preservation of his Dutchy of Normandy, whither he made his last Voyage in the thirty second Year of his Reign. In his Passage there happened an exceeding great Eclipse of the Sun, which was after interpreted as a Forerunner of his Death, which happened shortly after in the thirty fifth Year of his Reign, and the sixty seventh of his Age. He was of a graceful Personage, quick-sighted, brown Hair, and a close-set Body, wherein was seated a Mind of solid Judgment and well-order'd Affections. He had a Taste of Learning in his Youth, yet not much; but the very Reputation of it made Books in Fashion, and many Learned Men flourished in his time. He had by his Wife Maud the Daughter of Malcolm the third King of Scotland, no other Children but Maud and William; but he is said to have had seven Natural Sons, and as many Daughters, which shews his Incontinency. Two of these Sons was afterward Men of Note, viz. Reynold Earl of Cornwall and Castlecomb, and Robert Earl of Gloucester, a great Champion and Defender of his Sister Maud the Empress. His Daughters were all married to Princes and Noblemen of France and England; and of them, as Writers say, came many Worthy Families.

His Personage.

His Issue.

* Before this time the English Kings order'd National Affairs by their own Edicts, and by the Officers and Governours of Counties; and had seldom any General Assemblies of the People, unless at a Coronation, or in Times of War. Their Parliaments were only Meetings of the Nobility, and Clergy usually.

* He dy'd of a Surfeit of Lampreys at the Castle of Lyons, near Roan in Normandy. His Body was coarsely Embalm'd, being stuff'd with Salt, and wrapp'd up in Ox-Hides; after which 'twas transported to England, and bury'd at Reading. In him the Male-Line of William the Norman was extinct.

* Sir John Hayward says he had twelve illegitimate Children, who were of no great Note or Continuance.

A. D. 1108. was sealed at Wormes, to the Pope's advantage; for the Emperor yielded up his Right to Investitures of Bishops, and other Benefices, to him. The King of England was very much displeased at this Disappointment, but however did not give over his Designs against Lewis, giving the greater support to the Faction in Lewis's Kingdom, especially to Theobald Count of Champagne, who being strengthen'd with his great Alliance to Stephen Earl of Blois, and Fulke Earl of Anjou, was most likely to make the boldest Opposition to the French King. Lewis on the other side endeavour'd as eagerly to undermine Henry's Power in Normandy, and to that end conspir'd with William Earl of Flanders to restore William the Son of Robert Duke of Normandy to his Father's Dominions, to whom by Right the Inheritance belong'd. Many great and bloody Battels were fought between these two Princes, with the expence of much Blood and Treasure; till at length, both being tired with the Fatigues of War, willingly came to conclude a Peace by the Mediation of the Earl of Anjou, whose Daughter William, King Henry's Son, was about to marry; and upon the Consummation of the Peace was made Duke of Normandy, for which he did Homage to Lewis, and marry'd the Duke of Anjou's Daughter; and so France and Flanders became his Friends.

1116. But these Troubles were scarcely blown over, and this happy Conclusion made, but there follow'd such a sad Accident, as turn'd all the prosperous Successes and Joys into Mourning. William, the only Son of Henry, who was but just settled in his Dukedom, a Prince of seventeen Years of Age, going into England a little time after his Father's departure, accompany'd by Richard his bafe Brother, Mary Countess of Perch his natural Sister, Richard Earl of Chester, and his Wife, who was the King's Niece, and many other Persons of Quality, and their Attendants, to the number of an hundred and forty, besides fifty Mariners, setting out at Barbfleet, were all cast away at Sea, only a Butcher escap'd. The Prince had recover'd a Cockboat, and was in possibility of being sav'd; but being mov'd with the lamentable Cries of his Sister, he went back to the sinking Ship to take her in, where so many crowded with her into the Boat to save themselves, that it sank with its Load, and so all perish'd in the Waters. What Reflection this heavy Judgment might cause in the King's Conscience, is hard to know; but certainly it made such Impressions of Grief upon his Mind, that he was never seen to laugh after: And tho' he made all the haste he could to repair the Breach made in the Succession, by marrying Adalicia, a young beautiful Lady, Daughter of the Duke of Lovain, and of the House of Lorrain, yet the Loss prov'd irreparable, for he never could have a Child by her.

His great Confederates went over to the King of France. Fulke Earl of Anjou quarrell'd with him for his Daughter's Dower. Robert de Mallet his chief Counsellor, and a Man of great Trust under him, fell from him, and conspiring with Hugh Earl of Monfort, invaded and seized upon his Dutchy. But such was his great diligence and working Head, that he soon reduced things into a quiet frame. The two Earls he took by surprise, and made them his Prisoners; and Death rescu'd him from the Claims of the Duke of Anjou, who was a considerable Prince, as we may Reg. 25. judge by the King's matching first his Son, and after his only Daughter, then an Empress, into his Family, as we shall presently come to relate. The King of France continu'd his Opposition, and entertain'd William, Son of Robert Courtois, wherein all the danger lay; and first aids him in Person with great power to obtain the Earldom of Flanders, to which he had a fair Title by the defect of Issue in Earl Baldwin, who was slain in a Battel in France against King Henry. But Wil- 1126. liam, as if he had been not only Heir of his Fa- Reg. 27. ther's Dominions, but Misfortunes, being admitted to the Government, miscarry'd in his management of it, was deposed by his People, and at length slain in a Battel by them. And so ended the Family of Robert Courtois.

This Oath was first taken by David King of Scots, Uncle to Maud, and Stephen Earl of Bologne, and Mortain, the King's Nephew, on whom he had bestow'd great Possessions in England, and advanced his Brother to the Bishoprick of Worcester. And to make all secure, he had the same Oath imposed in another Parliament at Northampton. His next Care was to provide Heirs, 1123. and thereupon marry'd her to Jeffrey Plantagenet Reg. 34. Earl of Anjou, by whom he liv'd to see her have two Sons. So that all things now seem'd settled and quiet, but only the King's own Dreams, which were said to be very terrifying, and in which he would rise, take his Sword, and act as if he were to defend himself from some Enemy; which shew'd, that his Conscience was very uneasy and fearful.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Henry I.

IN his 2d Year 1102. Gloucester and Winchester were burnt. In his 4th a Comet appear'd, and four Circles were seen about the Sun. In his 7th another Comet was seen, and on Thursday Night before two, full Moons appear'd, one in the East and the other in the West. In his 10th a third Comet was seen, and an Earthquake happen'd in Shroffshire.

Sir John Hayward, Hist. Hen. I.

In his 11th Year the River Trent, near Nottingham, ceas'd to run its Course for four and twenty Hours, and so long the Channel was dry'd up. Hol. There was this Year a great Mortality of Men, a Murrain among Cattle, both Domestick and of the Field; the Fowls also perish'd in Abundance. In his thirteenth Year Worcester City, the Church, Castle, and many Citizens were burnt. A Pig was farrow'd with a Facelike a Child, and the Water of the River Medway fail'd so much for many Miles in the midst of the Channel, that the smallest Boats could not float, and the Thames was so low between the Tower and the Bridge, that many Men, Women and Children, waded it over a foot; which was occasion'd, says our Author Sir John Hayward, by reason of a great Ebb in the Ocean, that laid the Sands bare several Miles from the Shoar, which continu'd so a whole day. The City and chief Monastery of Chichester were burnt, and there was much Rage and Violence of Weather with a Comet. Holinshead adds, that the Comet appear'd in a strange manner; it rose in the East, and when it was advanc'd near the Mid-Heavens it kept not its Course forward, but seem'd to go backward, as if it had been retrograde; in December the Air appear'd red, as tho' it had burn'd. Most of these Accidents he places under the next Year, during which, almost all the Bridges in England being then built with Timber, were broken down by the Ice when it thaw'd after a severe Frost. In his 16th Year, on the 1st of November, there fell a prodigious Storm of Hail, accompany'd with unusual Claps of Thunder and Blasts of Lightning. In December a great Earthquake happen'd, and the Colour of the Moon was chang'd into that of Blood. Holinshead.

In his 17th Year the Cities of Bath and Peterborough were burnt. In his 20th Year there was an Earthquake in September. In his 22d the City of Gloucester was burnt, and Lincoln the Year following. In his 30th Year Rochester was almost destroy'd by Fire, and London in his thirty second. In the Year before he dy'd, being the 34th of his Reign, on the 2d of August, just as he was about to take Ship and sail to Normandy, an Eclipse of the Sun and Moon appear'd, at which time William of Malmfbury, who was then living, writes that he saw the Stars plainly about the Sun. This Eclipse was follow'd by a terrible Earthquake: In which the same Author relates, the House wherein he sat was lifted up with a double remove, and at the third time settled again in the proper Place. Sir John Hayward.

Holinshead tells us, 'twas the House in which the King sat; he adds, that Flames of Fire burst out of certain Rifs of the Earth with such Violence, that they could not be quench'd by Water or otherwise.

In this Reign, Anno 1109. the Bishoprick of Ely was founded. The first Bishop of the Diocess being Harvey, Bishop of Bangor. About this time the Marriage of Priests was strictly forbidden in England, by a Synod at Westminster, in which Anselm Arch-bishop of Canterbury presided; it had been disallow'd in a former Synod, Anno 1102. The Pope's Power was very low in England in the Reign of Hen. I. In whose time

THE Male-Issue of the Norman Line being extinct, and only a Daughter remaining, who was marry'd to a Frenchman, Stephen Earl of Bologne and Mortagne, Son of Stephen Earl of Blois, and Adela the Daughter of William I. was elected by the general consent of the Kingdom, and within thirty days* after Henry's death crown'd King at Westminster by William Corbell Archbishop of Canterbury. The chief of the Peers and Bishops had engaged themselves by Oath to accept Maud for their Queen after Henry's decease; but when he was dead, and the Awe of his Power and Greatness removed, they found out many<sup>b</sup> shifts to evade their Oath, tho' none strong enough to save them from Perjury. The Archbishop of Canterbury boldly alledg'd, (tho' he had first sworn to the Succession of Maud) That it was not fit that so many and great Peers should be subject to a Woman; which others of his Party form'd into a Reason, That it not being a Custom in any Christian Kingdom, whose Kings are anointed, to admit Women to inherit the Crown, it was an unlawful Oath, and therefore had no obligation. Roger Bishop of Salisbury, one of the principal Men then in Counsel, gave this Reason why they were discharg'd from their Oath, That the King had marry'd his Daughter out of the Realm, without their consent, and therefore they were not bound to receive her. His Right of Succession was not pretended: Because indeed he had no Right that way, having an Elder Brother, Theobald Earl of Blois, and there being others whose Claim by Descent was before him, particularly Maud's two Sons, if she herself were rejected for their slight Reasons. But the main thing that prevail'd at that time to make Stephen King was this: That he was a Man, and had very great Possessions both in England and France; his elder Brother was a Prince of great Power, being Earl of Blois; and his younger Brother Bishop of Winchester, the Pope's Legate in England, and of very great Interest with the Nobility, who at that time were chiefly guided by the Clergy. Besides, Stephen himself was of a very comely and graceful Personage, very affable and courteous, of admirable Courage and Activity, which recommended him much to the Nobility. These A. D. Reasons drawn from Interest abroad and at home, 1035. being back'd partly with the Bishop of Winchester's Persuasions and Friendship, and partly with the Consideration, that by preferring one to the Crown whose Title was weak, they might better secure their ancient Liberties, than by any Person that should come to it by a lineal Succession, made them elect Stephen to be their King: And to secure themselves of him, they caused him to take a private Oath before the Bishop of Canterbury to confirm the ancient Liberties of the Church, and obliged his Brother to undertake for the performance of his solemn Promise made thus to them in the Presence of God<sup>c</sup>.

Stephen being thus got into the possession of the English Government, and so made Master of all the Treasure which his Uncle had gather'd in many Years, which was the Sum of 100000<sup>d</sup> l. of ready Cash, besides Plate and Jewels of inestimable value, after the Interment of Henry at Reading, call'd a Parliament, which assembled at Oxford, and therein restor'd the Clergy to all their former Liberties, and freed the Laity of all their Tributes, and other Grievances of which they complain'd; and confirming these Grants by his Charter, he took an Oath in the presence of the whole Assembly to observe them. Whereupon the Bishops and Peers swore Fealty to him, on this Condition, That he observed the Tenure of this Charter.

And first after his Settlement in his Kingdom, He prepares for his own defence; being sensible, for his defence, and that what he had gotten could not be held long by the Sword. And for this end he first gives a liberty to all Persons that would to build Castles upon their own Land, to secure themselves and the Nation from any Invasion, which in a peaceable and unanimous Reign had been a good piece of Policy, but in a factious time, as it happen'd, was indeed dangerous to the Kingly Power, as he after found: Then, because he knew nothing would be a greater security to him than firm Friends, he made all he could by creating new Lords, giving several Persons large Estates, and sparing no Cost to make his Subjects of greatest Interests faithful to him. Two ways he expected

<sup>b</sup> These Evasions and Shifts were ridiculous to the more considering part of the Nation, tho' they serv'd the turn of the Politicians themselves: Wherefore there was another more plausible Reason given. Hugh Bigod, who came over with Stephen, and had been Steward to the late King Henry, depos'd before the Nobility and States, That King Henry upon his Death-Bed did give the Kingdom of England to his Nephew Stephen, because his Daughter Maud had by her undutiful Behaviour alienated the Affections of the King from her. And this is said to have generally prevail'd for Stephen's Establishment.

A. D. 1136. Disturbance to his Government, viz. from Scotland and France. David King of Scots began the Quarrel: He took himself oblig'd to restore his Niece the Empress Maud to her Right, not only upon the account of his near Relation to her, but the Oath he had taken in Henry's Days, and therefore first invades Stephen's Dominions. But Stephen, as if he had been prepared against all Opposition, was presently with him with a strong Army; which so deterr'd the Scots, that they came to a Composition with him to return home upon the Restitution of Cumberland to their King, and the Earldoms of Northumberland and Huntingdon to Prince Henry, the King of Scots Son, to whom in Right of his Mother Maud, the Daughter of Waltheof Earl of both, they belonged; which Stephen granting, a Peace was patch'd up for the present. Henry did Fealty to the King of England for his two Earldoms, and so they departed. At the King's return home, he met with a Revolt from some of his Nobility, of whom Baldwin de Redvers<sup>a</sup> was the Head, and the Welsh were very troublesome on the Borders. These Motions cost the King some time to allay, and were scarcely well appeased, but a new Occasion reviv'd them again: For King Stephen, with the violent Toils of War, fell very dangerously sick; so that it was reported he was dead, by which means his Friends began to fly from him and provide another Master, and his Enemies both at home and abroad to seize upon his Dominions. Hugh Bigott fortified himself in the Castle of Norwich, the Welsh plunder'd the Neighbouring English, the Earl of Anjou did also take this Opportunity to seize on his Wife's Right, and took certain Parts of Normandy, and made his Kingdom waver. Thus was his first Year spent in nothing but Battels, Invasions and Revolts, a sad Presage of the distracted and troublesome Reign he should have over an ill-gotten Kingdom, and a faithless People.

1137. Reg. 2. Stephen conquer'd the Earl of Anjou, and subdued his home Enemies. The King after some time recover'd, and to make the World know he was alive, pass'd immediately with his Forces into Normandy, and in a pitch'd Battel overcame the Earl of Anjou; but yet that he might secure himself from future Pretensions, he came to an Agreement with him, That upon his renouncing Maud's Claim to his Kingdom he would pay him five thousand Marks per Annum, and then made his Son Eustace Duke of Normandy, causing him to do Homage to the French King Lewis VII. for it, that thereby he might secure his Friendship. Theobald Earl of Blois, the King's eldest Brother, envying Stephen's Greatness, began to put in his Claim for his Possessions; which tho' Stephen little valued, yet to pacifie him, he agreed to allow him two thousand Marks per Annum. When the King had settled Affairs thus in Normandy, he returned again into England, and found the Scots at work again to disturb his Dominions; which while he was busied to defend, a strong Conspiracy against him broke out in the Body of his Realm. Robert Earl of Gloucester, base Son to Henry the First, a Man of great Spirit, indefatigable Industry, and great Judgment, surpriz'd the Castle of Bristol, and held it out against the King; and so in other Parts of the Kingdom did William Talbot the Castle of Hereford, Paynel the Castle of Ludlow, Lovel that of Cary, Moon that of Dunster, and many others<sup>b</sup>. The King counting an inward Enemy most dangerous, left the Prosecution of the War with the Scots to Thurstan Arch-bishop of York, as his Lieutenant; Walter Earl of Armarle, William Peverell Earl of Nottingham, Walter and Gilbert Lacys, brave and valiant Commanders, and goes himself well attended to repress the Conspirators, which he did in one Expedition, and forced the Earl of Gloucester to fly to his Sister in Anjou. Nor had his Forces in the North less Success against the Scots, whom they routed and put to flight; and so Stephen, as Fortune's Favourite, was become victorious over all his apparent Enemies.

Stephen having now gotten a little respite from his Enemies, began to consult with himself how he might ease himself of such troublesome Contests with his Subjects; and because he now found, that the Castles he had permitted his Nobility to build, were the greatest Impediments of his Peace at home, and the readiest Harbour of Rebels, he resolv'd to forbid that any should be built hereafter, and demolish some of the most dangerous lately erected; and to this end, call'd a great Council at Oxford. Here some of his Lords, who much envy'd the magnificent and stately Castles erected by the Clergy (whose Buildings both in Number and Strength much excelled those of the Nobility) but especially by the Bishop of Salisbury, who had built several great Castles at Salisbury, the Devises, Shyrburn, Malmesbury and Newarke; whisper'd into the King's Ear, who was very jealous and suspicious of such Designs, That these Fortresses were intended for the Reception of the Empress Maud and her Party; and by their Surmises so wrought upon the King's Fears, that he sent for the Bishop of Salisbury to Oxford. The Bishop foreseeing the Danger impending, would have excus'd himself from his Attendance upon the King, by reason of his great Age; but that Plea would not be allow'd, he must go. The Bishop therefore taking with him his Nephews Alexander Bishop of Lincoln, and Nigel Bishop of Ely, with a Retinue of well arm'd Men, went to Oxford; where at his first coming his Servants going to take them up Lodgings, happen'd into a Quarrel with the Servants of the Earl of Britain and kill'd one of them in the Fray, the Nephew of the Earl being dangerously wounded. This being brought to the King's Ears he calls for the Bishop, and demands Satisfaction for the Breach of Peace made by his Servants in his Court, which was this, That he should immediately yield up the Keys of all his Castles to him, as Pledges of his Fidelity. The Bishop refused to do it; whereupon he commanded the Bishops of Salisbury and Lincoln to be seiz'd upon, and kept under a Guard. The Bishop of Ely had made his escape, and got into the Castle of the Devises. The King presently took into his hands by force the Castles of Salisbury, Shyrburn, and Malmesbury; and after three days assault, that of the Devises was surrender'd to him, whither he sent the two Bishops Prisoners, and seiz'd the Bishop of Salisbury's Treasure, which amounted to forty thousand Marks.

This Action of the King's being something arbitrary, and very unusual, was censur'd variously by the People of that time; some justified it, and pleaded, 'That the King had done very well in seizing upon those Castles: For 'tis very unfit, yea, it is against the Canons of the

<sup>b</sup> William of Malmesbury relates, That when King Stephen heard of the Revolt of these Lords, he said, Since they have chosen me their King, Why do they now forsake me? By the Birth of God (his usual Oath) I'll never be call'd an Abdicated King; his words are Rex Ejectus.

A. D. 1139. Reg. 5. Church, that the Clergy who are Men of Religion, and should make it their whole business to promote Peace, should build Castles for War, especially with Prejudice to the King and his Realm. But the Bishop of Winchester, the Pope's Legate, being more zealous for his Function than his Brother, made a resolute Opposition to it; saying, That if the Bishops had done amiss, they ought to have been judged not by the King, but by the Canons of the Church; and that they could not lawfully be deprived of their Estates and Possessions, but by a General Council: That the King had not done this out of any Zeal for Justice, but for his own private ends, taking away those Castles which were built upon the Lands, and at the Charge of the Church, to put them into the hands of Laymen who were not well affected to Religion. And therefore, that this Controversie might be examin'd by the Canons, he appointed a Council to be summon'd to sit at Winchester, and gave the King himself a Citation to appear at it. When the Bishops and Clergy were met, the Bishop of Winchester read first the Commission of his Legatine Power given him by Pope Innocent, and then in a Speech to the Assembly, shewed the great Indignity offer'd to the Church by imprisoning those Bishops, calling it an unjust and shameful Action in the King; who suffer'd himself to be led by ill Ministers to do so great a piece of Injustice, a Violence against God, to despoil the Church of its Revenues and Possessions: And tells them, That since the King would yield to no Admonition, he had called them together in Council, to consult what was to be done; and that for his part, neither the Love of the King, though he was his Brother, nor the Loss of his Preferments, nor Danger of his Life, should discourage him from putting in Execution what they should decree. As soon as the Council was thus settled, the King standing upon the Defence of the Fact, sent certain Earls to them to know why he was summon'd thither. The Legate in mild Terms told them, 'That the King being subject to the Faith of Christ, ought not to take it ill if he were called to give an Account by Christ's Ministers of such an Action, as none but Infidels would be guilty of, to imprison Bishops and deprive them of their Possessions; and that he ought to give an Account of his Action, and undergo a Canonical Judgment in respect to the Church, who had advanc'd him to the Crown; which if he would do, their Determination by the Help of God should be such, as neither the Roman Church, King of France, nor Earl Theobald their Brother should dislike. This Answer the Earls, who were attended by one Alberic de Ver, an experienc'd Lawyer*, brought to the King, and were again dispatch'd back with this Reply from the King, which Alberic deliver'd to them in these Words; 'That Roger Bishop of Salisbury had done many Injuries to the King; That he seldom came to Court; That his Servants, presuming upon his Power, had affronted the Nephew, and misused the Servants of the Earl of Britain, and Harvi de Lyons, a great Nobleman, both Strangers, to the Disgrace of the King and Discredit of the Realm; That the Bishop of Lincoln, out of Hatred to the Earl of Britain, had encourag'd this Sedition; That the Bishop of Salisbury privately favoured the King's Enemies, as the King found by many Circumstances, particularly because he deny'd

Quarters to the King's Forces in Malmesbury, A. D. 1139. and was generally looked upon as such a Friend to the Empress, that if she came he would resign his Castles to her; That the King did not arrest the Bishop as a Clergy-man, but as his Servant and Receiver of his Revenues; That the King took not his Castles from him by force, but the Bishop resign'd them to avoid the Calumny of a Tumult raised in his Court; That if the King found any Treasure in the Castles, he looked upon it as deliver'd to him with them, through Fear for his Offences; That the Covenants between the King and Bishop were ratified in the Presence of several Witnesses. To this Roger answer'd, That he was never any Servant to the King, nor ever receiv'd any of his Moneys, and threaten'd that if he could not have Justice done him by this Council, he would bring it to an higher Court. The Legate kept to his Moderation, and replied, 'That these Allegations against the Bishops ought first to be examin'd in a Council, whether they were true or no, before Sentence had been given against them; and therefore the King ought (as is necessary in all judicial Tryals) to revert the Bishops in their former Estates, otherwise by the Law of Nations being disseised, they are not oblig'd to hold Plea. After a long Debate in the Council concerning this Cause, it was (upon a Motion) put off till the next day, that the Arch-bishop of Roan, who was to act on the King's Part might be present, who deliver'd his Opinion thus; 'That if the Bishop could prove by the Canons that they ought to have Castles, they should hold them; but if not, they did ill to contend so eagerly for them. And were it so, yet in suspicious Times they ought according to the manner of other Nations, to deliver up the Keys of all Fortresses to the King's Pleasure, who is to protect all. But if it belongs not to the Clergy to have Castles, and if it were by the King's Indulgence permitted, they ought to deliver him the Keys. Alberic the Lawyer added, 'That the King had been informed, that the Bishops were sending some Persons to Rome against him: But he said, that he charg'd them not to presume to do so lest he prevented their return. These Speeches put a stop to the Councils Proceedings, and caused the Bishops to break up within a few days without bringing the Matter to any Conclusion. The Bishops dare not excommunicate the King without the Pope's Consent, which if they had gotten they feared the Sword: Wherefore the Legate and Arch-bishop took another way of dealing with the King, viz. by Entreaties and Prayers, falling at his Feet in his Chamber, and begging of him, That he would in Commiseration to the Church and his own Soul, as well as his Reputation, compose this Dissention between the Kingdom and the Church. The King gave them a mild Answer, but would not part with any thing he had gotten. Shortly after these things, the Bishop of Salisbury died through Grief, unpitied; for he was a Man (in his latter Times) guilty of much Corruption, and of insatiable Avarice; and though the King had been so kind and bountiful to him, as not only to prefer two of his Nephews, the one to be his Chancellor and the other his Treasurer; but to say, The Bishop should be weary of asking before he would be of granting, though he gave him half his Kingdom, yet he was deservedly suspected of favouring Maud, and had brought over all the Clergy; yea, and the Bishop of Win-

Reg. 5. This Contest between the King and the Church, tho' the King seem'd perfectly Master, yet in the end prov'd fatal to him: For it open'd a Gap to let Maud the Empress into the Kingdom, who by the conduct of the Earl of Glocester was convey'd into the Castle of Arundel, with a Train of no more than 150 Men, and had a Party raised by the said Earl through all the Country, as far as Glocester, without any opposition; so great a Disaffection was then among all sorts to the King by this Quarrel with the Bishops. The King indeed wanted not his wonted Activity in pursuing his Enemies, and to that end advanced towards the Empress upon the first News; but she swearing to him, that she came with no ill design into his Kingdom, but that all that belong'd to her should behave themselves orderly, and pay their due Allegiance to him; the King, too credulous, was so satisfy'd, that he caused her to be convey'd by the Legate himself in an honourable manner to Bristol, where she was received with great respect; and continu'd so long, till by her Friends and her own courteous Visits and Behaviour, she had gotten an huge Party for her in the Nation; and from thence, when things were ripe for her design, convey'd her self into Wallingford-Castle, and began to put forth her Claim to Stephen's Kingdom. Stephen delay'd not to retrieve his sinking Fortunes, by laying Siege to it; but seeing so many Enemies start up on every side, he thought all Opposition would be in vain, and therefore sent his Brother the Legate, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, to Bath to treat about an agreement with her, but nothing was effected, and so both sides return'd to make good their Parties. The King seeks to recover what he had lost, and the Empress to get more. The King immediately takes his way into the North, to keep the Scots from entering in to assist her, and secure those parts. The Earl of Chester, who had marry'd one of Glocester's Daughters, was in Possession of the Castle of Lincoln; and tho' he had not declared himself against the King, yet the King not thinking it safe in his hands, besieg'd it. The Earl finding himself over-power'd made his escape out of the Castle, and went to his Father-in-Law for assistance. The Earl of Glocester undertakes to raise the Siege, and marches towards the King with a great Army of Welshmen and others, under his own, and Hugh Bygod, and Robert de Morley's command. The King at their approach was ready to engage them; and after their Armies were put in order, and the Captains had encourag'd their Men on both sides, there began a fore Battel, which held long dubious, till at length Stephen's gave back, and he himself being deserted of all, and after long fighting left without Weapon to defend himself, was taken, presented to the Empress, and by her put into the Castle of Bristol; but kept in an honourable manner, till his attempts to escape laid Fetters upon him.

Maud accepted as Queen by the Bishop of Winchester, and crown'd.

Maud the Empress having the King in her power, and the Kingdom (as she imagin'd) at her command, takes upon her the Majesty of Queen of England, and by all winning methods endeavours to bring the Legate to admit her to the Kingdom, as Daughter and Heir of the late King, to whom the Realm had taken an Oath to accept her for their Sovereign in the Succession; and so prevail'd, that a Parley was granted upon a Plain near Winchester, where, after the Empress had sworn to the Legate, That all the grand Affairs of the Nation, and especially the Donation of all Bishopricks and Abbies, should be wholly in his disposal, if he (with the Church) would receive her as Queen of England, and pay her faithful Allegiance, as her Brother Robert Earl of Glocester, and Brian his Son, Marquiss of Wallingford, Milo of Glocester (after Earl of Hereford) with many others, on her part had sworn to do. The Bishop with some few others received her readily as Queen (tho' she never came in general so to be acknowledged) and took an Oath of Fidelity to her, promising to keep his Oath so long as she broke not her Covenant; and the next day was led with solemn Procession into the Bishop's Church at Winchester, by the Legate on the right hand, and Bernard Bishop of St. David's on the left, and in the presence of many other Bishops, as Alexander Bishop of Lincoln, Nigel Bishop of Ely, Robert Bishop of Bath, and Robert Bishop of Worcester, and many Abbots, had the Crown deliver'd to her. Within a few days after came down the Archbishop of Canterbury, Theobald, to the Empress, being united by the Legate, but would not do Fealty to her, as being a thing unworthy of his Person and Place, until he had conferr'd first with the King; which being obtain'd, he with several Bishops and Laymen went to the King to Bristol. In the mean time the Council broke up, and the Empress went to Oxford, her own City, to keep her Easter. Soon after Easter a Council of the Clergy was summon'd to meet at Winchester, where the first day the Legate had a private Conference with every Bishop severally, and afterward with every Abbot, and other Persons that were to sit in the Council. At the opening of the Council the Legate made a Speech, shewing them, 'That the end of their Meeting was to consult for the Peace of their Country, which through the struggling of two Parties was in apparent danger of Ruine. How flourishing the Kingdom was under the Reign of his Uncle Henry, who, to secure the Peace and Happiness of the Kingdom, had sworn both England and Normandy to continue his Daughter Maud in the Succession: That after his decease, his Daughter being in Normandy, and delaying to come over, it was thought necessary for the preservation of the Peace of the Country to make his Brother King, upon his own becoming Surety, that he should defend the Church, and settle good Laws. That his Brother having abused his Trust, and ill managed his Government, (which it griev'd him to think of, and repeat) in imprisoning the Bishops, seizing on their Possessions, and by many other publick Misdemeanours; God had shew'd his Judgments upon him, and let him fall into the hands of his Enemies; and tho' he could not but love his Brother, yet he must espouse the Cause of the Immortal God. That therefore the Nation at this juncture might not be without a Governour, he had called them together, by the Virtue of his Legantine Power, to elect and ordain a Prince, because this Privilege belongs of right to the Clergy. And therefore, having invoked the divine Aid, we

When all that were present had either openly given their Voice for her, or by their silence not contradicted it, the Legate added, 'That the Londoners, who in respect of the greatness of their City, were to be accounted among the chief Men of the Nation, were summoned, and he hoped would be present in the Council to morrow. The Londoners according to their Summons came, and being brought into the Council, said, 'That they were sent from the Commonalty of London, not to foment this civil Quarrel now on foot, but to beg that their King might be freed from Captivity. And with them did all the Barons in their Liberties joyn, earnestly petitioning the same of my Lord Legate, and all the Clergy there assembled. The Legate answer'd them at large, and verily loftily, as he did the day before, 'That the Londoners ought not to side with them who had deserted their King in the Battel, by which advice the Church had been dishonour'd, and who favour'd the Londoners only for their own gain. As soon as this Answer was given, one of Queen Maud's (King Stephen's Consort) Chaplains stood up, and deliver'd a Letter to the Legate, who having read it to himself, said aloud, 'That it was not fit it should be read publicly in an Assembly of so many Reverend and Religious Persons, because it contain'd Matters very blame-worthy. The Chaplain hearing this, and seeing the disappointment of the Queen's design, like a faithful and zealous Servant, stood up and boldly read the Letter himself, which was to this effect: 'That the Queen earnestly entreated the Clergy there assembled, and particularly the Bishop of Winchester, the Brother of her Lord, to restore him to his Kingdom, whom wicked Men, who were his Subjects, detain'd in Prison. To this the Legate answer'd as he had done to the Londoners; and the Council was so far from yielding to her Request, that many of the King's Party were excommunicated by them, and particularly William Martell, a chief Man with the King, who had displeased the Legate; and then the Council brake up. This Election had such an influence upon the Nation, that the greatest part submitted to the Empress Maud, and she seem'd in a fair way to become Mistress of the whole; her Brother Robert employing all his diligence and care in reforming Justice, restoring the Laws of England, promising a release of Taxes, and doing whatsoever he knew would please, and win the People to Obedience; and the Legate seconded him.

Maud's Pride destroys her Interest with the English.

But Maud's Interest was not so much promoted by her Friends among the People, as it was weaken'd by her own haughty and proud Carriage to her Subjects. The Londoners, who hoped to obtain whatever they begg'd of their new Queen, petition'd that the rigorous Laws of her Father might be abrogated, and King Edward's restored, but were deny'd with some sharpness: Whereupon they fell immediately to the King's side, (which in their Hearts they most affected) inveigh'd openly against her, and conspir'd to surprize her in their City; but she having had timely notice of it, made her escape (with David King of Scots, who came to visit her, and her Brother Robert) and got to Oxford, which was always true to her. The Legate himself also being deny'd his Request for his Nephew Eustace, that he might enjoy his Earldoms of Bolloigne and Morraigne in Normandy, began to slacken his Affections to her, in which disgust Queen Maud, finding an opportunity to address her self to him, wrought upon him by her Tears and Intreaties, with Promises of the King's Reformation, that she brought him to pity his Condition, and act like a Brother; and to absolve those of the King's Party, which he had lately excommunicated. The Earl of Glocester observing this sudden Change in the Empress's Affairs, bestirs himself all he could to recover the Legate's Affections to her; and to that end settles her in the Castle of Winchester with her Guards, from whence she sends for the Legate to come to her, but he first delay'd, and then openly deny'd. The Empress, much amaz'd at this Answer, call'd a Council of her best Friends about her, to advise what to do; but in the mean time, by the Legate's Information and Order, who was fled to her, Queen Maud, and the Lords of her Party, encompass the Town, and shut up all Conveyances of Provision to it: So that at last, after six weeks Siege, the Earl of Glocester was forced to remove the Empress to the Castle of the Devises; in which dangerous attempt, tho' she got safe away, yet the Earl himself was taken, and brought to Queen Maud, who rejoiced in nothing so much, as that she had now a Prisoner, who might, in the Empress's opinion, balance an Exchange for her Lord; which accordingly she caus'd immediately to be propounded, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Legate being to be Prisoners till Robert was released. The Earl himself would not consent to the King's Release to gain his own Freedom; but at length, being persuaded by his Sister, he yielded to it: And Stephen being dismiss'd from his Imprisonment, left his Queen and Son Eustace Pledges, till Robert was also releas'd; which was done upon the King's coming to Winchester, where he was solicited by the King with all promises of Preferment and Honour to forsake the Empress's Party; but when nothing would prevail, he was safely sent back to her; and so both Parties began afresh to renew their Quarrel with their restor'd Captains.

The Earl of Glocester taken Prisoner, and exchange'd for the King.

Soon after this great Change of Affairs, the Legate calls a Council at London, where the Pope's Letters, written to him in answer to the Briefs of both Parties sent to him a little before, were read openly; in which the Pope reproved him (tho' mildly) for his neglect in procuring his Brother's Release, and exhorts him to obtain his Liberty by all means Civil and Ecclesiastical. The King himself came to this Council, and complain'd, 'That his Subjects, to whom he had never deny'd Justice, had taken him, and by their reproachful and cruel usage almost destroy'd him. The Legate with great Eloquence labour'd to excuse his own Actions, alledging, 'That he did not voluntarily accept the Empress, but through meer Compulsion and Fear; because upon the King's overthrow, while the Lords were either fled, or waited in suspense for the Event, she and her Party came upon the City of Winchester, and besieged it: 'That whatever Agreements he had made for the benefit of the Church, she had broken: That he was certainly inform'd, that she and her Party had conspir'd against his Life and Dignity. But God in his Mercy had so order'd Affairs, contrary to her Desires and Intentions, that he had escaped her Attempts, and his Brother was deliver'd out of her hands. And therefore he, in the Name of God and the Pope, requir'd them with all their Power to assist the King, who was anointed by the consent of the People and Apostolick See, and to excommunicate all such as disturb'd the Peace, and were found Favourers of the Countess of Anjou. A. D. 1141. Legate's, the Empress's Agent, who was present in the Council, made a bold Reply, charging the Legate to his Face, 'That he had given his Faith to the Empress: That he would pass no Act there prejudicial to her Honour: That he had sworn to her, that he would never aid his Brother with above twenty Soldiers: That her coming into England was occasion'd by his Letters, by which he often solicited her to it: That he was the chief cause, that the King was taken and kept Prisoner. These, and many more Reflections upon the Legate, did the Agent make; but the Legate seem'd not at all concern'd, nor would make any reply to them.

1142. Some few Months after the Enlargement of the King, both sides remain'd without Action, but yet employ'd in contriving how to bring about their Designs most effectually and speedily. The Empress remaining at the Castle of the Devises, resolves by the advice of her Council to send over her Brother into Normandy to solicit her Husband the Earl of Anjou to assist her with what Forces he was able. And the Earl, the better to secure her in his absence, settled her in the Castle of Oxford, which was well fortify'd against all Assaults, and takes with him the Sons of the chief Noblemen that were about her, as Pledges of their Fidelity to her. Stephen having notice of this design, endeavours to stop his Passage; but not being able to do that, laid Siege to the Castle of Oxford as soon as he was gone, which held him employ'd till the Earl return'd. Jeffrey Earl of Anjou, being desirous rather to have Normandy (of which he had gotten the greatest part, and was in great hopes of the rest) than to adventure for England, refused to go over in Person, but sends a small Army under his Son Henry's command, who was then but eleven Years old, that he might be acquainted with England, and be shew'd to the People, to try whether his Personal Presence would move them to the Consideration of his Right, which prov'd more serviceable than an Army. The Earl of Gloucester being safely arriv'd with the young Prince, went towards Oxford; but the Empress had made her escape from thence in disguise, and was got to Wallingford, where she met her Son and Brother with great satisfaction.

The Empress solicits her Husband for Aid, and Henry her Son sent into England.

1143. King Stephen in the mean time takes Oxford Castle, and hearing that his Enemy had received fresh Supplies from Anjou, endeavours to make all the Friends he could to increase his Power; but Money failing him, his Interest sunk, especially with his mercenary Lords, and others, which he had in great numbers out of Flanders, who fell to rifling Abbies, to the great dishonour of the King. But the King's Party did not only fail him, but also the Empress's: The Earl of Gloucester, the chief support of her Title, dy'd within two Years after his return to England, and shortly after Milo Earl of Hereford; which so discourag'd the Empress, that she sent her Son away into Anjou, and not long after follow'd her self, being tired with the Bickerings and Contests of Parties, and leaving her Friends to defend what she had gotten in England. But Henry being advanced now a little in Years, (viz. sixteen Years old) and able to undergo the Fatigues of War, was impatient of a stay in his Father's Court, when he had some hopes of one of his own in England; and therefore went into England again with an Army of choice Soldiers, got into the North, where David King of Scots his Uncle, who had been put into Possession of Northumberland by the Empress, was ready to joyn 1146. him. Stephen, hearing of his arrival, follows him with an Army to York, to secure that City, and hinder his Return; but tho' the first Motions of both sides seem'd brave and adventurous, yet French-like, their Courage cool'd, and nothing was done by either side; Stephen returning home, and Henry not long after into Flanders, where he met that Fortune which set him on the English Throne.

1149. Henry was scarcely arriv'd in Flanders, but his Father-in-Law Jeffrey Duke of Anjou and Normandy dies, and leaves him Heir of both those Dukedoms: Of which Dignity he had not been long possessed, but that he marry'd Eleanor, the only Daughter and Heir of William Duke of Guien, by whom he had the Possession of those large and rich Countries belonging to the Duchy of Guien, and Earldom of Poitou. She had been the Wife of Lewis VII. King of France, and was with him in the Holy Wars; but being there accused to him of wanton and lascivious Behaviour, he divorced her upon his return, and sent her to her Friends with her whole Portion. But Henry considering how great an Addition her Patrimony would be to his Power, and how much her Treasure would help forward his Designs, overlook'd the French King's Suspicions, and marry'd her. This Match enraged Lewis, because he had made himself a formidable Enemy; and therefore to crush him in time, joyns with Stephen, and assists his Son Eustace (to whom he marry'd his Daughter Constance) to recover Normandy, of which he had been possessed before his Father's Troubles; Stephen in the mean time recovering what he could from Maud's party in England. Henry being furnish'd now with a sufficient Power for his own defence, left his Friends in England to shift for themselves awhile, and defends Normandy; which he did so well, that the King of France was forced to leave him; and Eustace returning into England, dy'd shortly after, being about eighteen Years of Age, and was bury'd at Feversham; a Youth, tho' born to a Kingdom, yet he never lived to see any thing but the Calamities of it. In the time that Henry was busied thus in Normandy, Stephen had gotten ground, and set down before Wallingford, a place of great importance, and almost impregnable, which yet he reduced to such Extremities, that the Defendants were forced to send for Duke Henry to relieve them, who immediately, tho' in the midst of Winter, came over to them with 3000 Foot, and 140 Horse; and to draw the King from Wallingford, lays Siege to Malmesbury, and had most of the great Men of the West, and other parts, come in to him. Stephen much overmatching his Enemy with Numbers, resolv'd to put his Fortune upon the Tryal of a Battel; but the Armies being kept asunder by the great Floods which then happen'd for some time: The Bishops, fearful of the success, as knowing that it would be very prejudicial for the whole State, and especially for them, to have a young Prince come in to rule with the Sword, mediated with them, and obtained a Peace, which was concluded at Winchester upon these Conditions.

¶ Possessions

A. D. 1153. Possessions all Estates belonging to the Crown, which had been either alienated by himself, or were usurped by others in his time; and that such Inheritance as had been unjustly taken from the right Owners since King Henry's time should be restored to them.

4. That all the Castles which had been built by Stephen's Permission (which were 1117) should be demolished.

There is a Charter of this Agreement in our Annals, which hath other Articles of Reservation for the Estates of particular Persons; as, for William, King Stephen's second Son, that he should enjoy all that his Father was possessed of before he was King of England; and for many other Persons of Note.

A Peace being thus settled in England, Henry returns into Normandy, and there concludes a Peace with the King of France, at the Expence of twenty thousand Marks. Stephen also betook himself wholly to repair the Ruins of the State, made a Progress into most parts of his Kingdom, to reform such Irregularities as had arisen by long War; and after his return call'd a Parliament at London, to consult about the good of the Nation, and proper methods for establishing of it. After the Parliament broke up, he went to Dover to meet the Earl of Flanders, who desired a Conference with him; and immediately after his return, fell sick, and dy'd within a few days, and was bury'd in the Abby he founded at Feversham, with the unfortunate Prince his Son, when he had Reign'd eighteen Years and ten Months.

He was a Person so continually engag'd in War-like Affairs, that it is not possible to give his full Character, whom the World never knew in Peace. He was certainly a very valiant Prince and excellent Soldier, and wanted nothing but a clear Title to have made him one of the best of Princes. What his Government would have been in Peace, may be conjectured by a few Instances: He kept his Promise made to the States at his admission to the Throne, concerning the Release of their Taxes, and never had one Tax (so far as can be found) in his Reign. He was so mild and merciful to his Subjects, that tho' there were many Revolts and Rebellions against him, yet he never put any great Man to Death. And it is very observable, that tho' his Reign was full of Wars, yet there were more Abbies built in his time, than had been in an hundred Years before; which shews, that tho' his Times were troublesome, they were not Irreligious and Atheistical.

He had by Maud his Wife, the Daughter of Euface Earl of Bolloigne, three Sons and two Daughters: Only one Son, viz. William Earl of Bolloigne, Surrey, and Mortaine; and one Daughter, viz. Mary, a Nun and Abbess of the Nunnery of Rumsey in Hampshire*, surviv'd the King. He had two Natural Sons, William, and Gervase made by the King Abbot of Westminster, which place he enjoy'd twenty Years†.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of King Stephen.

ON the very day that he landed in England to put in for the Crown, as an Omen of his troublesome Reign, there happen'd a mighty Tempest of Thunder, (horrible to hear) and terrible Blasts of Lightning, which falling out in the Winter-season was the more taken notice of.

In the 12th Year of his Reign the Jews at Norwich crucify'd a Christian Child.

In his 14th Year there fell so much Rain in the Summer-season, that it spoil'd the Corn; and a Famine follow'd it. On the 9th of December it began to freeze, and the Frost held till the 9th of February; in which time the Passage over the Thames for Man and Horse was on the Ice. In this Reign there were built no fewer than 1115 Castles, which were to be demolish'd by the Articles of King Stephen's Treaty with Duke Henry, Son to Maud the Empress. Hol.

William of Malmfbury writes, that about the Year 1140. the Money of the Nation was so bad, that scarce one Shilling in ten was good. In the same Year, on the 21st of March early in the Morning, there was so great an Eclipse of the Sun, that Men were forc'd to light Candles to eat their Meat by. And the above mention'd Author adds, Those who sat at the Table where he was, fear'd the return of the ancient Chaos, for several Stars were perceiv'd near the Sun.

The most Famous Warriours in his Time were

Hugh Bigod Earl of Norfolk, Baldwin Ridvers, Walter and Gilbert Lacy, Ralph Earl of Chester, William Mandevil Earl of Essex, William Martell, Roger and Miles Earls of Hereford, the Earl of Leicester, Simon Earl of Northampton, the brave Earl of Gloucester, Natural Brother to the Empress Maud, and Prince Euface, King Stephen's eldest Son.

Of Men of Learning the most Eminent were

William a Monk and Library-keeper of Malmfbury, Simeon a Monk and Precentor of Durham, Ealred Abbot of Rievaulx in Yorkshire, Henry Archdeacon of Huntingdon, Geoffrey Archdeacon of Monmouth, Robert of Shrewsbury, Caradoc of Lancaster, Gilbert Foliot Bishop of Hereford, and Thurstan Archbishop of York; all Historians.

LIFE and REIGN
HENRY II.
Surnam'd PLANTAGENET.

A. D.
1155.
Henry Son of the Empress made King.

HENRY PLANTAGENET, (though at the Death of Stephen he was beyond the Seas, and a Frenchman by Birth, yet) was admitted to the Crown of England without any Opposition or Capitulation other than the usual Oath. He was detain'd by contrary Winds from coming into England for six Weeks together*, after Stephen's Death; but the Nation was so tired out with Civil Wars, and all Places so miserably harass'd, that they chose to wait for his coming, rather than provoke so powerful a Prince by the Election of another. So he was crown'd by Theobald Arch-bishop of Canterbury, Dec. 20. 1154. in the twenty third Year of his Age. He was a Prince young, active, and powerful, and had all things that might have made him high and assuming; but he understood the Necessity of his own present Affairs, and the Interests of Princes so well, that he began his Reign with all such publick Actions, as he knew would get and increase the Love of his Subjects, being sensible, that the King of France was so highly offended by his Match, that he would not overlook any Advantage he could get against him through the Disaffection of his Subjects. And the first thing he did, was to to chuse himself a Council, which he did out of the gravest and most experienc'd Men of his Kingdom, who could best inform him in the State and Condition of the Nation. Then he call'd a Parliament at Wallingford, where he pass'd an Act, which was not more for his own Profit than for the Satisfaction of all his People; which was, To expel all Strangers out of the Land: For the People were greatly peester'd with them at that time, by reason of the Wars, which drew Multitudes of them hither, especially Flemings and Picards; whom King Stephen, after he found the English false and unfaithful to him, entertain'd and chiefly trusted, making William de Tyres Earl of Kent their Commander, who by Virtue of this Act was banish'd with the rest of his Country-men, and his Lands seiz'd into the King's hand. After the Dissolution of this Assembly, that he might be able to maintain his Royal Dignity without being burthensome to his People (whose voluntary Contributions would afford him greater Supplies, if Necessity required, than severe Exactions) he look'd into the State and Condition of his Revenues, reform'd the Exchequer, and resum'd those Lands which had been alienated, or detain'd from the Crown; and though some of his great Lords resolutely kept Possession of what they had in their hands, as Hugh de Mortimer of his Castles of Clebury, Wigmore and Bridge-North, and Roger Fitz-Milo Earl of Hereford of the City and Lands of Glocester; yet the King took them by force from them, as belonging to the Crown. As he did also the Castle of Scarborough from William Earl of Albemarle, and divers other Lands and Castles in Torkshire possess'd by private Men. Hugh Bigod resign'd his Castles into the King's hands: But that which look'd worst in these Actions, was his taking the Castle of Pemsey, City of Norwich, with other Towns and Castles from William Earl of Mortaine and Warren, the second Son of King Stephen, contrary to his own positive Agreement with the said King; alledging, that they were the Demesns of the Crown, and could not be alienated from it, yet he suffer'd him to enjoy the Lands his Father held in England in the Reign of Henry I. These things being dispatch'd he went into the North, and seiz'd upon Cumberland and Northumberland, with the Cities of Carlisle, Town of New-Castle, and Castle of Bamberge, which his Mother Maud had given to David King of Scots, or had anciently belong'd to the Crown of Scotland by the Donation of his Predecessors; saying, 'Twas not in the Power of any King to give away any part of his Kingdom: Yet he suffer'd Malcolm, the present King, to enjoy the Earldom of Huntington, which Stephen had given to Henry his Father, because it could be of no Benefit to him, but at his Pleasure; and he had a mind to keep him his Homager, to do him Services for that Earldom. The same Course he took to recover all Alienations from the Demesns of the Dutchy of Normandy, forcing Theobald Duke of Blois to resign two Castles, and Petroch Earl of Perch, the like Number to him. These Revocations, which were done with Loss to many Persons, and contrary to the Grants of himself and Predecessors, might seem unjust, and in the beginning of his Government not safe: But because the Kingdom receiv'd a great Advantage by it, and only some particular Persons endamag'd, it was generally approved as a necessary and prudent Action; for if these Revenues had been still kept from the Crown, he must have depended upon Taxes for

A. D. 1163. Reg. 9. Bishops, in the time of his Grandfather Henry I. did observe. They answer'd, They would; their Order, the Honour of God, and Right of the Church, in all things being kept harmless. This Reservation displeased the King more, who hereupon dismissed the Parliament, and did nothing at that time. But gave not over his Endeavours to recover his Prerogative out of the Church's hands: And finding the Archbishop of Canterbury, of whom he had reason to expect a ready submission to his Desires, because of the many Favours he had received from him, was the chief Stickler against him; he was very much enraged at his Ingratitude, and resolved to shew him, that he could pull down as well as advance. And therefore he first forbids him his Presence, and takes from him all that he possibly could; then he countenances all his Enemies, and causes that things be carry'd against him in all Courts of the Kings. The Earl of Clare was supported in the Controversie he had with him, about doing Homage for the Castle of Tunbridge, and prevail'd. In fine, nothing was left undone that could be thought most effectual to humble him. Besides the King by politick Artifices breaks the Confederacy of the Bishops with him, and gains first by his Obligingness the Archbishop of York (the ancient Competitor with Canterbury for Pre-eminence) and afterwards the Bishops of Lincoln, Hereford, and others of the Prelates, who were the most leading Men, and separates them from the Council and Company of Archbishop Becket.

The King's dealings with Becket for opposing him.
The Pope's Message to Becket.
A Parliament call'd at Clarendon.
1164. Reg. 10. This Controversie between the Church and State, or rather between the King and Archbishop, made a great Noise in the World, and was soon brought to the Pope's Ear, who being desirous to keep the King's Love, sent Philip his Almoner, by the advice of the whole Conclave of Cardinals, to compose the Difference, and to charge the Archbishop to make Peace with his Master the King, by promising to observe his Laws, without Reservations or Exceptions. The Archbishop seeing his Cause thus discountenanced at Rome, and being pressed to a Compliance by many of his Friends of the Nobility, he went immediately to Woodstock, and there promises the King, without any reserves, to observe his Laws, as he required. The King supposing, that by Archbishop Becket's promise all Opposition to his Design was laid aside, calls a Parliament of the Bishops and Nobility at Clarendon in Wiltshire, where John of Oxford the King's Clerk was President, who gave them a Charge from the King his Master, That they should call to remembrance the Laws of his Grandfather Henry I. and commit them to Writing; which being done, he required the Archbishop and Bishops to set their Hands and Seals to them, which they all did, but Archbishop Becket refused. The other Bishops earnestly persuaded him to satisfy the King's desires, not only in respect of the Danger which he would fall into through the King's Anger, but in regard to his Oath, which he had again taken there to observe the King's Laws without Reservation. He thereupon desires a Copy of the Writing, as if he would consider better upon the several Heads of it; but taking it into his Hands, he turned to the Clergy, and said, Brethren, stand fast, you see the Malice of the King, and of whom we are to beware; but would not subscribe it. And so this Assembly was dismissed without doing any thing of Moment, as the King intended. These Disappointments, and this Perverseness in the Archbishop, incensed the King much the more against him, because now he found that all the other Bishops yielded to his pleasure, and only Becket stood out. And therefore he proceeds by all means to vex and disgrace him, and to advance his Rival, the Archbishop of York; and to that end sent his Agents, John of Oxford and Jeffrey Riddle, his Clerks, to solicit the Pope to make him Legate over all England. But the Pope being before acquainted with the business refused to do it; yet at the Petition of the Agents he granted a Legation to the King himself, with a proviso, That he should do nothing to grieve the Archbishop of Canterbury; which the King resented so highly, that he sent them back again with his Grant. The Archbishop Becket afterward so repented of the Oath that he had taken at Clarendon, that he suspended himself from the Service of the Altar, and did severe Penance for it, till he had obtained Absolution from the Pope; which upon his own Information of his Case, was soon sent him. Not long after this, as some write, he attempted to go out of the Kingdom, contrary to a Law made at Clarendon, whereby it was forbidden to the Archbishops, Bishops, or any other Persons, to depart out of the Realm without the King's License; which, altho' they obtain'd, yet they were notwithstanding obliged to secure the King, and neither in their going, returning, or staying there, to practise any thing prejudicial to his State or Person. But being by contrary Winds driven home again, he more exasperated the King against him by this attempt.

The King, by the former Actions of the Archbishop, growing more severe against him, called a Parliament at Northampton to ratify the Acts made at Clarendon. And here, to thwart him, the King's Horses were placed in his Inn. At this Assembly he had a Case given against him, concerning a Manour which John the King's Marshal contended at Law with him for; whereby he not only lost the said Manour, but was sentenced to pay five hundred Marks, as Arrears, and was forced to pay it. He was also called to an account for all the Sums which he had received in the time of his Chancellorship upon the King's account, which amounted to thirty thousand Pounds. The Archbishop refused to plead to this Charge, because, he said, he was discharged of those Receipts by the Prince, Barons of the Exchequer, and Robert Lucy Chief Justice of England, in behalf of the King, before he was made Archbishop. But this Answer did not satisfy: The King was still very urgent to have Judgment pass against him for this, with other his late attempts, and disobedience; and so he was commanded to attend his Censure the next day. The Morning before he was to appear, he celebrated early in the Morning with great Devotion the Mass of St. Stephen the Protomartyr, which had in it these Words: Princes sate and spake against me. From this Office he set forward (committing his Cause to God) to the Court, in his Stole, his black Canonical Hood, carrying the Cross in his right Hand, and guiding his Horse with his left. The People seeing him come in such an unusual manner, flock all about him, and he entering the great Chamber, sat down amongst them; the King being in his Privy-Chamber with his Council. The Bishop of London was the first that came out to him, and he much blamed him for coming in that Garb to the Court, and offered to pull the Cross out of his Hand; but the Archbishop held it so fast, that he could not. The Bishop of Winchester seeing it, said to London: Brother, let him alone; he ought to bear the Cross. London reply'd, You speak, Brother, against the King, and it will be ill for you. After this came forth the Archbishop of York,

Reg. 10. and chid him very sharply for coming in that fashion, as if he were to appear before a Tyrant, or an Heathen Prince, and told him, That the King's Sword was sharper than his Crozier; and if he would be advised by him, he should take it from him. Canterbury reply'd, The King's Sword wounds the Body only, mine sends the Soul to Hell. After much debate, the Archbishop Becket sharply inveighed against the King's proceedings with him, and said, 'That it was never known in any former Age, that an Archbishop of Canterbury was try'd in any of the King's Courts, for any Cause whatsoever, not only because of his Place and Dignity, but because he is the Spiritual Father of the King himself, and all his Subjects. Then, turning his Speech to the Bishops, who sat as his Judges, he said: 'You see how the World rageth against me, and the Enemy assails me; but that which grieves me most, is, That the Sons of my Mother combine against me: If I should not resent it, the Ages to come would record it to your disgrace, that you left me alone in the Battel, and gave Sentence upon me, who am your Father, tho' never so great a Sinner. But I charge you, by Virtue of your Obedience, and under pain of Degradation, that you be not present in any Court of Judicature, where either my Cause or Person shall be judged; and that if any Layman shall lay Hands on me, you immediately excommunicate him or them, as your Duty to your Father the Archbishop obliges you, who, whatever he suffers, will not desert the Church's Cause, nor forsake the Flock committed to him. Then were many great Accusations of his Contempt and Disobedience to the King brought against him, and Perjury proved upon him; which were so aggravated by the King's Council, that all present cry'd out unanimously, 'That he was one of the worst of Traytors, who having been loaded so much with the King's Favours, had refused to pay him the Civil Honour of a Subject, and to observe his Laws, as he had sworn to do. The Archbishop hearing these things, appeal'd to the Pope. But the Bishops complying with the Secular Power, renounced their Ecclesiastical Obedience to him, cited him to Rome, and condemned him as a Traytor and Perjured Person. Then the Earl of Leicester, being accompany'd with Reginald Earl of Cornwall, came to the Archbishop, and charged him in the King's Name to answer the Crimes objected against him, or else to hear his Sentence pronounced. 'Nay but Son Earl, said he, hear thou me first: 'It is not unknown to your self how faithfully I have served the King, and that for my Fidelity he preferred me to this Dignity I now enjoy (God knows) against my Will. For I was conscious of my own Infirmities, and was contented to take it upon me rather to please the King than God; and therefore doth God withdraw himself from me, and turns the King's heart against me. At my Election he freed me from all Court-Attendance and Slavery; and upon that account I am not bound to answer any defects in that kind, neither will I. As much as the Soul is more excellent than the Body, so much are ye bound to obey God and me before any Earthly Creature. Neither Law or Reason can justify the Sons in the condemning of the Fathers. pealing to the Audience of the Pope, by whom A. D. alone I can be judged upon Earth, committing 1164. all I have to God's protection and his, and as Reg. 10. under his Authority only I depart out of this place. And so he went out, and took his Horse, yet not without some difficulties in passing, and many affronts from the King's Servants. But being gotten out of the Court, a great multitude of the common People (rejoycing to see him deliver'd) and divers of the Clergy convey'd him honourably to the Abby of St. Andrew's at Northampton, from whence he made his escape in disguise, and under the Name of Dereman, into Flanders, and so got into France; where being out of the King's reach, and under the Pope's protection, he caused the Kingdom and King much trouble.

Immediately after the departure of the Archbishop, the King sends over his Ambassadors, Gillebert Bishop of London, and William Earl of Arundel, to the King of France, to intreat him not only to forbid the Archbishop his Kingdom, but to be a means to the Pope, that his Cause might not be favour'd by the Church, being so contumacious a Rebel against his Natural Prince. But the French King was so far from Compliance with his Request, that he dispatched Fryar Francis his Almoner privately to the Pope to beseech him, as he tender'd the Honour of Holy Church, and the Safety of his Kingdom, to support the Archbishop of Canterbury against the Tyrant of England. King Henry also sent with all speed Roger Archbishop of Tork, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Chichester, and Exeter; Guido Rufus, Richard Iwelchester, and John of Oxford, Clerks, William Earl of Arundel, Hugh de Gundevill, Bernard de S. Wellerie, and Henry Fitz-Gerrard, to inform the Pope of the whole Affair, and prevent the ill effects of the Archbishop's Complaints. The Multitude, and the greatness of the Ambassadors, shewed the Importance of the Embassy, and the King's desire to prevail. They found the Pope at the City of Sens, and represented to him, how obstinate and disobedient the Archbishop had been to his Sovereign Lord the King of England; and that tho' he had sworn to obey his Laws, yet he had wilfully opposed and broke them, and by his peevishness and obstinacy was about to embroil the Church and Kingdom: And therefore they besought him, as he tender'd the Peace of the Church of England, and desir'd the Love of their Master, not to favour or credit a Man of that turbulent and obstinate Disposition. This Relation of the Difference little moved the Pope; which, when the Ambassadors perceived, they pray'd him to send two Legates into England to examine the business more fully, and in the mean time to admit no other relation of the matter but what they should bring. But the Pope would not yield to their desire, and so they departed much dissatisfied. Within four Days after their departure came the Archbishop, and prostrates himself at the Pope's Feet, presents him with a Copy of the Laws, which the King call'd Leges Avita, i. e. his Grandfather's Laws; which being read before a Body of Cardinals, Clergy, and many others, the Pope condemned them for ever, and anathematized all such as should either obey or favour them. The Laws, which being among the Statutes of Clarendon, were so furiously opposed by the Archbishop, and so much offended the Clergy, were these, (as we find them set down in his own Letter to the Bishop of London) 'That there

A. D. 1164. Reg. 10. 'should be no Appeals made to the Apostolick See without the King's Leave; That no Archbishop or Bishop should go out of the Realm without the King's Permission; That no Bishop shall excommunicate any Person, that holds of the King in Capite, or interdict any Officer of his without a Licence had from the King; That Clergy-men should be try'd before Secular Judges; That Lay-men (such as the King and his Judges) should examine and judge the Causes of the Church about Tythes, and Matters of like Nature, which were looked upon by the Pope and Clergy as dangerous Encroachments upon their Ecclesiastical Liberties.

1165. Reg. 11. The King, at the return of his Ambassadors from the Pope, finding that they had obtain'd no Favour with him, but that he was rather slighted and contemn'd by him, was highly displeased; and that he might shew how much he resented the Affront, and scorn'd his Authority, he put out a severe Edict both against the Pope and the Arch-bishop, opposing his Secular to their Ecclesiastical Authority; and ordering,

The King's Edict against the Pope and all his Agents. 'That if any Person were apprehended, carrying a Letter or other Instrument from the Pope or Arch-bishop, containing any Interdict of the Christian Religion in England, he should be without delay executed as a Traytor both to the King and Kingdom. That whatsoever Bishop, Priest, Monk, or other Person in Holy Orders, Clerk or Lay-man, should have or conceal any such Letters; shall forfeit all their Lands, Goods and Chattels to the King, and be immediately banish'd the Nation, with all their Kindred. That no Clergy-man, Monk, or Lay-man, should be permitted to pass from Normandy to England without a Pass-port from the Justices there; nor from England to Normandy, or other Places beyond-sea without the King's, upon Pain of Imprisonment if discover'd. That no Appeals to the Pope should be allowed. That all Clergy-men, who had any Estates in England, should return into the Kingdom within three Months, under the Penalty of forfeiting their Lands to the King. That Peter-pence should be collected and sequestred, till the King's Pleasure was farther known. He also banish'd all the Archbishop's Kindred, without any Exception of Sex or Age, and openly renounc'd the Pope's Authority, declaring his Adherence to the Emperour's Party, who then was at Enmity with the present Pope Alexander the III. and vindicated the Election of Victor the V. who tho' elected by the far less Number of Cardinals, viz. (but four to twenty two) yet was thought a sufficient Pretence of opposing the Pope, who was a declared Enemy to the Empire. Henry before this Quarrel between himself and the Arch-bishop, had favour'd the Election of Alexander, with the King of France, and the other Christian Princes of Europe, and had at Coccy upon the Loir shew'd him an extraordinary Reverence and Respect; but finding him so averse to him in this Difference, he fell from him, renounc'd his Authority, declar'd for the Emperour; and to strengthen himself by a firm Alliance with the German Princes, consented to marry his Daughter Maud to the Duke of Saxony, at the Motion of Reginald Archbishop of Collen, who was sent on purpose by the Emperour Frederick Barba- rossa to solicit it, and entertain'd another Motion A. D. 1165. for a Marriage between another of his Daughters and the Emperour's Son: But all these things did the King little Service. The Emperour's Party was weak, the Pope's grew stronger and stronger every day; and the Pope being exasperated by the King's Actions, was more earnest in the Defence of the Arch-bishop, whom he encourages to solicit and adjure the Clergy of England not to forsake their hold, but resolutely maintain their Liberties and Privileges against the Invader of them, who sought to confound the Priesthood and Kingdom; and if they gave ground in the least, would utterly ruine themselves and the Church. Then he excommunicated all the King's principal Ministers that adhered to the German Faction, or held Correspondence with the Arch-bishop of Collen; as John of Oxford, Richard Ivelbestre, Richard de Lucy, Jascelin Baliol, Alan de Nevil, and with them all those who had seized upon the Revenues and Goods of the See of Canterbury, which he call'd the Patrimony of the Crucifix, and Food of the Poor, viz. Ralph de Brock, Hugh S. Clare, and Thomas Fitz-Bernard. Thus was this unbloody War manag'd on both sides; in which, tho' there were no Swords drawn, yet it created much Vexation and Trouble to both Parties.

1166. Reg. 12. While this Dissention was on foot between the King and Pope, other publick Business happen'd, which kept the King employ'd. The Welsh revolted, and could hardly be reduc'd to their Obedience: In the War with them he lost many brave Men, and had himself been killed, had not Hugh S. Clare receiv'd the Arrow into his own Body, which he saw would prove mortal to his Master; yet was the King so sensible of his Danger, that he reveng'd his own suppos'd Death with a very cruel Treatment of his Enemies. From this Expedition he pass'd into Normandy, where now his Business lay more than in England: And here, that he might shew he had not lost his Christian Disposition by quarrelling with the Pope, he obtain'd of his Subjects in a publick Assembly call'd for that purpose, two Pence in the Pound of every Man's Lands and Goods for the Year 1167, and a Penny in the Pound for four Years after, for the Relief the poor Christians in the Holy War; and carefully collecting it Yearly, sent it to them. Then he gathered some Forces, and takes certain Castles in the County of Maine, and Marches of Britain from several factious Barons. In his absence Matthew the Son of the Earl of Flanders (who had married the Lady Mary, Abbess of Ramsay, the Daughter of King Stephen) attempted an Invasion, and molested the Coasts of England, but to no purpose, the King being too powerful for so weak an Opponent. While he was in Normandy, Conan King of Brittaigne died, and left one only Daughter (which he had by his Wife Constance the King of Scots Daughter) to succeed him in his Earldom. The King of England being then upon the Confines of that Country, thought this a good Opportunity of enlarging his own Dominions; and therefore treating with the Guardians of the young Lady, and having gained the Nobility to consent to a Marriage with his third Son Jeffrey, he in the end obtain'd his Desires to his great Content. This happen'd in the thirteenth Year of his Reign; wherein, as some

After her Death Henry remained three Years in France, which he spent in Wars, partly to clear the Bounds of his own Dominions from the Usurpation and Encroachments of his Neighbouring Lords, whom at length he brought into the Limits of his own Will, and partly to settle and reform the State of Brittaigne, which was much out of order, and all in a Mutiny at the late Match with his Son: But he soon appeased them, and kept his Christmas at Nantz, where he feasted all the Nobility of the Country, and by Favours obliged them to retain their Fidelity to his Son in his absence.

Reg. 15. Henry returns into England.

Having settled things beyond Seas, he returns into England, and the first thing he did was to observe whether his absence and a long Peace had not corrupted his Government; and to that end he appointed certain Commissioners to examine into any Abuses and Excesses, which might be committed by his Officers in the Administration of Justice; and having found many of the Sheriffs of the Nation guilty of Extortion and Bribery, he punish'd them severely for it. He kept his Easter at Windsor, whither William King of Scots, who lately succeeded his Brother Malcolm in that Government, came with his younger Brother David to congratulate the King's happy Return into England, and put in his Claim for some Countries in the North, which he pretended were unjustly detain'd from him. Henry entertain'd him very civilly, and gave him a fair Answer to his Demands: But told him, 'He could do nothing in it without the Consent of the Parliament, which if he would attend, he should have Satisfaction. Which words raised the Expectations of that King, and made him often come into England, and once to attend Henry into France as his Brother had done, but without a proportionable Return to his Desires.

The Contest between the King and Archbishop Becket revives.

The Pope's Letters, and the Answer to them.

Not long after the King's return home, his Controversie with the Church again reviv'd, and a greater Storm than ever threaten'd him. The Pope himself was not very forward to proceed to any rigorous Course, but labour'd to pacify the angry Arch-bishop, by telling him, 'That it was an ill time to contend, the King being potent and the Church already in Troubles; and therefore to heal the Sore, he writes to the Bishop of London and Hereford, 'Requiring them to treat with the King, and earnestly persuade him to desist from meddling with the Liberties of the Church, and to restore the Arch-bishop to his See and Dignity. The Bishops answer'd the Pope's Letter wisely and gravely thus, 'We have (say they) deliver'd your Holiness's Message to our King, and earnestly press'd him to yield to your Desires so far as was convenient for us to do to the Majesty of a King; begging of him, that if he had done any thing contrary to Truth and Justice, that he would not persist in his Error; That he would not prohibit Men from visiting the Churches at Rome, hinder Appeals, oppress the Church or Clergy, or suffer others to do it; That he would recal our Father the Arch-bishop, &c. and persist in all Acts of Piety, that so the God, by whom Kings reign might preserve him in his Temporal Kingdom, and give him an Eternal one A. D. 1169. in Heaven; That unless he would now hearken to your Holy Admonitions, you would wait no longer; adding this of our selves, That unless he amended his Errours, his Kingdom would not prosper or long flourish. The King received your Advice with many Thanks, great Comeliness and Modesty, and gave these Answers to every Point. 1. He protested, That he had not any Aversion to your Holiness, nor purposed to maintain any Opposition against you; but so long as he could enjoy your Fatherly Kindness, he would reverence you as a Father, and honour and protect the Church as a Mother: Nor would disobey any of your Decrees, so long as his own Dignity and the Kingdom's Happiness might be preserved. And if of late he had not paid that Respect to you, which he was wont, 'twas because his Ambassadors had met with such unkind Denials of his Petitions, which he had reason to obtain, because he had stood by you with so much Zeal and Power in your Necessity. 2. That he neither had, nor would ever hinder any from visiting your Holiness. But as for Appeals he challenges that Prerogative to himself by the ancient Custom of England; That no Clergy-man, for any civil Cause, shall go out of the Realm till he had tried whether he can't obtain his Right by his Royal Authority and Justice at home, which if he can't do, he will not hinder him from making his Appeal to your Holiness; and if in this he doth any way prejudice you, he is willing to amend it, as it shall be order'd by a General Council of the Kingdom; That as for the Emperor, tho' he knew he was a Schismatick, yet he never understood that he was excommunicated; which if he be rightly inform'd of, or have made an unlawful League with him, he promises to rectify it at the Direction of the said Assembly: That he never banish'd our Father the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, and that he was at his Liberty to return to his Church, provided his Majesty be satisfied concerning his Complaints, and that he will live in Obedience to his Laws: That if it can be proved, that any Church or Churchmen have been oppress'd by himself or Officers, he will make Satisfaction, as shall be thought fit by the Ecclesiastical Council of the Kingdom. This (say they) is the Answer we have received from our Lord the King, and wish it had been more fully according to your Desire; but these things we thought fit to make known to your Holiness, that you may see what is like to be the Event of this Difference. The King stands up in Defence of his own Cause, ready to obey the Council and Judgment of the Church of England. Wherefore we have judg'd it convenient to beseech your Highness to moderate your Zeal for God's Church for a time, and forbear to interdict or excommunicate our Churches, lest both the King and his Subjects be irrevocably (which God forbid) deterr'd from their Obedience to the Holy See. And lastly, they add, as a Dissuasive from rigorous Dealings with the King, That the skilful Chirurgeon doth not immediately cut off the Member that is unsound and diseased, but uses all means to heal it, and recover it to its proper Use; and so it is better for his Holiness to labour to pacify the King, than by cutting off so noble a part of the Church of God to bring more Disturbance into the same, which hath too much already: That tho' the King were stiff and resolute, yet they doubted not but through

A. D. 1169. Reg. 15. through God's Grace he might be won by Patience and Meekness. What tho' the Lord of Canterbury lose his Goods, and remain in exile, yet 'tis better it should be so, than that all England fall from their Obedience through your Severity? And tho' perhaps a Persecution may not separate us from you, yet there will not want Knees to bow to Basil, there will be enough to receive the Pall of Canterbury from the King's hands, and supply our Seats with all assurances of Obedience; and some there are that hope this Schism between you and the King will make way for their Preferments. By these Letters, which are the best pieces of History in the World, we see the full state of this Controversie, and what it was that kept these two mighty Potentates from getting their Wills, and tho' they threaten'd loud, were really afraid one of another.

Henry assumes his Son into the Regal Dignity, and had him crown'd. Hitherto the King stood safe, and might have continued so, had he not been suspicious of more danger than he was really in; and so endeavouring to secure himself more than was necessary, he undermined his own Peace, lessen'd his Authority, and embroyl'd his People. And this he did by assuming his eldest Son Henry into a Copartnership in his Royal Dignity and Power. An Act without Precedent in this Kingdom, which 'tis hardly credible, that the Parliament, in such discerning times, would have consented to, if the King would have been contented with a denial. In compliance with which the young Prince was crown'd June 14. 1170. by Roger Archbishop of York, and received Homage from William King of Scots, David his Brother, and most of the Nobility of England. For what Reasons the King did thus, whether out of meer kindness to his Son, or whether he feared the Clergy, with whom he then was at difference, might deprive his Posterity of the Succession, as they did his Mother Maud, (as is most probable by reason of this Juncture) yet certain it is he got himself two Enemies by it, viz. the French King, and his own Son. The French King threaten'd him with War, because his Daughter was not crown'd with her Husband, unless it were immediately done. Henry hereupon hasts into Normandy to secure his Dominions there, and leaves his Son in England, thinking thus to prevent or pacifie his angry Father-in-Law. His own Son, not content with a bare Title without Power, or a participation only in Government with his Father, who by being his Superiour, clouded his Glory, and null'd all his Authority, created him much Grief and Trouble, contriving all ways to make him no King, who had shew'd too much indulgence in creating him one; and forgetting the Duty of a Son, by being rais'd to an equal Power with his Father, who by his Actions found too late, That Crowns are not to be made over in trust to any Persons.

A Conference of the King and Archbishop. While the King remain'd in Normandy, it was effected by the mediation of the French King, Theobald Earl of Blois, and other great Bishops, that the Archbishop of Canterbury (who had then been six Years in Banishment) should be admitted to a Conference with the King; who did not unwillingly embrace the Proposition, because he found that a Quarrel with the Church in those zealous Times would much prejudice his other temporal Affairs, and create him daily more potent Enemies, through the Pope's and Bishops means. Their Meeting was at Montmirail, in the presence of the King of France. And the Archbishop, at his entrance into the King's presence, Reg. 16. fell on his Knees at his Feet, and said, 'He would leave the whole Matter in Controversie to his Majesty's Decision, Salvo honore Dei, i. e. God's Honour being sav'd harmless. The King, who had been tired with this Reservation, and seen the ill tendency of it, began to be in a Passion, and said to the King of France, and others present, 'Whatever displeases this Man, he makes to be against God's Honour, and under that shew claims all that belongs to me. But that you may not think that I will be against any thing that is really for God's Honour or his Right, I declare, that whatever the greatest and most holy of his Predecessors have done to the meanest of mine, I will condescend to undergo from him. This Answer, which was so much beyond the Expectation of all the Company, begat such a good Opinion in them all to the King's Cause, that the King of France told the Archbishop plainly, 'That he could not stand upon any thing now reasonably, unless he would be greater than the Saints, or St. Peter himself; and that if Peace were not now made, 'twas his fault only. The Archbishop reply'd to this effect, 'That as the Authority of Kings had grown up by degrees, so had that of the Church; which being by the Providence of God come to that pitch of Grandeur, he was not to follow the Example of any that had been faint-hearted, or too yielding in their places. The Church had risen and increased by many Persecutions, and he was to hold what it had so hardly gotten. Our Fathers (said he) suffer'd all manner of Afflictions, because they would not forsake the Name of Christ; and shall I, to gain the Favour of any Man living, lose any thing that is for his honour. This proud and obstinate Answer to so yielding a Proffer made by the King, so much distast'd the Hearers, that they look'd upon his Cause as nothing else but the effect of Pride and Arrogancy, not of true Zeal; and so the Meeting at that time concluded. Divers Meetings they had after this to debate about the same matters; one of the most conclusive was upon the Confines of Normandy, in the presence of the same King of France; (who entertain'd the Archbishop all the while) where the King took the Archbishop apart, and talk'd with him a long time; twice they lighted from their Horses, and twice remounted again; and twice the King held the Archbishop's Bridle, and then parted, both prepar'd for a Peace, but not concluding any. At last, by the mediation of the Archbishop of Rouen, the Controversie was fully compos'd, and decided before the Earl of Blois at Amboys. And thereupon the King sent to Henry his Son in England in this manner: 'Know ye, that Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury hath made Peace with me, according to my Will; and therefore I charge you, that he and all his Relations be no more disturbed, but that the Estates and Goods of him, and all such as went out of England for his sake, be restored to them in as full and ample manner as they enjoy'd them three Months before their going, &c. (Which shews that the supreme Command was lodg'd in the Father, and not in the Son.) Soon after this the Archbishop return'd into England, (yet not as one that had fought, but forced a

* 'Tis reported, that King Henry himself carry'd up the first Dish to his Son's Table at the Coronation-Feast; and when the Archbishop of York represented to him, how much he was oblig'd to his Father for that Favour, the young Prince haughtily reply'd, That it was not such great Condescension in his Father, who was only the Son of an Earl, to perform that Service to him, who was the Son of a King.

* William Fitz-Stephens, who was Becket's Chaplain, and wrote his Life, writes, That this Peace was concluded on the 22d of July, 1170. at Preteville, between Chartin and Maine.

A. D. 1170. Peace) and therefore, as if he had gain'd Power to strengthen his Resolution by his Agreement with the King, he suspends by the Pope's Bull the Archbishop of York from his Episcopal Function for crowning the young King within the Province of Canterbury, without his Leave, and against the Pope's Order, and without taking (according to the Custom) the Cautionary Oath for the preservation of the Liberties of the Church. He also suspended in like manner by other Letters, which he brought with him, the Bishops of London, Salisbury, Oxford, Chester, Rochester, S. Asaph, and Landaff, for assisting at the Coronation, and defending the King's Cause against him, and by their Suspension they were to remain depriv'd of their Office till they had given the Archbishop such satisfaction as he required. The Bishops, amazed at this terrible assault, had no other Refuge but the King, to whom they immediately fled into Normandy, and gave him an account of the Archbishop's Severity, and implacable Fury and Imperiousness. The King hearing their Relation, was mov'd with extream Passion, and is said with great Grief to have utter'd these words:

The Archbishop's return into England, and his Suspension of the Bishops.

'In what a miserable Condition am I, who can't be quiet in my own Kingdom for one only Priest! What is there no Man will rid me of this trouble? Some say, that there were four Knights attending the King when he spake these words, viz, Sir Hugh Morvill, Sir William Tracy, Sir Richard Britton, and Sir Reginald Fitz-Urse, who guessing at his Desire, departed instantly into England to be the unfortunate Executioners of it; but others relate, that these four Gentlemen were sent with a Commission by the King, to treat with the Archbishop in this Affair. 1. To require him to take his Oath of Fidelity to the young King. 2. To restore the Bishops he had deprived to the Execution of their Office. 3. To advise and command him to carry himself with much more Lenity and Moderation in his Place, that so the Church may have comfort, and the Kingdom peace, by his return. These Men, zealous for their Prince, and arm'd with Authority, went to the Archbishop, and finding him peremptory and untractable, not answering their Humour, nor regarding their Master's Message, were highly enrag'd, and threaten'd to commit him. The Archbishop, to secure himself, withdrew into the Cathedral Church, but to no purpose; for they arming themselves entred in the Church, when he was at Divine Service with the Monks, and furiously reviling him as a Traytor, fell upon him with their Swords, gave him many Wounds, and at length struck out his Brains, so that the Altar was sprinkled with his Blood. The Archbishop in this Assault behav'd himself with great Courage, and passionately committed his own Soul, and the Church's Cause to God and his Saints; which, together with the Manner, Time, and Place of his Suffering, begat great Compassion towards him, and Abhorrence of the Fact. The unfortunate Gentlemen, tho' they effected a great piece of Service, yet dare not return to the King, either because they had exceeded the Bounds of their Commission, and so might justly fear his Displeasure; or because they knew A. D. 1170. he would not acknowledge it a Kindness, tho' he thought it a great one; but (after they had rifled Reg. 16. the Archbishop's Palace) fled into several Countries in the North, and dy'd all within four Years (as it is reported) miserable Fugitives.

The Fame of the Archbishop Becker's Death soon spread into all parts of the Christian World, and both Tongues and Pens fell all to work to aggravate and condemn it. The King of France himself informs the Pope of the whole matter, and aggravating the Foulness of the Fact, and inciting him to Severity in punishing it: To unsheathe St. Peter's Sword to revenge the Death of the Martyr of Canterbury, whose Blood cries out to all the Church, and whose Divine Glory was manifested already by Miracles. Theobald Earl of Blois, a great and grave Prince (elder Brother to King Stephen) represented to the Pope, 'That he was present when the Peace was made between the King of England and the blessed Martyr; That the King cheerfully confirm'd the Agreement, and granted the Archbishop power to use his Authority, as it pleased the Pope and him, against those Bishops, who had contrary to the Right and Dignity of the Church of Canterbury, presum'd to set the new King upon the Throne. And this he would justify upon his Oath, or otherwise. By this Peace (says he) was the Man of God brought under the King's Sword, the innocent Lamb slain upon the morrow after St. Innocent's Day, the just Blood shed at the Altar, where Christ's Blood is offer'd, by Court-Dogs, the King's domestick Servants, set on work to do this horrible Act; and then concludes with Admonitions of Revenge. But William Archbishop of Sens came with a loud Cry, as if he fear'd the Pope would overlook the Fact, and tells him, 'That all Power was given to his Apostleship both in Heaven and Earth, and God had appointed him to bind Kings in Chains, and Nobles in Links of Iron. He bids him observe how the Boar of the Wood had rooted up the Lord's Vineyard. And after he hath bitterly inveigh'd against the King, stirs him up to revenge that which is past, that he may provide for the future: What place shall be safe, if the Rage of Tyrants be suffer'd to fill the Sanctum Sanctorum with Blood, and Christ's Vicegerents be torn in pieces without punishment? Arm therefore, says he, all the Ecclesiastical Power you can, &c. The King of England, on the other side, protested his own Innocency, and solemnly avow'd, That he was as far from ordering or desiring any such deed to be done, as he was from doing it himself; and that he was heartily sorry for it when he heard of it. He also employ'd the chief Men of his Kingdom, for Reputation, Learning and Judgment, to defend his Innocency to the Pope; but his Holiness was so prepossessed by the sinister Reports of others, that he deny'd his Ambassadors Audience, and the Cardinals refus'd all Conference with them; yet they were not so much discourag'd by this unkind usage, but that they clear'd their Master's Honour by Apologies, Remonstrances, and what

The King clears himself of Becker's Murder.

* William Fitz-Stephens says, he was exasperated against him by the suspended Bishops, and particularly the Archbishop of York, who told him, That so long as Thomas Becker was alive he would never enjoy happy Days, nor a quiet Kingdom.

* Fitz-Stephens calls them Barons, and Servants of the King's Bed-Chamber, Cubicularii. They stole away from Court. F. S.

* His last Words were, Lord, into thy hands I commend my self, and the Cause of the Church of God, St. Mary, St. Denis, and all the Saints Patrons of his Church.

* They remain'd a Year in Knaveborough-Castle in Yorkshire, and might have easily been brought to Justice for their Crime, but there was no Law to punish with Death any Persons that had kill'd a Clergyman, because the Clergy had exempted themselves from the King's Jurisdiction; and so the Archbishop himself, who so violently oppos'd the secular Power over the Clergy, and was by that means the Cause that the Blood of many Persons was unreveng'd, prevented the deserv'd Punishment of his own Blood from the Sword of Justice; tho' God seem'd to punish it by the miserable Lives and unfortunate Deaths of the Actors of it: Who, according to Ro. Hoveden's account, being excommunicated by the Pope, went to Rome for Absolution; and were enjoy'd to go to Jerusalem, and to do Penance afterwards on the Black Mountain for Life.

A. D. 1170. Reg. 16. soever Wit could devise; so that they kept off the highest Censure, tho' it was every day expected, and by gravely urging the Mischief that might fall upon the Church by too great Severity, so allay'd the first Heat, that they gave the King some hopes of a Pacification, till the Pope sent two Cardinals Latere, Gratianus and Vivianus, into Normandy to interdict him and his Dominions, which exceedingly disturb'd him; but the King having gotten some notice of their coming and intention, appeals to the presence of the Pope upon their entrance, and so put off that trouble. And when he came into England again, to prevent the like, forbids all Brief-Carriers, of what Condition or Order soever, to pass the Seas, without giving good Security for their Behaviour to the King and Kingdom.

The King's Expedition into Ireland, and Conquest of it. But tho' the Controversie which the King had with the Church caused him much trouble, yet he omitted nothing which tended to the Advancement of his Kingdom, and Enlargement of his Dominions, which at this time he undertook by an Expedition into Ireland for the Conquest of it; and so much the rather, that at this time he might make himself formidable. He had had a like design at the beginning of his Reign, and to prepare his way to it without opposition, had obtain'd leave of Pope Adrian IV. to go on with it, under the pretence of reducing a Rude and Barbarous People from their Vicious Customs to the Faith and Truth of Christ, and upon promise of paying Peter-Pence to the Roman See. The Pope (who is always willing to give away what is not his own, to get something by it) readily granted the King's Petition, and sent his Ambassadors back with an Instrument of Concession in Writing to this effect: 'That it was a laudable and glorious thing for so magnificent a Prince to enlarge his Dominions for the Conversion of Souls, and Good of the Church. And then gives him power to invade the same, and to execute whatsoever should be to the Honour of God, and Good of the Country; with a Reservation of the Rights of the Church, and Peter-Pence promised; and concludes with an Exhortation to settle an holy and exemplary Clergy among them, &c. But the King at that time having other important Matters in hand, laid these Thoughts for the present aside, and did not resume them till a fair occasion offer'd it self of prosecuting it with success, which was thus given him: Dermot Macmurgh, one of the five Kings that then ruled Ireland, came to him into Aquitain to crave his Aid against Rodericke the Great, call'd O-Conar Dun, King of Connaught, who aiming at the Dominion of the whole Country, had expell'd him out of his Dominions of Lemster. The King of England, glad of this opportunity of introducing his Forces into the Country, promised him assistance; and tho' he was a little detained by other Affairs of Importance, yet he gave him liberty to get as many of his Subjects as he would, to try their Fortunes with him. The occasion of the Quarrel between the two Irish Princes was very foul on Dermot's part, who had corrupted and stolen away the Wife of Rodericke; and for that reason, with his Injustices to his People, (the common Causes of ruining and transferring Kingdoms) was by force of Arms driven out of his Dominions of Lemster; and being expell'd, he seeks to the King of England for help to recover his Right; and having obtained the former Grant of him, went into Wales, where he first prevail'd with Robert Fitz-Stephen, a Man of a desperate Fortune, but good Interest among the Welsh, by promises of great Riches and Reward; and afterward with A. D. Richard Earl of Pembroke, Chestow, and Strigil, 1170. surnamed Strongbow, a Lord of great Courage and Worth, of large Possessions both in England and Normandy, and well followed, whom he won by a Contract of giving him his only Daughter in Marriage, and the Succellion of the Kingdom of Lemster after him. Fitz-Stephens, with his half-Brother Maurice Fitz-Gerard, pass'd over first with a small Force, and landed at a place call'd by the Irish Bagg-lun, which in English signifies Holy; and therefore look'd upon as an Omen of good Success: Whereof it retains the Memory to this day in this Rhythm:

At the head of Bagg and Bunni, Ireland was lost and won.

The next day arriv'd Maurice Prindergast with two Ships full of armed Men, and Archers, to joyn with Fitz-Stephens, who made up together about four hundred Men. With this small Army they march'd with Banners display'd to the City of Weisford, in so strange a form and order, that the Irish, unacquainted with such an unusual form of War, and supposing them by their Front to be far more numerous than they were, were overcome with fear, and render'd up themselves to them, with their City of Weisford, which Dermot gave to Robert Fitz-Stephens with the Country adjoining, to encourage him, and raise the hopes of others. And here was the first Colony of the English settled in Ireland, which hath continu'd there ever since, retaining still our ancient Garb, and much of our Language, which is proper to that City, and the Country about it, call'd the Weisford Speech. The next Year* they had a new Supply out of Wales; and after, upon news of their success, the Earl of Pembroke went over with two hundred armed Men, and a thousand other Soldiers, and landing at Waterford, takes the Town, which was then call'd Portblarge, and puts all the Inhabitants to the Sword, not only to terrifie others, but to make room for his own People. And here Dermot gave the Earl his Daughter Eva to Wife, with the Dowry of his Country, which after he had liv'd to undo by his Wickedness, he liv'd not long to see, but dy'd miserably, leaving nothing memorable but the infamous Name of Ningal, which signifies a Friend to Strangers, as a Brand of his unnatural Treachery to his own Country. The Earl, after he had gotten his Inheritance convey'd, and secured the places he had won, marches with his small Forces thro' the whole Island without resistance, Rodericke the Great not daring to make good his Name, nor appear in opposition to him, but kept in the Wilds and strong Holds of Connaught, and never met the Enemy. So that he took Pledges of the Inhabitants to secure their Obedience as he pleas'd; and with very little labour possess'd himself of Dublin, the head City of the Island. Thus did the Welsh first win the Kingdom of Ireland, and (which is most strange) without Battel; a thing scarce credible, that so populous a Country as Ireland was, and a Nation of that disposition, should not lift up any hands in their own defence; but it seems, tho' they had continual Wars almost among themselves, yet they had so little Armour and Discipline, that they were terrify'd with the Warlike Appearances of the English.

The King of England being inform'd of the great Success of the former Adventurers, began to be jealous of them, lest they should think

A. D. 1171. themselves something greater than Subjects; and therefore to stop their farther Proceedings, and gain the Glory of the Conquest of Ireland, he immediately declares that they had gone beyond their Commission, and puts out his Proclamation, 'That no Vessel should carry any thing out of his Dominions into Ireland; That all his Subjects there should desist from farther Attempts, and return home immediately, or else should forfeit their Estates in England. And withal, sends over William Fitz-Adelm and Robert Fitz-Bernard, with some Forces, to prepare the way for him; while he himself provided a Navy of four hundred Ships well furnish'd with Men, and all Necessaries for the Expedition at Milford Haven; from whence he sailed into Ireland, and arriv'd there eight Miles from Waterford on S. Luke's Eve, Anno 1172. being the third Year after Fitz-Stephen's Invasion. At his first landing his Soldiers caught a White Hart, and presented it to him as a Sign of his Victory. The next day he marched to Waterford, and staid there fifteen days. While he remain'd here, the Kings of Corke, Limerick, Ossery, Meth, and all of any Power in Ireland (except Roderick King of Connaught, who kept himself in the strong Holds of his own Country) came and submitted themselves with all their Clergy to him, taking an Oath of Fidelity to him and his Successors for ever; thus chusing rather to unite with a Stranger in a common Subjection, than with one another to deliver themselves from Slavery, because they had lived long in Enmity. The King went from Waterford to Dublin, where he held a great Assembly of all the Kings, Lords Spiritual and Temporal of Ireland, to assure himself more fully of their Allegiance, and to reform and order all things in the State; which when he had done, he summon'd a Convocation of the Bishops and Clergy at Cassel (to whom he appointed a Chaplain of his own, and the Archdeacon of Landaffe to be Assistants) to reform the Affairs of the Church; for tho' the Irish had been Christians long before, yet they were but a confused and disorderly Church: And therefore it was ordain'd and decreed, 'That all Church-Lands should be freed from the Exactions of Secular Men, and that for the future all Divine Things should be order'd and us'd in every part of Ireland, according to the manner of the Church of England, it being fit (as the Canon saith) that as Ireland had by God's merciful Providence obtain'd a Lord and King out of England, so also they should receive from thence a better manner of living than they had us'd before. The King having thus settled the Kingdom, kept his Christmas at Dublin, where he feasted all the Kings and great Men of the Country, gave Orders for the planting and fortifying of Garrisons where they were needful, made Hugh Lacy Justice of Ireland, and seated him in Dublin to defend it; granting him by his Charter, and his Heirs, the Country of Meth, to hold the same in Fee by the Service of an hundred Knights; to Robert Fitz-Bernard he left the keeping of the Towns of Waterford and Weisford (which he had taken from Fitz-Stephens) with a Charge to build Castles in them; and to humble Earl Strongbow, and level him with the rest of his Subjects, he took from him all his Dependents and made them his. Thus in one Winter was the Kingdom of

The King goes into Ireland to conquer it. 1172.

His Reformation of Ireland.

Ireland made subject to England, and a tolerable Settlement made, tho' it proved not very lasting; because both this, and some succeeding Kings, had such innumerable Diversions that they could not attend to the full Establishment of it.

On the Easter-Monday after he set sail from Ireland into England again, but made a very short stay there, because he had appointed the Pope's Legates, Theodinus and Albertus, to meet them in Normandy, who were sent by Pope Alexander (but in a milder way than formerly) to examine into the Murther of the late Archbishop Becket, where he was wherefore taking with him the young King, he passed over thither. Four Months were spent in debating the Matter, and in Conclusion, the King taking an Oath upon the Holy Evangelists and Saints Reliques in the Presence of his Son Henry, the Archbishop of Rouen, and the rest of the Bishops and Abbots of Normandy in the City of Avranches, That he neither had commanded, nor consented to the said Murther, cleared himself from the Charge brought against him for it: Yet because he feared, that the Persons who did murther him were moved to it either by his Passion or Words, he engag'd himself in Satisfaction for it to perform these following Articles. 1. Never to forsake Pope Alexander, nor his Successors, so long as they treated him as a Catholick King. 2. That he would freely allow Appeals to be made to the Pope in Ecclesiastical Causes, provided, That if any Man be suspected of any ill Designs against the King or Nation, he shall put in Security before his Departure. 3. That he would for three Years go in Person to the Holy Wars, unless hinder'd by the Pope or his Successors, or employ'd against the Sarazens in Spain. 4. That he should put so much Money presently into the Templars hands, as should maintain two Hundred Men in the Holy War for one Year. 5. That he should recal all that had suffer'd Banishment for the Archbishop, and restore his and their Possessions. 6. That he should abolish all Customs which had been introduced in his time, to the Prejudice of the Church. When the King had sworn to the aforesaid Concessions, he made his Son Henry to ratifie the same by Oath, except such as concern'd his own Person; and having set his Seal to them with the Cardinals, he deliver'd them to be kept in the Roman Church. Thus ended this tedious Controversie, which made such a Noise in the World, and Becket tho' he could not conquer the King while he lived, did it by his Death; having gained the Name of a Saint in Heaven by his Sufferings, and a Shrine in the Church, to which his Sovereign Lord must bow himself and pray, or else be thought a worse Enemy to him than ever: So that this obstinate Archbishop was above his Will when alive, and over his Faith when dead. But how good a Man he was may appear by this, that forty eight Years after his Decease, the Doctors of Paris disputed whether he were damn'd or sav'd; and one Roger, a Norman, maintain'd he had justly deserv'd Death, for rebelling against his Sovereign, the Vicegerent of God. After the ending of this Affair, the King, that he might pacifie all Parties, and content the King of France, had his Son Henry crown'd again with his Wife Margaret.

Shortly after these things, the young King

* For Pope Alexander Canoniz'd him soon after this Agreement, and his Shrine was erected at Canterbury by his next Successor but one Stephen Langton, at very great Expence and Charge; and he became so famous a Saint for Miracles (no less than 270 being said to be done at his Shrine) that the Gifts at it Annually were computed worth 600 l. and the Visitants in a Jubilee an hundred thousand.

† In St. Swithin's Church in Winchester. This was done the 27th of August, before the ending of the Affair of Becket's Death; for the King purg'd himself of it at Avranches on the 27th of September following.

A. D. 1172. Henry obtain'd leave of his Father to visit Paris, and his Father-in-Law the French King; where staying some time, he imbib'd those Instructions which kindled his Ambition, and overthrew his Obedience to his Father, being taught there, that to be a King was to have a Supreme Power, and be under none; which he soon put in Practice upon this Occasion. Henry the Father, who was always watchful to lay hold of every Opportunity of advancing his own Greatness and Power, took a Journey in Person to Auvergne, and so to Montferrat<sup>a</sup>; where he purchased a Match at the Price of five thousand Marks for his youngest Son John with Alice the eldest Daughter of Hubert, Earl of Maurienna and Lord of Piedmont and Savoy, with a Condition of having all those Countries, containing many Seigniories, Cities and Castles, after her Father's decease. The King of England also assured to his Son John the Castles of Chinon, Lodun, and Mirabel at Limoges, where he was come after the Conclusion of the Match. While he continu'd here, Raymond Earl of S. Gyles came to him to do him Homage for the Earldom of Tholouse to hold it of him, and his Son Richard Earl of Poitou by Hereditary Right, by the Service of coming unto them upon Summons, and remaining in their Service forty days at their own Charge; and if they detain'd him longer, to be allow'd reasonable Expences: As also to pay Yearly one hundred Marks of Silver, or ten Horses worth ten Marks a-piece. Prince Henry was displeased at his Father's Gift to his Brother John, and the King of France was afraid of his great Power, who now had gotten Dominions all round him: Wherefore observing the Prince's disgust, he put him upon requesting, and that with an Importunity that would not brook a Denial, either the Dutchy of Normandy, Earldom of Anjou or Kingdom of England for his Maintenance, and Exercise of his Kingly Power. The Prince being ambitious put up his Request, and because he was not presently gratified, escapes from his Father, and got to Paris, where he was joyfully receiv'd by the French King, who had no way else to prevent the over-growing Greatness of his Neighbour, but such an unnatural Division; and to strengthen the Breach, summons all the Princes of France, and all the Friends he could make to assist King Henry the Son against the Father, and made them swear, That they would either dispossess King Henry of his Kingdoms, or bring him to their Conditions. The young King likewise swears to them never to make Peace with his Father without their Consent; and to encourage his Assistants, he engag'd to give Philip Earl of Flanders a 1000 l. a Year, with the County of Kent, and Dover and Rocheſter Castles; to Matthew Earl of Bologne, the said Earl's Brother, Kerton Soake in Lindſey, the Earldom of Morton, with the Honour of Heize; to Theobald Earl of Blois b 200 l. a Year in Anjou, the Castle of Amboys, with all his Right in Tweine, which Grants he confirm'd under his Seal, with many others, to his Followers for their Service; to the King of Scots he granted all Northumberland as far as the River Tine, and to his Brother the Earldoms of Huntington and Cambridge. Many discontented Lords both of England and Normandy, who hoped for new Advantages by Changes in State, and a broken Sovereignty, adhered to him; as Robert

Earl of Leicester, Hugh Bigott, Hugh Earl of Chester, Roger Mowbray, &c. to whom he gave several large Promises of the Lion's Skin before he was dead. Queen Eleanor enrag'd for some Injuries done to her Bed<sup>a</sup>, like a furious Alceſto, blows up the Coals of War between the Father and Son; and persuading her two Sons, Richard and Jeffrey, to join in the Rebellion against their Father, made the Confederacy so strong, that the King was left destitute both of Friends and Subjects to defend his Right. Some faithful Ministers he had, yet those but very few; as William Earl of Mandevile, Hugh de Lacy, Hugh de Beauchamp, Humphrey Bobun, and some others: But his People forsook him so generally, that he was forced to hire twenty thousand<sup>c</sup> Brabanſons (which were Mercenary Soldiers, commonly called Routs or Costerells) to maintain and hold his Kingdoms. This happen'd about the 20th Year of his Reign. The King having yet the Bowels of a Father toward his Rebellious Son, sought all ways to heal the Breach, offering him all convenient Allowances for his Estate, and advantageous Conditions of Peace; but all would not do, his Sword was drawn, and nothing would satisfy him but War; and therefore with the King of France his Forces he invades Normandy, and besieges Vernoul, a Place of great Strength and Importance. The King of Scots enters Northumberland, and makes great Havock there. Hugh de Lacy and Hugh de Beauchamp valiantly defended the Castle of Vernoul, and after a Month's Siege, the Citizens (being destitute of Provision) obtain a Truce of the King of France, and a Permission to send for Succours to their King, which if they could not obtain within three days, they would surrender their City, and in the mean time gave him Hostages; and on the other side, the King of France, Prince Henry, and divers other Lords and Bishops swore, That if they surrender'd the City at the day appointed, their Hostages should be restor'd, and no Harm be done to their City. King Henry the Father came with all the Forces he could gather just at the day appointed, and disposes his Army for Battel; but the King of France to avoid it, sends the Archbishop of Sens and Earl of Blois to procure a Parly, which was granted on the Morrow, but lost Vernoul; for the King of France neither came, nor sent to the Parly, but had admittance given him into the Town according to the Covenants, which contrary to his Oath he demolish'd, plunder'd, and taking Hostages remov'd his Camp, and left the King of England disappointed; who being inrag'd at it, pursu'd the flying Army, of which he got some Booty, enters Vernoul, and the next day took the Castle of Danville, with many Prisoners. From hence he marched to Rouen, and there sent his Brabanſons into Britain against Hugh Earl of Chester, and Ralph Fulgiers, who had gotten that whole Country into their Power; but being not able to withstand this Army of the King's in the Field, they with all the great Men of those Parts got into the Castle of Dole, and fortified themselves in it; but the King following in Person besieg'd and took it, and in it about eighty Lords, besides others of Note and Valour, by which Defeat the rest of the Country was brought to yield. By this Success the King's Enemies were so much discourag'd, Young King Henry's Voyage to Paris, and the ill Effects of it.

1173. Reg. 19.

The young King Henry rebels against his Father.

<sup>a</sup> Hovedon drew Daniel into this Mistake. The Father and Son met, according to other Authors, with Hubert Earl of Maurienna (now Part of Savoy) at Glermont in Auvergne; and indeed 'tis very unlikely that King Henry should go so far as Montferrat in Italy, to get a Wife for his Son.

<sup>b</sup> This was done at a great Council held at Paris, where Philip Earl of Flanders, Matthew his Brother Earl of Bulloign, and Theobald Earl of Blois, did Young Prince Henry Homage.

rag'd,

A. D. 1173. Peace, which was appointed between Guifors and Reg. 19. Try. At this Treaty the King of England, tho' every way superiour, was so condescending to his Children for a Pacification sake, that he offer'd to his Son Henry half his Revenues of the Crown of England, with four convenient Castles; or if he had rather remain in Normandy, half the Revenues of that Dukedom, and the whole of the Earldom of Anjou, &c. To his Son Richard he offer'd half the Revenues of Aquitain, and four Castles in it. To Jeffrey the Earldom of Connon, which was to descend to him by his Wife. And if these things were not sufficient, he would submit to the Arbitration of the Archbishop of Tarento, and the Pope's Legates, to add any Allowance which they should in their Judgments think fit, reserving to himself his Royal Authority, and Administration of Justice. But all these fair Proposals did not satisfy: The King of France was for no Agreement, as is plain from the Indignities offer'd to the King at the Treaty; wherein 'tis said, that Robert Earl of Leicester reproached him to his Face, and attempted to draw his Sword at him. So the Meeting ended with quarrelling, and the Armies began their daily Bickerings, tho' the French had the worst. The Earl of Leicester with an Army gets over into England, where he was received by Hugh Bygot into the Castle of Fremingham. Richard de Lucy Chief Justice of England, and Humphry Bohun the King's Constable, being then upon the Borders of Scotland, and hearing of his arrival, made a Truce with the King of Scots, and hasten'd away with their Forces to St. Edmundsbury, where the Earls of Cornwall, Glocester, and Arundel joyn'd with them; and so they went on to encounter the Earl of Leicester at Farnham, whose Army they defeated, killing ten thousand Flemmings, and taking himself, Wife, and several other great Men Prisoners, whom he sent to the King in Normandy. In the mean time the King himself was not idle, but daily got Castles and Forts from his Enemies, until Winter constrain'd him to make a Truce till Easter; which also the Bishop of Durham did with the King of Scots, for three thousand Marks of Silver, to be paid out of the Lands of the Barons of Northumberland.

1174. The Spring being come on, the Truce on all sides being expired, King Henry the Son, and Philip Earl of Flanders, are ready at Graveling with a great Army for England. The King of Scots also entred Northumberland, and sends his Brother David to relieve the small Remainers of the Earl of Leicester's Forces, which held the Town of Leicester, but too late; for Robert de Lucy and the Earl of Cornwall had taken and rased the Town, and seized Robert Mowbray coming to help those who held out in the Castle. King Henry the Father seeing his Son's Preparations for England, draws off his Forces from other Employments, and brings them down to Barbfleet, and so pass'd over to Southampton, with his Prisoners, Queen Eleanor, Margaret his Son Henry's Wife, and the Earls of Leicester and Chester; and from thence he went to Canterbury, to visit his own Martyr, and perform his Vows of Victory; and some write, that when he came in sight of the Church, he alighted from his Horse, and went three Miles barefoot to it; the Stones which cut his Feet receiving bloody Tokens of his Devotion. But in recompence of this meritorious Action, they add, That the same day, when he departed from Canterbury, the King of Scots was conquer'd, A. D. 1174. and taken at Alnwick by some Knights of Tork-shire, viz. Robert de Stuteville, Odonel de Hum-freivile, William de Vesey, Ralph de Glanville, Ralph de Tilly, and Bernard Baliol; and his Son Henry was by Tempests beat back again into France, where Lewis the King of France hearing of his Father's passage into England, and the taking of the King of Scots, call'd him to the Siege of Roan. Henry, after his fit of Devotion was over, being ready for business, soon quieted and settled the disorder'd State of his Nations. For he took the Castles of Huntington, Fremingham, Bungay, Durham, Norham, and Alverton; which Hugh Bygot and the Bishop of Durham resigned to him, upon his granting them his Favour and Pardon. Ralph Mowbray also yielded himself up with his Castle of Treske, Earl Ferrers resigned his Castles of Tutbury, Duffield; one Ankstill, Mallery, and William Drive, Constables of the Earl of Leicester, the Castles of Leicester, Montforill and Groby. So that within three Weeks all things were quiet without Arms. When the King had thus settled England, he being enforced with a thousand Welshmen, went with his Prisoners, the King of Scots, Earls of Leicester and Chester, and passes over into Normandy to relieve Roan. His Welshmen being first sent over the River Seine, made way through the French Camp by their Swords, and got into a Wood, without any loss, slaying an hundred of their Enemies; and so got into the City with the King's Forces, who open'd the Gates to provoke the French King to Battel, but in vain. For Lewis having sent away the weakest of his People before, follow'd after with the rest, by the permission of the King of England; of whom he got leave by the Archbishop of Sens, and Earl of Blois, to depart, under pretence of a Parly to be the next day, which he never perform'd. However the King of France seeing that all his Arts prov'd nothing advantageous, either to himself or his Confederates, he again sends the former Agents to the King of England with the same proffers of Peace, which was at last concluded between him and his Sons, but upon harder Conditions than he had proffer'd at the former; and yet upon such as shew'd the Goodness of his Nature, and Love to his Children: His whole Proceedings in this War proving, that not his Will, but Necessity moved him to Action. At the signing of the Covenant of Peace, when his Son Henry would have done him Homage (which is a Personal Service) he refused it, because he was a King, but of his Sons Richard and Jeffrey he accepted it: Yet Henry, to free his Father from all scruple, swore Fealty to him as a Subject against all Men, in the presence of the Archbishop of Roan, Bishop of Bayeux, Earl of Mandevile, and many others of his Nobility. At the Conclusion of this Peace the Earl of Flanders yielded up to King Henry the Father his Son's Charter of Reward for his Assistance, and had another confirm'd to him for a Pension of a thousand Marks to be paid out of England yearly upon Condition of Homage, and to find the King of England five hundred Soldiers for the space of forty days upon Summons given him. This business being ended, the Kings (Father and Son) took their progress into all the Provinces on that side of the Sea, to visit and reform the Disorders of War, and settle all Affairs; and sent Richard into Aquitain, and Jeffrey into Britain for the same purpose, and settled them there with their Council to take care of their own.

Henry goes barefoot to visit Becket's Tomb, and after settles England.

* At Poitiers on the 23d of September.

A. D. 1175. Shortly after the two Kings, Father and Son, return'd into England, where there was as great necessity of a Reformation of Government both in Church and State as there was in France. The King desirous to compleat both, first had a Council of the Clergy call'd under Richard Archbishop of Canterbury, in which many Enormities of the Clergy were reform'd, as may be seen in the Canons of that Synod. The King supply'd all Vacancies, and gives to John Oxenford (his chief Minister) the Bishoprick of Norwich. Then he took into his hands all the Castles he could seize, and among others the Tower of Bristol, which was surrender'd to him by the Earl of Gloucester, and was never in his hands before. The King also exacted certain Penalties of all, both Clerks and Laymen, who had in the time of the War done any Injuries to the King's Forests, for which he is accus'd of Injustice, because Richard Lucy the King's Justice; had by the King's Warrant, discharg'd them for the same; but the gain, which such Mulcts yielded him, made him the more severe. For after the Death of Alain de Nevill, who had been chief Justice of all the Forests of England, he divided them into several parts, appointing four Justices to oversee every one of them, whereof two were to be Clerks, and two Knights. And over all other Foresters he constituted two of his own Servants to be the Gamekeepers, and gave them power to implead any, according to the Laws of the Forest.

The King being at York, there came to him William King of Scots, with almost all the Nobility, Abbots, and Bishops of his Kingdom, and confirmed the Peace and final Agreement, which had been promised in his Imprisonment at Falaise in Normandy, before all the greatest Personages of both Kingdoms, the Copy of which is in Roger Hovedon. A little after a Council was held at Windsor, to which certain Irish Bishops, and the Chancellor of Rodoricke King of Connaught came, who concluded a firm Agreement for their Master, doing Homage and Fealty, and obliging him to pay a Tribute of one sufficient Hide of every ten Beasts killed within his Kingdom, and those Provinces that held of it. The same Year a Parliament was summon'd to meet at Nottingham, where, by the advice and consent of his Nobles, he caus'd the Kingdom to be divided into six parts, and appointed for each of them three Justices, who were to travel from place to place to administer Justice, causing them to take an Oath upon the holy Evangelists faithfully to observe, and cause to be observed by all his Majesty's English Subjects, the Statutes made at Clarendon, and renew'd at Northampton, concerning Murther, Theft, Robbery, and Receivers of such as were guilty of such Crimes, Frauds, and Burning of Houses; which Facts, if any were found guilty of by the Verdict of twelve Men, they were to pass the Tryal of Water-Ordeal; whereby, if they were not acquitted, their punishment was the loss of a Leg, or Banishment; it being held in that Age a more deterring Spectacle to see a miserable Malefactor alive than dead, for as yet they did not shed Blood in those cases. And yet we find, that in this King's Reign one Gilbert Plumpton a Knight, being accus'd of a Rape, was condemn'd by Ranulph Glanville Chief Justice of England to be hang'd on a Gibbet; but before the Execution, it was discover'd, that Glanville did it out of a design of getting his Wife, a great Heiress, for one Reinor Sheriff of Yorkshyre; and so by the Clamours of the People, and Authority of Baldwin Bishop of Worcester he was saved, till his Innocency was clear'd to the King, who thereupon stopp'd the Sentence. This Act of Injustice leaves a foul Blot upon the Memory of Glanville, though he was a chief Instrument in composing that Body of the Laws and Customs of England that pass under his Name.

The Charge given at the Assizes at this time consist'd but of very few points, besides the Felonies aforesaid, and was especially for taking Homage and Allegiance of the King's Subjects, demolishing Castles, securing the King's Rights of his Crown and Exchequer. The multitude of Actions which arose in succeeding Ages proceed'd from new Crimes, and increasing of Laws and Contests, which were then but in the Cradle. This Year the King of Sicily sent and craved to have the King's Daughter Joanna in Marriage; and Henry having taken the advice of his Parliament, which he call'd on purpose, granted his Request; and shortly after sent her to him, who honourably endow'd her with many Cities and Castles in his Isle. But the great Match which the King had provided for his Son John, was at this time broken off by Death, and he was marry'd to the Daughter of William Earl of Gloucester, by whom he was to have that Earldom. This William was the Son of the famous Duke of Gloucester, who being natural Brother to Maud the Empress, so strenuously assert'd her Right. The same Year he marry'd Eleanor, another of his Daughters, to Alphonso King of Castile, and determin'd a Controversie between him and his Uncle Sanctio King of Navarre, about the detaining of certain parts of each others Kingdom, he being chosen Arbitrator between them. Likewise the Marriage between his Son Richard, and Alice the Daughter of the French King (who was trusted to his Care and Keeping) was again treated on, and urged by the Pope's Legates, to be consummated upon pain of Interdiction; but it was deferr'd, tho' both Kings entred into a perpetual League, both Offensive and Defensive, and vow'd an Expedition into the Holy Land together, which they never liv'd to perform.

The King of France in a dangerous Sickness of his Son Philip vow'd to visit the Sepulchre of Thomas the Martyr of Canterbury, and by a License from the King of England, and promise of safe Conduct, perform'd the same with great Devotion, and gave rich Presents, viz. Offering upon his Tomb a massy Cup of pure Gold, and giving and confirming to the Monks 3600 Sextaries of Wine yearly (a Sextary is two Gallons of English Measure) to be deliver'd to them at Poissi, at the French King's Charge, and besides freed them from all Toll and Custom for whatsoever they should buy in his Kingdom. He stay'd in England three

* The King of the Scots came to York in August, 1175. By this Treaty Roxburgh, Berwick, Gedworth, Edenburgh, and Sterling Castles were deliver'd to King Henry. In this Charter of Peace, which is at large in Hovedon, 'tis expressly mention'd, that the King of Scots did Homage to the King of England for all Scotland. The Council at Windsor was held about Michaelmas, 1175. The Council at Nottingham was held on the 25th of January, in the next Year 1176. They arriv'd about Whitsuntide, Anno 1176. Reg. Hen.

† The Earl of Gloucester left all his Estate to John the King's youngest Son, on Condition he marry'd Hawise the Earl's youngest Daughter. Some Authors place this Marriage in the first Year of Richard III. Anno 1189. Her five eldest Sisters had Penfions allow'd them.

‡ Rad. de Diceto, and others, relate, That the Princess Eleanor, who was then but seven Years old, was marry'd to King Alphonso in 1169.

§ This Controversie was debated and determin'd by the Great Council of the Nation, but the King had the Honour of it, and Judgment was not given till the next Year, 1177.

A. D. Months, and then return'd into France, being 1179. conducted by the King of England to Dover. What Reg. 25. Effect this Journey had upon the Recovery of the Son, 'tis easie to conjecture; but 'tis certain, that it wrought most upon the aged King, who was no sooner come to S. Denis, but he was taken with a Palfie, and died of it within a few days; yet foreseeing his Death, he caus'd his Son to be crown'd, tho' then but fifteen Years of Age, which was done at Reimes, Anno Dom. 1179.

The Duke of Saxony banish'd by the Emperour.

Henry Duke of Saxony, who had married Maud the King's Daughter, was expell'd from his Dutchy, and banish'd by the Emperour Fredericke for seven Years; because he detain'd certain Revenues from the Archbishop of Cologne, which were payable to him out of Saxony, and refused to come to a Tryal about it at the Imperial Chamber, according to his Faith and Promise made to the Emperour: So that he was forced to come with his Wife and Children to his Father-in-Law the King of England for Assistance, and remain'd with him three Years, till the Archbishop of Cologne coming to visit the Sepulchre of S. Thomas of Canterbury, the King so pacified the Archbishop, that he was restor'd to his Dutchy, and a Contract of Marriage made between Richard the King's Son and the Emperour's Daughter; which notwithstanding the Pre-contract made with Alice the French King's Daughter, had been consummated, had not Death prevented. King Henry also sends his Son John to reside in Ireland, thinking that the Majesty of a Court, and Gallantry of his Attendants might both awe and civilize that rude Country; but he being accompanied with many young Men, who had more Wit than Judgment, did more Harm there than Good. For the jocular Courtiers scorning and deriding the Irish for their rude Habits and Fashions so anger'd the Natives, that three of their most potent Kings, viz. of Limerick, Connaught, and Corke, fell into open Rebellion; for as Cambrensis says, 'Tho' Barbarous Nations are ignorant of Honours, yet they affect to be honour'd above measure, and are quickly touch'd and incens'd with any Signs of Disgrace and Contempt, but their Anger was soon allay'd'.

The King's Arts to fill his Treasures and enrich himself.

Henry enjoying now days of Peace, employ'd himself to find out all means possible to fill his Treasury, and watched all Occasions to enrich himself; and the first thing he attempted this way, was this. Roger Archbishop of York dy'd very rich, and in his Sickness dispos'd of very great Sums by Will to godly Uses; which as soon as the King had Intelligence of, he sent Commissioners to seize them for his Use, because as he alledg'd, he had acted against a Canon of his own making; which was, That it is against Law for any Ecclesiastical Person to dispose of any thing by Will, unless before he were sick. The Commissioners in Prosecution of their Office having found out, that Hugh Bishop of Durham had receiv'd three hundred Marks of Silver of the Archbishop's Money to be bestow'd in those Uses, demanded the same for the King; but the Bishop said, 'He had dispos'd of the Money according to the Archbishop's Will to the Leprous, Blind and Hospitals; and in repairing Churches, Bridges and Lame; and if they would have the Money, they must take it of them: Which round Answer so displeased the King, that he seiz'd upon his Castle of Durham, and brought him into many Troubles. The King's Revenues (besides his Demefins and the Benefit of his Forests) were but A. D. small in England, which caus'd him sometimes to 1180. make bold with the Church, and keep the Bi-Reg. 26. shopricks and Benefices vacant, as he did that of Lincoln eighteen Years. He made a new Coin in England, and cry'd down the old, fining all the Corrupters of the Coin very heavily: And because the Charge of Horfe and Armour was very burthenfome to him, to save his own Purse he caus'd every Man's Lands and Estate to be rated for the furnishing out of them. This Method he began to take first in his Dominions beyond Sea; where he order'd, 'That all that had 100 l. of Anjouin Money in Goods and Chattels, should find an Horfe, and all Military Furniture belonging to it; and all that had 40, 30, or 20 l. of Anjouin Money, should find a Croslet, Head-piece, and Sword, or a Bow and Arrows, with a strict Prohibition, That no Man should sell or pawn his Armour, but leave it when he died, to his next Heir: And this Constitution he establish'd in England by the Consent of his Parliament. The King of France and the Earl of Flanders, much liking his politick Invention, made the like Constitutions in their Country. But notwithstanding all his Arts of getting and saving, he could hardly get much more than to supply his large Expences, which he was oblig'd to be at in so large Dominions, for Entertainments, Pensions and Rewards, Buildings and Fortifications, besides his extraordinary Disbursements, which either for Honour or Policy he was forced to; for he was often fain to bribe the Pope's Legates, to make them favourable to him in the Business he had with the King of France, about sending such Supplies to the Holy War, as might be sufficient, and for his Reputation. In the Year 1182. he reliev'd the Necessities of the Christians at Jerusalem with a Royal Bounty, giving them forty two thousand Marks of Silver and five hundred Marks of Gold, which is in our Money 47333 l. 6 s. 8 d. And when Pope Lucius, being reduced to very great Streights by the People of Rome, desired his Assistance, he sent him a very great Sum of Gold and Silver, which he levied of the Clergy, partly at their own Desire: For when the Pope's Nuncio's came to desire the same, they went to the King and advis'd him, 'That he should supply his Wants, as he thought was convenient for his Honour, both for himself and them; because it was better that their King should receive any Imposition laid upon them than the Pope, lest it should be an ill President, and beget a Custom, which may prove of very great Detriment to the Kingdom.

The Peace made between the two Kings, the Father and Son, had now continu'd about eight Years, when a fresh Quarrel broke out between them upon this Occasion, as far as can be gather'd from the uncertain Relations of those Times. In the 29th Year of his Reign he kept his Christmas at Cane in Normandy, and feasted most magnificently his Sons, Henry, Richard, and Jeffrey, with the Duke of Saxony, his Wife and Children, and all the Nobility of those Parts. At this Meeting the King advis'd his Son Henry to take the Homages of his Brothers Richard Earl of Poitou, and Jeffrey Earl of Britain. Richard at first refused to do it, but upon Persuasion offer'd it, but was then refused: Whereupon he departed into Anjou from his Father's Court, to fortifie and furnish his Castles there. The King his Bro-

* Prince John did not go for Ireland till the Year 1185. He was still'd King of that Island, and had a Crown of Peacocks Feathers, interwoven with Gold, sent him by Pope Lucius the 3d.

A. D. 1183. Reg. 29. ther follows him, being put upon it by the Barons of Poitou and Aquitain, who deserted Richard, asensible that he could not long hold his Dominions against his Brother's Power and better Title; and Jeffrey, Earl of Britain, joyned his Forces with the King his Brother. Richard being over-power'd, sent for Assistance to his Father, who immediately came into Poitou, not to make War, but constrain his three Sons to a Peace, with a powerful Army; by which he soon effected it, and brought them to swear Obedience to him, and to live in Peace one with another, which was ratified not long after at Mirabel, and the Barons of Poitou, and Aquitain at the Desire of Henry (who had sworn to defend them against his Brother Richard) included in it, and Richard made to promise them a Pardon for all Acts formerly committed, Jeffrey Earl of Britain being sent to bring them in to joyn in it. But the Barons, judging this Peace either not safe or unprofitable, were so far from complying, that they over-persuaded Jeffrey to assist them against his Father, and kept him with them. Henry the Son notwithstanding, still mediates for them with his Father and Brother, to receive them into Favour; and undertaking to bring them in, with his Brother Jeffrey, is permitted by his Father to go and treat with them at Limoges. The King himself, desirous to confer with his Sons and compose this Quarrel, came, as was agreed, another way: But they both met with an unwelcome Reception, the Father being in very great Danger of being shot twice; and the Son not being able to prevail with them to submit after repeated Tenders of Pardon and Favour. This Obstinacy of the Barons so troubled the young King, that upon his return to his Father, he protested that he would renounce them, if they would not come and yield themselves to his Mercy; and as if he had resolv'd to forsake their Party, gave his Father fresh Assurances of his own firm Adherence to him, by delivering up to him his Horse and Armour. But he continued not in his Fidelity many days; for either thro' the Instigation of some disaffected Ministers about him, or else because he saw his Father intended a severe Revenge upon them, whom he had promised to secure, but he could not do it if he stay'd with him, he again enters into a League with them. But finding his Power to come far short of his Design, and despairing of Success, he burst out into an extravagant Passion before his Father, and falling down before S. Martial's Shrine, vow'd to take upon him the Cross, and give over all Worldly Business, and unless he would give him leave (without which he could not go) he would instantly kill himself. His Father being amaz'd at this sudden and strange Passion, first asked him, Whether any Discontent or Religious Zeal had induc'd him to make this Vow: The Son protests, That it was merely to obtain the Remission of those Sins he had committed against his Person. His Father much dissuaded him from this Purpose; but finding him very obstinate, and resolv'd after all the Arguments he could use, he said unto him, 'Son, God's Will be done, and your's: If you will go, I will take care to fit you out according to your Greatness and State. The Son (while his Father was pliable) besought him to deal mercifully with the Barons, who held out the Castle of Limoges against him; and by Importunity obtained it, upon condition, That they should give him Pledges for their Fidelity for the future, which they seem'd contented to do. But in the Performance of the Condition, some who were against this Peace made such Disturbances, that all former Tenders and Conclusions were broken; and the young Princes fell again into open Rebellion with their Confederates against him, and being made Heads of the Faction, were forced to commit Theft and Sacrilege to support their Adherents. The Father immediately besieges Limoges; and the Son, who was engag'd against him very unwillingly, fell into a Fever and Flux, which was caused by the Grief and Vexation of his Mind, by which in few days he died. A Prince of excellent Parts, but ruin'd by his Father's Indulgence and Rigour; who never suffer'd him to be a King, tho' he made him one by his Coronation, putting those Desires of Majesty in his Heart which he was forced to break, that he might suppress them. The King was extremely grieved at the Death of his Son, but did not desist from his Revenge he had begun against the Barons of Aquitain, whom he furiously prosecuted, seiz'd on their Castles, and rased that of Limoges to the Ground. Jeffrey upon his Submission was again receiv'd into Favour, but dy'd the next Year at Paris, being in a Tournament there trodden to Death by Horses: And thus Henry liv'd to see half his Male-issue extinct before him, and that by Deaths as violent as their Dispositions. The other two indeed surviv'd him, but were no less miserable in their Ends, as this ensuing Story will shew.

Philip the Second, King of France, being now seated upon his Father's Throne (and able to effect more than his Father could) soon after the Death of King Henry the Son, requires that the Country of Vexin, which was given in Dower with his Sister Margaret, should be restored; but the King of England (who never car'd to part with any thing in his Possession) chose rather to pay Yearly seventeen thousand and fifty Pounds Anjouin to Queen Dowager, than to part with it. And because he saw this Prince to be of an high Spirit and very active, and so likely to give him Disturbance in his old Age, he did Homage to him for all his Dominions he had in France (which he never would do to his Father, and was the first time he ever stoop'd to any Earthly Power) and sided with him against Philip Earl of Flanders, a potent Prince in those days; who had always held a fair Correspondence with Lewis, but was at Variance with Philip, because he required of him the Country of Vermandois, as belonging to his Crown, divorcing his Wife, Niece to the Earl, upon an Allegation indeed of Consanguinity, but most for her Relation to him. The Earl being joyned with Odo Earl Burgogne, the Earls of Champagne, Hainalt, Namur, S. Poll, and others, raised War upon Philip, and made such havock in his Country, that he was forced to agree a Peace to his own Disadvantage. Soon after this the Kings of England and France met between Gifon and Try, and the King of England having sworn, that he would deliver Alice the Jeffrey's Death. 1184.

Philip the Second King of France his Contest with King Henry and the Earl of Flanders.

* Rad. de Diceto writes, they were discontented with him for his severe Government.
 * Henry and Jeffrey had seiz'd the Castle of Limoges, and shut out the King; who coming near the Castle to treat with them, the young Princes Guards shot at him, and an Arrow had certainly pierc'd his Heart if his Horse had not by chance toss'd up his Head and receiv'd it in his Forehead.
 * The French Historians affirm he dy'd of a Fever, and that it was not till the Year 1186.
 * It is 1750 l. only in Reg. Hov. Mr. Daniel has corrected it, and made it 17050 Anjouin Pounds; for 1750 l. of that Money would be a small Joynture for a Princess, an English Shilling was then of the same Value with 2 d. of Anjou Money.

A. D. 1185. French King's Sister to his Son Richard to Wife, the King of France granted her in Dower the Reg. 31. Country of Vexin, as her Sister Margaret had before. But these Tyes held not long. The young King of France having contracted so great a Familiarity with Richard the King's Son, that one Bed and Board is said to have held them, so stirred up the Jealousie of the old King, that he sent for his Son home, and caused him to swear upon the Evangelists to preserve his Fidelity to him against all Persons whatsoever. The King of France seeing this, laid hold upon the old Cause to pick a Quarrel, and threaten'd that he would invade and destroy Normandy, unless he would either deliver his Sister to Richard forthwith, or resign Gisors and the Country of Vexin into his hands. The news of this Action brought the two Kings to another Parly between Gisors and Try, to settle matters in difference between them, but never came to any mention of them. For the Archbishop of Tyre (who came from the East to obtain assistance against the Turks in the Holy War) did with that Zeal and Earnestness of Persuasion urge that business, that these two great Princes let fall all Contentions between themselves, and with joynt consent resolved to undertake that laborious and dangerous Expedition against the Infidels.

Philip and Henry's Resolution for the Holy War.

Their Preparations for their Expedition.

A Parliament to raise a Tax for the Holy War.

And now such was the Zeal of these two Kings, that nothing was thought, or talk'd on, but preparations for that War. They agreed to raise each of them a strong Army; and for a mark of Distinction among their Followers and People it was agreed upon, that the King of England should wear a White Cross, the French a Red, and the Flemmings a Green. And as a farther Engagement in this Business, the King of England wrote to the Patriarch of Antioch a most comfortable and pious Letter, concluding with these words: 'That among other Princes, he himself, and his Son, rejecting the Glory of this World, and despising all the Pleasures thereof, in their own Persons, and with all their strength; did intend, God willing, to visit them shortly. To raise Money to defray the great Expence of this Undertaking, it was ordain'd by the two Kings, their Archbishops, Bishops, Earls, and other in both their Dominions in France, that all Persons, as well of the Clergy as Laity, (except only such as went with them) should pay the tenth part of all their Lands for that Year, and of all their Moveables and Chattels, as well in Gold as Silver. And besides they made many excellent Orders for the restraint of all Excesses in Meat, Drink, and Apparel, as was convenient for the Undertakers of so good and devout an Action. The King of England having laid these Impositions upon his Dominions in France, comes over into England, and calls a Parliament of his Bishops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, and others both of the Clergy and Laity, at Gayntington, and by their consent imposes the same Tax upon all his Subjects in England; and presently sends Reg. 32. forth Collectors into every Shire to gather it, as he had done in France. But in all the Cities of England he sought out the Richest Men, as in London two hundred, Tork an hundred, and proportionably in the rest; which at a Time and Place appointed he summon'd to appear before him, and took of them the tenth part of all their Moveables, as they were rated to him by credible Men, who knew their Estates; and if any refused to pay, he imprison'd them till they did: In which Exaction, Piety bore him out, otherwise 'twould not have been endured in those times. The King also sent Hugh Bishop of Duresm, with other Commissioners, to William King of Scots, to collect the like Tenths in his Country; which that King would not allow of, but offer'd to give the King of England five thousand Marks of Silver, and a Castle, which he claim'd, but the King of England refused the same.

Whilst these Preparations were making, and Money collecting, a Quarrel happen'd between Richard Earl of Poitou, and Raymond Earl of Tboloufe, which blasted their whole Design, and that upon this occasion: The Earl of Tboloufe, by the Persuasion of one Peter Suillar, had taken certain Merchants of Aquitain, and used them very hardly. The Earl of Poitou being displeased at it, surprizes Peter, imprisons him, and would not suffer the Earl of Tboloufe to redeem him upon any Condition. Whereupon that Earl imprisons two Gentlemen, Servants of the King of England, Robert and Ralph Poer, who were travelling through his Country, as Pilgrims from St. James of Compostella; which Earl Richard took so ill, that he immediately entred Tboloufe with an Army, which he had prepared for a better design, destroys the Country with Fire and Sword, and took several Castles. The People and Earl of Tboloufe, not able to oppose Richard's Forces, made their Complaints to the King of France, who sends to the King of England to know, whether his Son Richard had done this by his advice or consent? The King answer'd, That he had given neither to his Son; but that his Son had sent him word by the Archbishop of Doublin, that he did it with the consent of the King of France. This that King look'd upon as a delusory Answer; and therefore presently enters Berry, seizes on that Country, and takes divers Castles belonging to the King of England. This Act of Hostility broke all measures laid for the Holy War, and they fell into open and violent Wars between themselves. The Pope by his Legates, and many other Princes, endeavour'd to reconcile these enraged Kings, and brought them to many interviews, but all to no purpose; they went away usually greater Enemies than they came. The Pope's Legates looking upon the French King the cause of this lamentable Breach, threaten'd him, unless he would make a Peace with the King of England, to interdict him; but the French King told them, he feared not their Sentence, being grounded upon no Equity, and it not belonging to the Church of Rome by any Sentence to hinder the King of France from chastizing his Rebellious Subjects; and added, That they smelt of the Sterlings of England. This produced a worse effect than any thing that had hitherto been done. For the King of England upon this Occasion utterly refusing to give Alice, the French King's Sister, to Richard, tho' he offer'd to give her to his Son John with larger Conditions, so angered his Son Richard, that he fell to the King of France, did Homage to him for the Dukedom of Aquitain, and joyn'd his Forces with him against his Father. This quite broke the Heart of the King of England, and as if he had been wholly deserted of his ancient Courage, as well as of many of his Subjects, buckles to any Conditions, leaves the Defence of Mans, (which he had undertaken by Oath never to forsake, by reason it was the Tomb of his Father) and flies away with seven hundred Men; and afterward did Homage to the King of

A. D. 1189. France for all his Dominions on that side the Sea, renders up Alice to his Son Richard, upon Condition she should be marry'd to him when he return'd from the Holy War, and in the mean time to remain in the Custody of any one of such five as the King of England should nominate; grants Fealty should be given to Richard of all his Dominions, and pardons all his adherents, covenants to pay the King of France twenty thousand Marks in Silver, as a reparation of the Damages he had sustain'd the last War. And as if he had been affrighted out of his Reason and Wit at those Thunderclaps, which are said to have happen'd at some Interviews between himself and King of France, he permitted, that in case he should not perform these Articles, his Barons should swear to renounce him, and betake themselves to the King of France and Earl Richard; and for more security, he yielded up the Cities of Mons and Turain, with divers other Castles into their hands, &c. And thus having concluded this business, he ended also his Life three days after, the greatness of his Heart not being able to stoop under the weight of his declining Fortune, and therefore with grief and sorrow broke. Some few hours before he dy'd he saw a List of their Names, who had conspired against him with the King of France and his Son Richard; and finding among them his Son John to be the first, he fell into a very extravagant Passion, cursing his Son's and his own Birth, and in that Fit of Anger departed the World, which he had so often disturb'd, having reign'd thirty five Years, seven Months, and five Days. After he was dead, and was carrying to be buried (adorned, according to the manner of Kings, with all Royal Ornaments open fac'd) when his Son Richard drew near his Body, the Blood gushed out of the Nostrils (which being usually noted, as a Sign of Guiltiness) may rightly be accounted as a Voice of Nature giving notice of the Wrongs and unnatural Offences Richard had done to him, which was so interpreted by Richard himself, for at the Sight of it being surpriz'd, he is said to have burst out into extream Sorrow and Lamentations. He had by his Wife Eleanor several Children, viz. four Sons; Henry, Richard, Jeffrey, and John, besides two, viz. William the eldest, and Philip the youngest but one, which dy'd young; and three Daughters, viz. Maud, married to Henry Duke of Saxony, Eleanor, who was given to Alphonso VIII. King of Castile, and Joanna, who was married to William King of Sicily. He had also two Natural Sons by his Concubine Fair Rosamond, Daughter of Walter Lord Clifford, viz. William surnam'd Longespee or Long-Sword, and Jeffrey Archbishop of Tork, who after five Years Banishment in his Brother King John's time, died Anno Dom. 1213. The other Son William Longespee, who was Earl of Salisbury in Right of Ela his Wife, Daughter and only Heiress of William Earl of Salisbury, Son of Patrick, had Issue William Earl of Salisbury, and Stephen Earl of Ulster, Ela Countess of Warwick, Ida Lady Beauchamp of Bedford, and Isabel Lady Vesey. It is said, that King Henry had a third Natural Son call'd Morgan, by the Wife of one Rodolph Bloeth, or Blewit, a Knight. He liv'd to be Provost of Beverly, and was elected to the Bishoprick of Durham; and coming to Rome for a Dispensation (because his Bastardy made him incapable of it) the Pope advis'd him to profess himself as Blewit's Lawful Son, and not the King's Natural, promising him to consecrate him on that Condition; but he (by the Counsel of one William Lane his Chaplain) told the Pope plainly, that he would not renounce his Father, or deny himself to be of the Royal Blood to gain the greatest Earthly Promotion.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Henry II.

IN the 6th Year of his Reign thirty German Hereticks came into England to propagate their Opinions: One Gerard was their Teacher. They said they were Christians, but deny'd Baptism, the Lord's Supper, and Matrimony; for which they were condemn'd by a Council of Bishops at Oxford, and deliver'd over to the Secular Power to be punish'd: Accordingly they were mark'd in the Forehead with a red hot Iron, whipp'd and thrust out of Doors naked in the midst of Winter: Where none daring to relieve them, an Order having been publish'd to the contrary, they dy'd of Hunger and Cold, and were the first that ever suffer'd for Heresie in England.

In his 14th Year Robert Bishop of Lincoln dy'd, and the King kept his See vacant seventeen Years, himself all that while receiving the Revenues of that Diocess. Hol.

In his 18th Year a mighty Tempest happen'd in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and three Men were kill'd by Thunder and Lightning, at Andover in Hampshire, on Christmas-Day. Hol.

The same Year as King Henry was about to take Horse at Cardiffe in Glamorganshire, an Apparition appear'd to him; and having threaten'd him with some dreadful Plagues if he did not amend his Life, it vanish'd. Ibid.

The next Year this Infamous Collect was order'd to be us'd in all Churches in the Province of Canterbury, to expiate the Guilt of Becket's Murther.

Be favourable, good Lord, to our Supplication and Prayer; that we which acknowledge our selves guilty of Iniquity, may be deliver'd by the Intercession of Thomas thy Blessed Martyr and Bishop. Ibid.

In his 23d Year it rain'd Blood in the Isle of Wight for two days. Ibid.

In his 26th Year, on the 18th of June, after Sun-set, the New Moon then shining out fair with her Horns to the East, the upper Horn on a sudden seem'd to be divided into two; out of which there appear'd to rise a burning Brand, casting forth Sparks and Flames as if it had been on fire. The Body of the Moon seem'd to wriggle like an Adder that is beaten: It did so above twelve times, and then turn'd black. In September, the Moon being about twenty seven days old, at six a Clock a Partile Eclipse of the Sun happen'd; its Body appear'd to be horn'd, the Horns shooting towards the West, as the Moon does at twenty days old: The rest of it was cover'd with a black Roundel, which coming down by little and little, threw about the horn'd Brightness that remain'd, till both the Horns hung down on either side towards the Earth; and as the black Roundel went a little forwards, the Horns turn'd to the West, and the Blackness passing away, the Sun recover'd his former Brightness. Hol.

In the Christmas Holidays, Anno 1179. the 26th of Henry II. says Rog. Hov. near Derlington, in the Bishoprick of Durham, at a place call'd Oxen-Hall, the Earth rais'd it self up like a lofty Tower, and remain'd several Hours in that posture; on a sudden it sunk down again with a horrid Noise, and the Earth so suck'd it in, that it made there a deep Pit, which continues to this day. And Mr. Camden, in his Britannia, new Edit. p. 774. supposes it to be the Wells that are now call'd Hell-Kettles.

In the Year 1185. there was so great an Earthquake as overthrew the Church of Lincoln, and other Churches. There was also almost a total Eclipse of the Sun.

In the 34th Year of his Reign a Crucifix was seen in the Air at Dunstable, and Streams of Blood seem'd to flow out of the Wounds of the Feet, Hands and Side; 'twas visible several Hours. Hol.

In the last Year of this King, Mr. Holinshead (who is apt to take too much notice of these things) reports, That the Fish leap'd out of the Water in a Pool in Normandy, and fought together on dry Land, with such noise as drew the neighbouring People to behold this Wonder; which, it seems, was in the Night-time.

Men Famous in Arms in this King's Reign were

Robert Earl of Leicester, Hugh Bygot Earl of Norfolk, Reginald Earl of Cornwall, Robert Ferrers Earl of Derby, Richard Lacy, Roger Mowbray, Ralph de Fulgiers, Humphry Bobun Constable of England, William Vesey and Bernard de Baliol.

Those that follow were Renown'd for their Learning, Viz.

Ralph Glanville the Lawyer, Nicholas Breakspear, who was Pope by the Name of Adrian the Fourth, Gilbert de Sempringham, John Serlo, surnam'd Grammaticus, Abbot of Fountains, John Prior of Hagulstad or Hexam in Northumberland.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF RICHARD I.

Richard began his Reign, July 6.

A. D. 1189.
Reg. I.

RICHARD, surnam'd Cœur de Lion, Earl of Poitou, (born at Oxford) succeeded his Father in all his Dominions, and first seizes upon his Treasures in France, which being then in the Custody of one Stephen Thurnham, Seneschal of Normandy, he imprison'd the Treasurer, that he might by Severities extort the full Sums in his Hands; which having gotten, he departed to Roan, where he was girded with the Sword of Normandy, by Walter Archbishop there, and took Fealty of the Clergy and Laity. Then he went to the King of France to agree with him about the Restitution of some parcels of his Dominions, which had been taken from his Father in the late Wars, which he obtain'd not by his old Friendship, but his Money; and to confirm a lasting Amity between them, he gave his Niece Maud, the Daughter of the Duke of Saxony, to Jeffrey the Earl of Perch's Son. While he continu'd in France to settle his Affairs there, Queen Eleanor his Mother, whom he had freed from a long Imprisonment of twelve Years, and put into Power in his absence, endeavour'd to prepare his People's Affections for his coming into England, by issuing out Pardons, and relieving Oppressions; and at last went to meet him at Winchester, and welcome him into England. Soon after his arrival (besides the great Sum which came to him by his Father's Treasure, which is said to have been nine hundred thousand Pound in Death of Jeffrey Riddle Bishop of Ely, dying intestate, three thousand and sixty Marks of Silver, and two hundred and five of Gold, which befel him in a fit season to defray the Charge of his Coronation, which was perform'd a little after, viz. September 3. 1189. at Westminster by Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury. On his Coronation there happen'd an unlucky Accident, which stain'd that Day with Blood. The Jews inhabiting about the Cities of London and Westminster, desirous to gain the Favour of the new King, came to offer their Presents, as an afflicted People in a strange Country; but the Rabble, who before were incens'd against them, set upon them, and in a tumultuous manner so used them, that they lost both their Lives and Money; and their Example was follow'd in the Towns of Norwich, St. Edmundsbury, Lincoln, Stamford, and Lin.

The Jews massacred.

His Expedition into the Holy Land, and his Provisions for it.

After his Coronation he resum'd the Thoughts of his Expedition to Jerusalem, and resolv'd to go through with it. The great Treasure which was left him by his Father was not thought sufficient to defray the Expence of that Action, and therefore he contriv'd all the Ways he could to raise more Money. And first he sold many of the Crown-Lands both to the Clergy and others: Godfrey de Lucy Bishop of Winchester bought two Manours, Weregrave and Menes; the Abbot of St. Edmundsbury the Manour of Mildball for a thousand Marks of Silver; the Bishop of Durham the Manour of Sadborough, with the Palatinate Dignity of the whole Province, which gave occasion to that Jocosse Speech of his concerning that Bishop, That he was a cunning Workman, that could make a New Earl of an old Bishop. He also granted to William King of Scots the Castles of Berwick and Roxborough for ten thousand Marks, and gave him a Release from those Covenants made and confirmed by Charter to King Henry II. as extorted from him by force while he was a Prisoner; but reserving to himself such Rights as were and had been perform'd by his Brother Melcolm to his Ancestors the Kings of England. Farther, pretending that his Signet was lost, he made a new one, and put out a Proclamation, That whoever would enjoy peaceably the Grants made under the former Seal, must have them confirm'd by the New; by which means he brought in great Sums of Money to the grief of his Subjects. Then he procur'd a Power from the Pope of dispensing with such Persons as had vow'd to take the Cross, and were not willing to go, he got great Fines of them. All which Momes he levy'd with great Expedition, because the King of France in November after his Coronation, had sent the Earl of Perch, with other Commissioners, to acquaint King Richard, that in a general Assembly at Paris he had solemnly sworn upon the Evangelists to be ready at Tours, with all his Princes and People who had undertaken the Cross, upon Easter-day following, and from thence to set forward to the Holy Land; and to assure him of this his Resolution, he sent a Charter of their Agreement, desiring the King of England to send him the same assurance to meet him at the same Time and Place; which the King did at a general Assembly held at London. In December, the King, having stay'd but four Months in England after his Coronation, departs into Normandy, kept his Christmas at Rouen; and presently had a Conference with the King of France at Reims, where both themselves, and most of the Nobility of both Kingdoms, enter'd into a firm Peace and Union one with another, to preserve each other, and their Estates; and agreed upon many Orders for their Journey. These things being settled, Richard sent for Queen Eleanor his Mother, his Brother John, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Winchester, Durham, Norwich, Bath, Salisbury, Ely, Chester, and others, who came unto him at Rouen, where he committed the chief Charge of the Kingdom to William Longchamp Bishop of Ely, under the Title of Chief Justice of England, and gave him one of his Seals, and the Custody of the Tower of London; and conferr'd upon Hugh Bishop of Durham the supream Command of the North, from Humber to Scotland, and the keeping of Windsor-Castle, which proved after a cause of Quarrel between these two ambitious Prelates, who were impatient of each others Greatness. Hugh Bardulph, William Marshall, Jeffrey Fitz-Peter, and William Brewer, were joyn'd in Commission with the Bishop of Ely. The King knowing the ambitious Mind of his Brother John, dare not trust him in the Commission; but lest he should cause any Disturbance in his absence, he caus'd him to take an Oath, that he would not come into his Kingdom of England for the space of three Years next following; and that he might be oblig'd the more to behave himself peaceably, he conferr'd upon him the Earldoms of Mortaigne, Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorset, Somerset, Nottingham, Darby, and Lancaster; which, with the Earldom of Glocester, the Honour of Wallingford, Ticbill, and Eye, and Castles of Marlborough and Lutgersal, which he had by his Wife Isabel, Daughter of the Earl of Glocester, made him a very great and powerful Prince; but were so far from contenting his Mind, that they only increas'd his Desires of more, and made him a dangerous Subject, whenever an opportunity should offer. The King having thus provided for the Safety of his Kingdom, and Government of it, sends the Bishop of Ely his Vice-Roy over England; and to make his Reputation the greater, he procur'd of the Pope to make him his Legate over all England and Scotland; confining the Archbishop of Tork, his Base Brother, to Normandy, till his return, lest he also through Emulation might molest his Kingdom: And being thus secur'd, commanded him to provide what Necessaries he could for his intended Voyage. The Bishop of Ely furnish'd with this ample Authority, begins his Reign with much Zeal for his Master's Service, but Offence to the People, whom he grievously oppress'd by his rigorous Exactions: For he took from every City in England four Horses of Service, and of every Abby one; and so of all the King's Manours. And to shew how he would prove, he took the Castle of Windsor from the Bishop of Durham, and confin'd him within his Town of Howedon, questioning his Authority, and depressing him; notwithstanding he made his Application to the King himself.

The Government in his absence committed to the Bishop of Ely.

The Vice-Roy sent into England to provide for his Majesty's Voyage.

The King having now gotten all things ready for his Expedition, and order'd his Navy to convey his People and Provision to the Holy Land; and the Charge of which he committed to the Archbishop of Auxerre, Bishop of Bayon, Robert de Sa- bul, and Richard Canville; he set forward with

The King's setting out for the Holy Land, and Voyage to Sicily.

* Sadbery. Roger Hoveden says, he sold him the Earldom of Northumberland.

The King of France, who had taken Ship at Genoua, was likewise driven by Tempest upon the same Isle. They were forced both to winter there, because the French King's Ships were so shatter'd by the Tempest, that they could not go farther till repaired, and Richard expected his own Navy, which caused great Troubles to the Isle, as well as themselves, the English and French not agreeing. William late King of Sicily, who marry'd Joanna the King of England's Sister, was dead, and Tancred, Base Son of Roger, William's Grandfather, was invested in the Kingdom, contrary to the Will of the late King, and the People's Oath to Constantia, the lawful Daughter of the said Roger, who was marry'd to Henry the eldest Son of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa. This Match created Tancred very powerful Enemies, against whose Force he could hardly hold his Kingdom; but after the King of England's coming he much strengthen'd himself, by making a League with that King, to defend him and his Kingdom, upon Condition he should pay his Sister twenty thousand Ounces of Gold for her Dower, and twenty thousand more upon a Match between Arthur Earl of Britain, his Brother Jeffrey's Son, and then Heir of his Crown, and Tancred's Daughter.

At the beginning of the Spring the two Kings having entred into a new League, and signed several Articles and Agreements of Peace, as their Contests in the Isle oblig'd them to, the King of France first sets forward to the Holy Land; but the King of England being detained by the coming of his Mother Eleanor, which brought Berengera, Daughter of the King of Navarre, to be affianced to him, stay'd upon that account till Whitsuntide after, when the Queen return'd home, and the King with his Sister, the Queen Dowager of Sicily, and the young Lady, proceeded on his Journey with an hundred and thirty Ships, and fifty Gallies. In his way he was by a Tempest driven upon the Isle of Cyprus, and being deny'd entrance, he beset the Isle on all sides, assaulted and took it; and placing Garrisons in it, he committed the Custody of it to Richard de Canville and Robert de Turnham, taking half the Goods of the Inhabitants from them, to confirm the use of their own Laws. And here our Histories say, that he marry'd the Lady Berengera, and had her crown'd Queen. From hence passed this Famous King to the Holy Land, loaden with the Spoils and Treasure of three noble and rich Islands, England, Sicily, and Cyprus, besides what he had gotten out of Normandy and Guien, which he consumed there, tho' to the great Honour of our English Nation, by his Heroick Actions, of which before I come to give an account, I shall give a short Relation of the State of Affairs in Asia, which drew these two potent Princes from the utmost Borders of Europe to venture themselves, and spend their Revenues there.

It was now eighty four Years since Godfrey of Boloinne, Duke of Lorraine, with the Confederate Princes, and their Associates, had recover'd the City of Jerusalem, with the Country of Palestine, and a great part of Syria, out of the hands of the Sarazens; and having obtain'd the Government of it by Election, was crown'd with a Crown of Thorns, in imitation of our Saviour, but reign'd but one Year. Baldwin his Brother succeeded him, and govern'd eighteen Years, and was succeeded by Baldwin de Burgo, who, having ruled thirteen, dy'd, and left only one Daughter, and the Kingdom in Dissention. Fulke Earl of Anjou coming three Years before, marry'd this Daughter, and enjoy'd the Kingdom eleven Years, leaving two young Sons by her, Baldwin and Almericke, who successively inherited their Father's Throne, and had it, the first twenty four, and the other twelve Years. This last left a Son of his own Name to succeed him; but he having no Issue, made Baldwin his Nephew, Son to his Sister Sybil, who was marry'd to the Marquis of Montferrat, his Heir, committing the Charge of him and Kingdom in his younger Years to Raimond Earl of Tripolis. But Guy of Lusignan, who after the Death of the Marquis of Montferrat, marry'd Sybil his Widow, soon put him from his Charge, not so much for any Love he had to the young Prince, as his Kingdom, which he first got the Administration, and then the Possession of, by poisoning (as was supposed) the young Prince. Raymund endeavour'd by Arms to regain his Trust, and put Guy of Lusignan so hard to it, that he was forced to beg the assistance of Saladine Sultan of Egypt, who glad of this occasion to increase his own Dominions, destroy'd them both, and gain'd their Kingdom; taking the Cities of Ptolomais, Afotus, Berytus, Ascalon, and after one Month's Siege Jerusalem it self, eighty eight Years after it had been conquer'd by Godfrey. Against this mighty Prince, who was not only an Experienced Commander, and Ruler of very large Dominions, but flush'd with Victories over the Christians, did these two Kings, with an Army of several Nations, viz. English, French, Italians and Germans, march; and at their first arrival sat down before Acon, a City of Judea, defended by Saladin against the Christians, who had besieged it three Years. Many worthy Princes and noble Persons had lost their Lives before it, viz. Conradus Duke of Suevia, the Emperor Frederick's Son, the Earls of Perch, Puntif, and Blois, Stephen Earl of Sancerre, Bertoldus Duke of Germany, and Roger and Joselin Earls of Apulia; and of England, Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, Robert Earl of Leicester, Ralph de Glamvile Chief Justice of England, Richard de * King Richard took the City of Messina.

* Jeffrey Vinesauf, a Learned Historian of those Times, and the Author of King Richard's Travels to Jerusalem, writes, That he gave him twenty thousand Ounces more, to be free from all other Demands for the Plate, and other Rich Moveables, belonging to the late King, Husband to King Richard's Sister Joanna. The same Authors relate, That Richard divided this vast Sum with the King of France, Philip the August, his Fellow-Traveller, tho' he had no manner of Pretensions to any part of it.

* During his stay in this Isle he is said to have given himself much to Religious Offices and Duties, confessing his Sins, leading a very circumspect and pious Life; and sending for the Abbot Joachim from Calabria to hear him preach, because he was had in great esteem for his Learning, Holiness, and Prophetick Spirit. In a Sermon before King Richard, the Abbot is said to have deliver'd, That the Pope was Antichrist.

* It drove him first into Crete, then into Rhodes, where he stay'd ten Days; and the Ship, wherein the Lady Berengera was, being driven into the Port of Limezun in Cyprus, the King follow'd her thither.

* On the 12th of May, 1191. they were marry'd by John Bishop of Exeter.

* Some other Noble Persons are remember'd by our Historians to have perish'd in this Holy Expedition, whose Posterity yet flourish, as Ingelram de Viennes, the Ancestor of the Right Honourable the Lord Say and Seal, the Lord Dacres, Theophilus Clinton Earl of Lincoln, whose Arms still retain the Badges of the Holy War, Stars, Crestants and Crosses; as also St. John, Minsbul, Tilney, &c.

A. D. 1191. Reg. 2. Clare and Walter de Kime; but all in vain, till the United Forces of these two Kings, after three Months Siege more, forced them to surrender upon Articles*. At the Entrance into the City, after it was taken, the Ensign of Leopold Duke of Austria, which he had set upon the Wall, was order'd to be pull'd down by King Richard, and the two Kings Standards to be set up; which being ill resented, was afterwards the Cause of the King's great Misfortune. Besides, during the Siege the two Kings themselves had several Differences concerning Richard's Marriage with Berenguela, and rejecting the French King's Sister, about dividing the Spoils of their Voyage; which, by their Agreement, were to be parted equally: For the King of France claim'd his half in Cyprus, and Richard his Share in the Earl of Flanders's Goods and Estate, which the King of France had seiz'd; and lastly, about the Crown of Jerusalem, which was pretended to by Conradus, Marquis of Monferrat, and Guy of Lusignan, who married Sibilla, the Sister of the late King, and was in Possession of the Kingdom. The King of England took Guy's Part, and the King of France Conrad's. Thus these two Kings liv'd in continual Jars, till a dangerous Sickness through the Heat and Contagion of the Country, put an end not to them only, but almost to their Lives. As soon as they were recover'd, the King of France resolves to return home, where he knew was less Danger and more Honour than there; especially by the Death of the Earl of Flanders, whose bordering Countries he had a mind to add to his Kingdom: And therefore desires the King of England's Leave (for by their Agreement, it was not lawful for them to depart without each other's Leave) to return home. King Richard was very hardly prevail'd with to grant it, being sensible of the Trouble he might create his Dominions in his absence: But at length, by earnest Solicitations and Promises made by the King of France not to molest his Countries in France, he obtain'd his Desires, and so departed, leaving the Earl of Burgogne Lieutenant of his Forces. Richard soon after he was gone besieg'd Ascalon, and wrote invective Letters against the King of France for leaving him; and on the other side, the French King to be even with him, defam'd Richard among his Neighbours at home. King Richard staid ten Months longer, consuming both his Men and Treasure with great Valour, but little Success; the Earl of Burgogne by his Master's Instructions, proving always an Impediment in Matters of Importance, till his Death, which at length happen'd at Acon. Conradus, who was so much favour'd by the King of France in his Title to the Kingdom, was murder'd by two Assassins, not without the Concurrence (as was falsely supposed) of the King of England. The Earl of Champagne marry'd his Widow, who was Sister to Queen Sibilla, and was by King Richard prefer'd to the Crown of Jerusalem, and Guy of Lusignan (the other Pretender to it) he made King of Cyprus, and so gave Content to them both.

While these things were doing in the East, England suffer'd much at home under the Government of Longchamp, who assuming the whole Regal Authority to himself, and excluding both the Nobility and the Commissioners whom the King had joyn'd with him, did act so arbitrarily A. D. and insolently, that he became odious to the 1192. whole Kingdom, as well Clergy as Laity; which Reg. 3. concurring with the Prejudice the English had against him as a Frenchman, and Envy for his excessive Grandure and Pride, begat a general Opposition to his Proceedings; which being encourag'd by Earl John, who study'd all ways to make himself popular, and usurp the Kingdom, soon brake out upon this Occasion. Jeffrey, Archbishop of York Elect, base Son to Henry the Second, whom Richard, who was averse to any Preferment of him in England, had confin'd to Normandy during his absence, obtain'd by great Labour of Pope Celestine a Licence to be invested in that See, and for that end come into England. The Chancellor Longchamp having Intelligence of his Arrival, met him at Dover to apprehend him; but the Archbishop escap'd to the Church to secure himself: Longchamp pursued him to the very Altar, and in a barbarous manner drawing him from thence in his Pontifical Vestments imprison'd him in the Castle. This Action gave just Cause of Offence not only to Earl John, but all the Bishops; who thereupon commanded the Chancellor not only to release him, but also to answer the Matter before the Assembly of Bishops and Nobles, which should meet for that purpose at St. Paul's. Here divers Articles of heinous Offences, committed contrary to the Commission given him, and the Interest of the King and Kingdom, were exhibited against him. The Archbishop of Roan also, and William Marshall Earl of Striguile, openly shew'd them the King's Letters Patents, dated at Messina in Sicily, wherein they were made Commissioners with him in the Government of the Kingdom; but alledg'd, That he never would permit them to manage any publick Business, but took upon him to do as he thought fit. Whereupon in the end, he was by the Assembly<sup>a</sup> depose from his Office, and the Archbishop of Roan, who would do nothing without the Concurrence and Advice of the Peers, put in his Place; to whom the Tower of London, Castle of Windsor, and Legantine Power, was by him also unwillingly resign'd. Longchamp deserv'dly thus stripp'd of all his Power and Greatness, endeavour'd to make his Escape to the King in the Habit of a Woman, with a Parcel of Linen Cloth under his Arm; but being discover'd at Dover, he was rudely used by the People, and made Prisoner in the Castle, till Earl John released him within eight days, and suffer'd him to go on in his intended Journey; by which being the Messenger of his own Misfortunes, he had the advantage of his Adversaries, and mightily incens'd the Pope against them, because they had so villified the Legantine Power, which he was very tender of. Soon after his Departure Earl John, the Archbishop of Roan, and the other Justices of the King granted unto the City of London their Immunities, and the Citizens swore Fealty to King Richard and his Heirs; and if he dy'd without Issue, they promised to receive Earl John for their King, and swore likewise Fealty unto him against all Men, reserving their Faith to King Richard. In so great Forwardness was John for his Brother's Crown, while he besieg'd Ascalon, and grapp'd with Saladine in the East.

* The Author of King Richard's Travels to Jerusalem affirms, That 300000 Pilgrims perish'd in this Siege.

<sup>a</sup> These Assassins were a precise Sect of Mahometans, dwelling together in six Cities near Antaradus in Syria; being about 40000 in Number; govern'd by one Chief Master, a Saracen Emir, whom they call'd, The Old Man of the Mountains. At his Command they were ready to undergo any dangerous Attempts, and would stab any Prince whom he appointed them to Death. Full. Holy War, out of M. Paris and Paul Aemilius. These Assassins were two young Saracens, whom he kept in his Service.

<sup>c</sup> He came from a mean Original, being only a Farmer's Son, and in his great Dignity affected a very unbecoming Grandure; for he had 1500 in his Retinue, as Wolsey had a 1000, and had all things else proportionable.

A. D. 1192. But Richard was not so intent upon Victory over the Infidels, but that he was as careful to keep what he was in Possession of; wherefore hearing of the Proceedings in England, and that the King of France had taken Gisors, and the Country of Vexin contrary to his Oath, he embrac'd Salaadin's Proffer of a Truce for three Years upon Condition, That he should restore Ascalon to the same State wherein he found it before the Siege, which was done by the Advice of the Templars, and the whole Army; and presently leaving his Wife, Sisters, and People, to come after him as fast as they could conveniently, he took Ship<sup>a</sup> in three Gallies with some few Attendants, and hasten'd into England: In their Passage they pretended themselves to be Pilgrims; but the King was soon discover'd by his lavish Expences, and began to be valu'd by the Masters of the Vessels as a Prize; which when he had notice of, he left his Company, and with one Man only pass'd on Horseback through wild Deserts and a Rocky Country Day and Night into Austrich; where Fame having given notice of his coming, he was taken in a poor Inn asleep, by means of his Companion, and brought before Leopold the Duke of Austrich; who glad of this Opportunity, to revenge the Disgrace he had receiv'd from Richard at the entering of Acon, seiz'd upon him, and sent him (or rather sold him for sixty thousand Marks) to the Emperour Henry VI. whom likewise he had anger'd by assisting Tancredi, the base Son of Roger, in the Usurpation of the Crown of Sicily against Constantia, the Lawful Daughter of the said Roger, whom this Emperour had married. The News of Richard's Misfortune was soon dispersed into the adjoining Countries. The Emperour sent word to the King of France of it, that he might rejoice with him; because, as he said, he had gotten the Enemy of the Empire, and Disturber of the Kingdom of France into his Power. England much lamented the Captivity of their Magnanimous King, and endeavour'd all ways possible to obtain his Release, but it could not be effected for a whole Year and six Weeks; tho' he clear'd himself of the Scandals laid on him for the Death of Conradus, the Emperour's Kinsman, and other his Actions in the East, and resign'd his Kingdom of England to the Emperour, in the Presence of the German and English Nobility, to hold it of him by the Annual Tribute of 50000 l. Sterling to obtain his Freedom; because Earl John, his Brother, and the King of France, offer'd the Emperour great Sums to keep him Prisoner, and intended by their continual Bribes to keep him in perpetual Imprisonment, that John might be establish'd in all his Dominions with no small Advantage to the King of France: For to that end Earl John did Homage to the King of France for England, Normandy, and all the rest of the Transmarine Provinces, resign'd Gisors and the Country of Vexin to him, and swore to marry his Sister Alice, and to be divorc'd from his other Wife the Earl of Gloucester's Daughter; and the King of France on the other side, covenanted to give him with his Sister that part of Flanders, which he had taken from that Earl-dom, and swore to assist him in gaining England, and the other Dominions of his Brother. After this, John went over into England with an Army of French and Flemmings, had the Castles of Wallingford and Windsor surrender'd to him presently; and coming to London, requir'd the Archbishop of Rouen, and the other Commissioners for the Kingdom of England, to do Homage and Fealty to him; affirming, That his Brother was dead: But they not giving Credit to his Words, and denying his Desire, provok'd his Passions so much, that he fortified his Castles, and with Force of Arms invaded the Revenues and Lands of the Crown, finding many to joyn with him in the Attempt. The Queen-Mother, Justices of England, and all the King's faithful Subjects guard and defend the Ports against the Invasion of the French and Flemmings, who came over in great Numbers to aid and help Earl John, and more earnestly fought to redeem the King; for whose Ransome the Emperour requir'd an hundred thousand Marks, and to find fifty Gallies and two hundred Men to attend his Service in the Holy Wars for one Year. Nor did the Officers and Subjects of the King in France defend his Dominions in Normandy with less Courage and Fidelity against the King of France, who with all his Power labour'd to subdue them, and by large Offers to the Emperour to prolong his Redemption and enhance his Ransome: Yet such was the good Opinion that his Subjects had of him, and their Love they bear to him for his Valour and Piety, that by their Importunities they brought the Emperour to a Composition for his Freedom in this manner. That he should send his Commissioners to London, and receive an hundred thousand Marks of pure Silver of Co-logne Weight, to be seal'd up and convey'd to the Bounds of the Empire at the Hazard and Charge of the King of England, and that seven Months after he should pay fifty thousand Marks more of Silver (of which twenty thousand were for the Duke of Austrich, and thirty thousand for the Emperour) and Hostages to be given in the mean time, sixty to the Emperour and seven to the Duke: And Richard swears to send his Niece, the Sister of Arthur Earl of Britain, to be married to the Duke of Austrich. And on the other side, the Emperour granted to the King of England by his Charter the Sovereignty of Provence, Vienna, Viennois, Marseilles, Narbon, Arles, Lyons, and all his Dominions in Burgogne, with the Homages of the King of Arragon, the Earls of Dijon and S. Gyles, in which Countries were five Archbishopricks and thirty three Bishopricks: And tho' the Emperour had only a Titular Dominion over those Provinces himself (for he never made any Governour over them) yet they did Richard this Service, that he seem'd not to part with so much Treasure for nothing. For which Reason it was, that he sent over into England to Hubert, the new Archbishop of Canterbury, who was lately made his Vicegerent in England, this News by his Letter wrote to him in these Words. 'Being very sure, That you much desire our Deliverance, and will greatly rejoyce at it, we have thought fit to impart the joyful News of it, and to signifie to you, that the Emperour hath fix'd the day for it, to be upon Monday after the Feast of the Nativity; and the Sunday after we shall receive the Crown of the Kingdom of Provence, which he hath given us, as by his Letters Patents herewith sent you may perceive. Ordering you in the mean time, as much as in you lieth, to comfort all those you know, as our Friends and Well-willers, to love

The Emperour also wrote at the same time to the Bishops and Barons, and other the King's Subjects in England, how he purpos'd to advance, and magnificently to honour his especial Friend their King: And thus were the English recompensed for the large Expences they had been at in redeeming their King. The King then sent for his Mother Queen Eleanor, Archbishop of Roan, and many others, to come unto him about the Time and Business of the Deliverance; for which there was imposed upon every Knight's Fee twenty Shillings, the fourth part of all Lay-mens Revenues and Clergy-mens, with a fourth part of their Goods. * The Chances, and Treasure of all Churches, are taken to make up the Sum, and the like was done in all the King's Territories beyond Sea: So dearly did the King's Voyage into the East, in going and returning, cost his People. Earl John's reasonable Allions against his Brother.

A Parliament at Nottingham, and the Ass.

The King of France hearing of the Conclusion made between King Richard and the Emperour, wrote immediately to Earl John, That the Devil was got loose, and desired him to look to himself; which shewed, That the King of France was not less disappointed of his Hopes, than Earl John himself. Upon this News, Earl John leaving his Castles in England well fortified, and encouraging his Soldiers to hold out valiantly against all Reports, departed into Normandy; where, with repeated Promises and Solicitations, he and the King of France labour'd to detain King Richard in Imprisonment, proffering the Emperour an hundred fifty thousand Marks, or a thousand Pound a Month so long as he would keep him his Prisoner. But all they could do prevail'd not, tho' it stagger'd the Emperour in his Design a little; but at length, he shew'd Richard his Brother's Letter: And having receiv'd the Pledges, viz. the Archbishop of Roan, Bishop of Bath, and several Noblemens Sons, for the Security of that part of his Ransom, which was to remain unpaid, releas'd him from his Captivity, after a Year and six Weeks, in the fourth Year of his Reign, and deliver'd him to his Mother Queen Eleanor. Immediately after his Release he return'd into England, where he found that the Bishops who continu'd firm in their Fidelity to him, had excommunicated the Earl John, and all his Adherents, and taken his Castles of Marborough, Lancaster, and a Fort at S. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, defended by Henry de Pomey. But his Castle of Nottingham, tho' strongly assaulted by Ralph Earl of Chester, and Earl Ferrers, and the Castle of Titchil by the Bishop of Durham, held out for the Earl, and cost the King a great deal of Blood and Labour to reduce them into his Power; and that at last upon Condition, That their Persons and Goods should be saved, and all Acts of Disloyalty pardon'd. Richard having thus settled his Kingdom of England in Peace, call'd a Parliament at Nottingham, where Queen Eleanor was present, and sat upon his Right Hand. On the first day of the Session he depriv'd Gerhard de Camville of the Possession of the Castle of Lincoln, and his Office of Sheriff in that Shire, and Hugh Bardolph of the Castles of Tork and Scarborow, and the Custody Reg. 4. of Westmorland, and his Office of Sheriff of Torkshire, and expos'd them to Sale. The Archbishop of Tork bought the Sheriff's Office of Torkshire for three thousand Marks down, and an Annual Rent of an hundred Marks. On the second day the King demanded Judgment against his Brother John, for having contrary to his Oath of Fealty, usurp'd his Castles, and enter'd a Confederacy with the King of France against him; as also against Hugh de Navant, Bishop of Coventry, for adhering to him and his other Enemies; and it was determin'd, That they should both appear upon a day fix'd, to answer according to Law: Which if they refus'd to do, the Earl should be banish'd, and the Bishop undergo such Punishment both from the Clergy and Laity as his Crime deserv'd: But the Bishop, within two Years after, was restor'd to the King's Favour, and his Bishoprick for two thousand Marks. On the third day, the Parliament granted to the King two Shillings from every Plough-Land in England; and besides, the King requir'd a third part of the Service of every Knight's Fee for his Attendance in Normandy, and all the Wool that Year of the Cistercian Monks, which being a very grievous Tax to them, he compounded with them for it. The fourth and last day was spent in hearing and determining of Grievances and Accusations, and so this Assembly brake up, after a Resolution taken up, That to nullifie the Act done to the Emperour, he should be crown'd again, which accordingly was perform'd the Easter following at Winchester.

A. D. 1194. Reg. 4.

Whilst the King remain'd about Nottingham, The King of Scots after the Parliament was broke up, William King of Scots came to him to require the Dignities and Honours, which his Predecessors had of Right enjoy'd in England, and withal the Counties of Northumberland, Westmorland and Lancaster. The King reply'd, That he could not satisfy him, till he had taken the Advice of his Council, which he intended shortly to call at Northampton. Where after Consultation had, he told him, That he could not grant his Petition with Reason then, because most of the Princes of Europe were his Enemies at that time; and if he should part with so much of his Country then, 'twould be thought rather an Act of Fear, than Love or Justice; and so put him off with fair Words and Promises, but granted by the Consent of his Parliament under his Charter to William King of Scots, and his Heirs for ever, That if at any time being summon'd, they should come to the King of England's Court, the Bishop of Durham, and Sheriff of Northumberland should receive them at the River Tweed, and bring them under safe Conduct to the River Teis, and from thence the Archbishop of Tork and Sheriff of Torkshire should convey them through that County; and so the Sheriffs of other Shires, till they came to the King's Court, being allow'd all along their Passage, and so at their return an hundred Shillings a day, and when they were at the Court thirty Shillings a Day, twelve Loaves of fine Bread, and twelve Simnels of the King's; four Quarts of the King's best Wine, and six of ordinary Wine; two Pounds of Pepper, and four Pounds of Cinnamon;

King Richard crown'd again, and his Resumptions at that time.

From Northampton both Kings went to Woodstock, and from thence to Winchester, where the Coronation was sumptuously solemnized on the 17th of April, 1194. When the Ceremony<sup>a</sup> was over, he resumed the two Manours he had sold to the Bishop of Winchester when he went to the Holy War, with the other Sales of the County and Castle, and all other the Demesnes belonging to the Crown; alledging, That it was not in his power to alienate any of his Revenues, whereby his Dignity was to be maintain'd. The Bishop of Durham observing this, voluntarily deliver'd up the Castle of Durham, with the Country of Northumberland, which the King order'd to put into the hands of Hugh Bardolph. Hugh Bishop of Lincoln at the same time gave for the liberty of his Church a thousand Marks of Silver, redeeming thereby the Custom of giving to the King of England every Year a Cloak lined with Sabel Furs. Hither also were all such as had sided with his Brother John, and defended his Castles, summon'd to appear; of whom the Richer were fined, and the Poorer set at liberty, but by giving Sureties of an hundred Marks a-piece to appear in the King's Courts whenever they should be call'd. The King of Scots seeing the King of England make use of all means to bring Money into his Treasure, offer'd him fifteen thousand Marks for Northumberland, with the Appurtenances; alledging, That King Henry II. gave the same to Henry his Father, and that Malcolm after him enjoy'd it five Years. This large proffer of Money tempted King Richard so, that he consulted his Parliament about it again; and in conclusion was contented to yield it to the King of Scots, with a Reservation of the Castles to himself; but the King of Scots would not accept it, and so in a discontent pass'd into his own Country. Richard two Years after sent Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, to York to treat with the King of Scots about a Marriage between Orbo<sup>b</sup> his Nephew, and Margaret that King's Daughter, with whom he was to give all Lenox for her Dower; and he would give with his Nephew Northumberland, and the Earldom of Carlisle, with all the Castles: But in the time of this Treaty the Queen of Scots being found to be with Child, it took no effect. From Winchester, after the King had gotten as much Money as he could out of his Subjects in so short a time as he stay'd, which was but from the end of February to the tenth of May<sup>c</sup>, he halted over into Normandy, in an hundred Ships, to spend it in his Achievements there, which took up all the remaining part of his Reign, which was but nine Years in all, of which he spent not above eight Months in England. Nor do we find that his Queen Berenguela was ever there, or had any Honour or Dower, or was of any great Regard with him, however Deserving she was in her self.

He resides in Normandy all the rest of his Reign.

And now by the King's Residence in Normandy was the Charge and Labour of the English much greaten'd; all Affairs, which either con-

cern'd the State in general, or the People in particular, being to be dispatched there. The first Action that Richard undertook at his entrance into his Territories there, was to relieve Vernoul, then besieged by the King of France, which he soon rais'd, and by the Mediation of his Mother was reconciled to his Brother John, who abjured the French Party, and adhered to him. His next business was to strengthen himself in those Countries against his potent Enemy the King of France, which he did first by giving his Sister Joanna, Queen-Dowager of Sicily, to Raymond Earl of Toulouse, who was his nearest Neighbour of Power to his Dutchy of Guien. Then he made a League with Baldwin Earl of Flanders, from whom the King of France had taken away Artois and Vermandois; and so on all sides seeks to vex his Enemy. Four Years at least did these two great Princes continue their furious Assaults one against another, invading, surprizing, spoiling and ruining each other's Estates and Dominions; making shews indeed often of Peace and Reconciliation by frequent Leagues and Truces, but they lasted no longer than some Advantages offer'd of either side. The King of France, on the other side, to strengthen himself with Shipping, that he might oppose the English, marry'd Botilda the Sister of Canute or Knute King of Denmark; but this Match, which he sought not through Affection, but for his Politick Ends, created him greater Trouble; for he put her away the next Day after his Wedding, upon a pretence of too great nearness of Blood, and so made both the Church, and King of Denmark his Enemy. The Emperor at the same time sent to the King of England a massy Crown of Gold, and offers to assist him against the King of France, and invade his Kingdom; but Richard was not willing to have him engage in this Quarrel, either because he saw that the Emperor sought to add the Kingdom of France to his Empire, or because he fear'd the King of France might win him over to him by his Money to joyn against himself, return'd only a Compliment of Thanks for his Tender.

But tho' Normandy was the Stage of Action, His means England was the Treasury, from whence the King fetch'd Monies for all his vast Expences; which to supply, he sought all manner of ways of raising Taxes and Fines upon the People<sup>d</sup>. And first he gave out his Commission to certain Itinerant Justices, whom he sent into every Shire of England, to raise and exact Sums of Money upon Pleas of the Crown for Escheats, Wardships, and Marriages, to improve his Demesnes, to take an account of Men's Estates, and especially of the Jews, on whom he would have none to prey but himself; to raise an Imposition upon his allowance of Turnaments, viz. twenty Marks of Silver for every Earl, ten for a Baron, four for a Knight having Lands, and two for a License for such as had none; the Collection of which the Archbishop left to his Brother Theobald Walters. He order'd also a new Seal to be made, because the old one was lost by his Vice-Chancellor at the taking of Cyprus, which was a means for another Exaction. But the Proceedings in the Pleas of the Crown, and extorting of Penalties, Anno Regni 9. by Hugh Bardolph, <sup>c</sup> He landed the 13th of March, and sail'd from Portsmouth the 12th of May.

<sup>d</sup> He return'd into England to raise this Tax for Turnaments. Matt. Paris. But his Charter or Proclamation for them is dated at Ville Le Veske in Normandy. These Tiltings were to be held at five Places:

In Wiltshire, between Salisbury and Wilton.
In Warwickshire, between Warwick and Kenelworth;
In Lincolnshire, between Stamford and Wansford.
In Northamptonshire, between Brackly and Mizzburgh,
In Nottinghamshire, between Blie and Tickhill.

A. D. 1195. Roger Arundel, and Jeffrey Hatchet, Itinerant Justices for Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Yorkshire, Northumberland, Cumberland, and Lancashire, were intolerable, being manag'd with gradual Tryals of the People's Patience and Abilities. So that (as Hoveden saith) all England, from Sea to Sea, was reduced to extream Poverty. Yet did not his Extortion stop here; but Hugh Nevile Chief Justice, Hugh Wac and Ernise de Nevile Justices of the Forest brought a greater Trouble upon the Subjects, by the severe Execution of the cruel Forest-Laws introduced by the Conqueror; which, being only fit to be damn'd to eternal Oblivion, shall not be particularly mention'd. Besides in the same Year this King impos'd a Tax upon every Hide, or Plough-land, (which contains about an hundred Acres) of five Shillings, which was levy'd with great Cruelty. Likewise he required by his Vicegerent, the Archbishop of Canterbury, That the People of England should find three hundred Knights for one Year in his Service, or so much Money as would maintain them at three Shillings a Day: Which Hugh Bishop of Lincoln oppos'd, and said, 'He would never yield to the King's Will in this, because of the Damage it might bring to Posterity by so ill an Example, which might give them cause to complain, and say, Our Fathers have eaten four Grapes, and the Childrens Teeth are set on Edge, and turning himself to the Archbishop, desired him to do nothing, of which he might afterward be ashamed. But the Archbishop could desert this, and yet pretend to have well merited of the King for his other Services in this kind; for in the seventh Year of his Reign, he gave up an account to him, that he had levy'd of the Kingdom within the space of two Years an hundred thousand Marks of Silver, which at that time was an admirable Sum.

The King's Death, and the Occasion. And now, as the first Act of this King was his violent Proceedings with Stephen Turnham Seneschal of Normandy, his Father's Treasurer, about his Treasure: So was likewise his last, and the cause of his Destruction; for Widamore Viscount of Limoges, having found a great Treasure of Silver and Gold in his Ground, sends a great part of it to the King, but he refused it, laying claim to the whole; Widamore deny'd it. And so the King laid Siege to the Castle, where he imagin'd the Treasure was hid. They in the Castle being unable to defend themselves, offer'd to surrender the same, upon Condition, that their Lives, Arms and Members should be secured; which the King would not yield to, but swore that he would storm the Castle, and hang them all: Whereupon they desperately resolv'd to stand to their defence. King Richard, with Merchard, alias Markadey, General of the Brabanzons, his mercenary Soldiers, going about the Castle to observe what place was fittest for an Assault, Bertram de Gurdon from the Walls shot a Barbed Arrow at the King, and gave him a mortal Wound on the Arm. The King was immediately carry'd to his Lodgings, but gave Commandment to his Forces to prosecute the Siege without Intermillion, which they did; and taking the Castle, put all the Defenders of it to Death, except Bertram, who was reserved by the King's Command. The Arrow was drawn out with great Torture, and much mangling of his Flesh, by an unskillful Chyrurgeon belonging to Merchard, which caused him to despair of Life; and by Will to dispose of his Estate, three parts to his Brother John, and one to his Servants. Before his Death he call'd for Bertram de Gurdon to be brought to him, and demanded of him, what hurt he had done him, which provoked him to do him this Mischief. Bertram replied, 'Thou didst kill my Father and two Brothers with thy own Hand, and now orderest me to be slain: Take what Revenge thou wilt upon me, I willingly endure any Torment thou canst inflict, since I have slain thee, who hast done such, and so much mischief to the World. The King, notwithstanding this rough and desperate Answer, caused him to be set at liberty, not only forgiving him for his Fact, but commanding an hundred Shillings to be given him; but Merchard after his Death caused him to be slay'd alive, and afterward hang'd. Thus dy'd this Lion-like King, when he had Reigned nine Years and nine Months; wherein he exacted and consumed more of the Wealth of this Kingdom than all his Predecessors from the Norman Conquest had done, and yet with very little Noise and Trouble, because of his undertaking of the Cause of Christ (as it was then esteem'd) in the Holy War; the Clergy feeding the People's Opinion of the Merit of that Expedition with strange Relations both of his Valour and Success; and his Ministers at home being very careful and zealous for him to keep their place, and so doing perhaps more for him in his absence than he could have done with his presence. But the insolent Oppressions of the Nation in these Times made the future more careful and audacious to provide for themselves: Excesses usually procure Alterations. So that his Successors have reason to blame his and his Brother's Oppressions and Irregularities for those Limitations of their Power, which have been extorted rather from them, than voluntarily granted by them. Yet what this Prince would have been, had his Days been prolong'd to a time of Peace, is uncertain: But that his Temper was very pliable and yielding to good Counsel, is manifest from the good effect that little which a poor Hermit bestow'd upon him wrought; advising him in a Sermon to think seriously upon the Destruction of Sodom, and to abstain from things unlawful, otherwise the deserved Vengeance of God would come upon him. For not long after falling sick, he call'd to mind this Advertisement, and made a Vow to reform his Life; which after his recovery he was so careful to perform, that he rose early every Morning to hear Divine Service. Upon which Action Hoveden makes this Reflection: How Glorious is it for a Prince to begin his Actions in him, who is the Beginning without beginning, and judges to the ends of the Earth. Moreover he grew very Charitable to the Poor, and made Restitution of many of the Church's Goods, which had been sold for his own Ransom.

Tho' this King had no Children, yet was he told by a Priest in France, that he had three evil Daughters, and admonish'd to bestow them elsewhere, that he might avoid the Judgments of

The King gave him the Lye, and said, He knew none be bad. Yes, Sir, replied the Priest, Three Daughters you have, which are these, Pride, Covetousness, and Letchery. The King apprehending his Meaning, call'd the Lords and great Persons who were attending upon him, and having told them what the Priest had said to him, requir'd them to bear Witness how he did dispose of his three Daughters. My Pride I give to the Templars and Hospitallers, my Covetousness I give to the Cistercian Monks, and my Letchery to the Clergy. This sudden Repartee shews us his great Quickness of Wit, and what kind of Men were then out of Favour with him.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Richard I.

IN the 2d Year of his Reign, on Midsummer-Eve, the Sun was eclips'd for three Hours, and the Stars appear'd in the Heavens at ten a Clock in the Forenoon.

In the 5th, 6th, and 7th Years of his Reign there was so great a Dearth in England and France, that a Quarter of Wheat was sold for almost twenty Shillings, as much as six Pound now; which was follow'd by a severe Mortality, that carry'd off innumerable Multitudes of People by a Pestilential Fever. It lasted five Months, and during that time, the dead were bury'd in Pits a great many at once; for they dy'd so fast, that those who surviv'd had not Leisure to bury them singly. About Whitsunday two Suns appear'd, the true Sun and another, and were so like each other, that the Astronomers were forc'd to take a View of them with their Instruments to distinguish them.

King's Standard-Bearer, who all shew'd their Valour in the Holy Land.

The most Famous for Learning were

Daniel Morley a famous Mathematician, Richard Prior of Hagulstad or Hexam, William Fitz-Stephens, who wrote the Life of Becket, Richard of the Devises, John Brompton, Historians; Robert de Bellofoco an excellent Philosopher, Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, who dy'd at Tyre in Phoenicia, and wrote several Treatises of Divinity; Hubert his Successor in that See, William Bishop of Ely a great Politician, Richard the Abbot of the Order of Premonstratensis, and Nicholas Walkington.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF King JOHN.

Earl John secures the Crown.

A. D.
1199.
Reg. 1.

JOH N, the Brother of Richard, and youngest Son of Henry the Second, being at his Brother's Death with his Army in the Field, and among all his Servants and Followers, had as good an Opportunity as he could have desir'd to secure his ambitious Aims of the Crown of England, by making his Interests with them; which he did by large Promises of Gifts and Rewards. Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, was then in Normandy about some Business, and John knowing him to be a Man of great Power and Interest in England, engages him to his Design, and presently dispatches him into England with William Marshal Earl of Striguil, Jeffrey Fitz-Peter, and others, to prepare the People to receive him for their King. These Agents for John, upon their Arrival, began to treat with those whom they knew were most likely to oppose his Aim, and by their confident Promises, That he should restore their Rights, and govern the Kingdom with all due Moderation, so prevail'd with them, that they were content upon those Conditions to swear Fealty to him against all Men, and so an Entrance to the Crown was cleared for him

D. 1199. among the English; which because they saw the King of Scots only could intercept and hinder, they send him word, That upon John's Settlement in the Throne, he should receive Satisfaction for his Claim in England, and so stopp'd him from any present Attempts. In the mean time, Arthur Earl of Anjou, Son of John's elder Brother Jeffrey, who had the Right of Succession by his Birth, was not unactive with the Nobility of Anjou, Main, and Tureine, to maintain and recover his Inheritance; And his Mother Constance put him under the Protection of the King of France, who receiv'd him, and undertook the Defence of his Right. John was not insensible of the Cloud that was gathering over his Head; and tho' he had reason to fear a violent Storm from it, yet judging it best to secure the Possession of England first, he having receiv'd the Investiture of Normandy with all the Rites of it, pass'd presently into England with his Mother Eleanor (who was a forward Assistant in this her Son's Promotion) and by way of Election, receiv'd the Crown upon Ascension-Day, the 26th of May, at the hands of Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury; who in his Oration (as M. Paris relates it) before the Assembly of Nobles met at that Solemnity said, 'That by all Reason Divine and Humane, none ought to succeed in the Kingdom, but he who for his Vertue and Worthiness was unanimously chosen by the State, as this Man was, &c. which he then urg'd to put a fair Pretence upon that Action, because he saw the Right of Succession was against him; but after being question'd for it, he confess'd to his Friends, 'That he foresaw, that John would in the end obtain the Crown, whatever Blood and Trouble it cost; and therefore he thought it the best way to prevent Confusion, rather to make him King than that he should make himself, and that their Election would be a tie upon him to rule them well. Thus did John get the Crown of England, which he govern'd with as much Injustice as he got it, and involv'd the Kingdom in those Miseries and Troubles, which after produced desperate Effects, and made those Alterations in Government, which follow'd.

John goes against Philip King of France. England being thus secur'd, John returns into Normandy, having receiv'd Information of a general Revolt of his Dominions beyond Sea, procur'd by Philip the French King, who had conferr'd the Order of Knighthood upon Arthur, and taken his Homage for Anjou, Poitou, Main, Tureine, and also Normandy it self, because (as he pretended) King John had neglected to come and do him Homage for the same. King John being unwilling to engage in so sudden a War, so soon after his new and doubtful Admission to the Crown, mediated for a Parley with the King of France, but to no purpose; for that King well understanding his own Advantage, and John's Circumstances, requir'd such unreasonable Conditions, as John could not with Honour comply with, and so they proceeded to decide the Quarrel with the Sword. The King of France had the better of John, and gain'd several Parts of his Dominions; but it was so plain that what he did was for himself, not for Arthur, as he pretended, that Arthur and his Mother Constance were induc'd (by the Persuasion of their Chief Minister William de la Roche) to commit themselves to the Protection of King John. But neither here could they find a safe Repose; for either through some secret Jealousie, or (as some say) having Information of John's Purposes to imprison them, they got away the next Night after their coming secretly, and fled to Algiers. And so this young Prince, born to be crush'd between these two Potent Monarchs, (who only intended their own Ends and not his Advantage) gave an occasion to both to become his Enemies. The two Kings continu'd their Contest a while, but having made many Attempts on both sides with little Gain, they by the Mediation of the Pope's Legates came to a Treaty, wherein John buys his Peace upon these yielding Conditions; viz. That Lewis, the eldest Son to King Philip should marry his Niece Blanch, Daughter of Alphonso King of Castile, and have with her for her Dower the City and County of Eureux, with several Castles in Normandy; and thirty thousand Marks in Silver: And farther promises, To leave him all his Territories in France, if he dy'd without Issue; and that he would not assist his Nephew Otho (lately elected Emperour) against Philip Brother to the late Emperour Henry VI. whom the King of France favour'd in Opposition to Pope Innocent, who took Otho's part.

After the Conclusion of this Peace, Otho taking it ill that his Uncle John had thus forsaken him, sends his two Brothers Henry Duke of Saxony and William of Winton (so call'd, because he was born at Winchester) to require of him the City of Eureux and County of Poitou, and two parts of the Treasure, which his Uncle King Richard had given him by Will, besides other of his Moveables: But they came too late. The Obligations of Kindred, and rendring of Dues, must give place to the present Necessities and Interests of State, and so they are sent away without any Answer to their Desires. To this unkind and unnatural Act he soon after added another, viz. The Divorce of his Wife, who was Daughter to the Earl of Glocester; alledging, that she was too near a Kin to him in the third Degree of Consanguinity, and marry'd Isabel the Daughter and Heiress of the Earl of Angoulême, who was before affianced to Hugh le Brun Earl of March, (a Peer of a great Estate and Alliance in France) by the Consent of King Richard, in whose Custody she then was. Having finish'd these distastful Business, he return'd into England to do as ungrateful things there; for he impos'd three Shillings upon every Plough-land, to discharge the great Dowry of thirty thousand Mark which he had promis'd with his Niece Blanch. Jeffrey the Archbishop of York oppos'd the Collection of it within his Province, and the King being before angry with him for not coming upon his Summons to his Treaty in France, immediately causes the Sheriff of the County of York to seize upon all his Temporalities. The Archbishop interdicts the whole Province of York, and excommunicates the Sheriff. But not long after, the King made his Progress into the Northern Parts as far as Scotland, exacting great Fines of such as had offended in his Forests, and in his Passage through Yorkshire, was by his Brother the Archbishop deny'd Wine, and the Honours of the Bells of Beverly; but by the Mediation of four Bishops and four Barons, and a great Sum of Money, a Reconciliation was made between them, and a Reformation promis'd on both sides.

Upon the Easter after his Progress into the North, the King was crown'd again at Canterbury with his Queen Isabel, by Hubert Archbishop * Duke of Bretagne.

† Holinshed says, Queen Isabel was crown'd on the 8th of October, and that King John was crown'd again by himself at Canterbury on the 24th of April 1202. by Archbishop Hubert.

A. D. of that See, and there he summon'd the Earls 1202. and Barons of England to be ready with Horse Reg. 4. and Armour to go over with him at Whitfuntide into Normandy; but they meeting at a Conference at Leicester, with one consent sent him word, That unless he would restore them to their Rights and Liberties, they would not attend him out of the Kingdom. But the King (saith Hoveden) using ill Counsels, took their Castles from them; and beginning with William de Aubenye, demanded his Castle of Beauvoir, which he refused, delivering him his Son as a Pledge of his Obedience. But notwithstanding this Refusal of his Lords, having settled the Government here, he sailed into Normandy with his Queen, where his Presence, with his great shew of Preparations, caused the Rebels to give over their Attempts for that time; and a farther Ratification of the Peace, with as strong Covenants and Cautions as could be devised, was made with Philip King of France; who thereupon feasted the King of England at Paris with all outward Demonstrations of real Friendship. And here both Kings, being solicited to it by the Pope's Legate, granted a Subsidy of the fortieth part of all their Subjects Revenues for one Year (by way of Alms) for the Relief the Christians in the Holy Land; for the levying whereof Jeffrey Fitz-Peter, then Chief Justice, sent out his Writs by way of Request and Persuasion, avoiding in it all Terms of Coaction or Due, lest it should be drawn into a President afterward.

A Conspiracy against John, and the King's Victory over the Authors of it.

Not many Months after this a Conspiracy broke out, which was begun and carry'd on by Hugh le Brun, who being greatly incensed at the taking away his Wife (a Wrong which makes the deepest Impression on Man's Nature) joyn'd with Duke Arthur, the Barons of Poitou and Britain, and they made a strong Party against him. The King of France (notwithstanding all the former Obligations of Amity) combined with them out of hopes of Interest, declared himself for Arthur, to whom he marry'd his youngest Daughter, requires King John to deliver to him all his Territories in France, and upon a certain Day to appear in Person at Paris to answer such Accusations as should be brought against him, and abide the Judgment of his Court; which John refusing, was by Sentence of Court adjudged to lose all that he held of that Crown. Then were his Dominions assaulted on all sides, by the King of France in Normandy, by Prince Arthur and the Barons in Anjou, who laid Siege to his Castle in Mirabel, defended by Eleanor the Queen-Mother; but near taking, when John, with greater Force and Expedition than was expected, came and defeated the whole Army of the Besiegers, taking Arthur, Hugh le Brun, the Barons of Poitou, and above two hundred Knights, and Men of Command, Prisoners; all which he carry'd away bound in Carts, and dispersed into several Castles both in Normandy and England. This Victory, which might seem to have Establish'd him in his Throne, was his Undoing; for by the ill use of it he lost himself and his Reputation for ever. For Prince Arthur was shortly after (by his means, as was thought) murder'd in Prison, and many of the Prisoners and Hostages cruelly executed; which so exasperated the Nobility of Britain, Anjou, and Poitou, that they took up Arms against him, appealed for Justice to the King of France, and summon'd him to appear in his Court; which he refusing, he was condemned to lose his Dutchy of Normandy, which his Ancestors had held three hundred Years, and all his other Dominions in France, which either through his own Negligence, or Treachery of his Ministers, who were disaffected to him, was brought about, and he wholly dispossessed of them<sup>b</sup>.

In this miserable Condition he returns into England, and charges the Lords and Barons with his Losses in France, and fines them to pay the seventh part of all their Goods for refusing their Assistance, not sparing the Church it self. Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury exacted this rigorous Tax of the Clergy, and Jeffrey Fitz-Peter Chief Justice of England of the Laity. But all this Treasure was not sufficient to supply his Wants, and furnish him with Assistance to recover his Losses, (which was the end of raising it) and therefore in less than a Year he was forced to call a Parliament at Oxford, to obtain in a more satisfactory way another Tax, and by it got a Grant of two Marks and an half upon every Knight's Fee for a Military Aid, and a proportionable Contribution of the Clergy. But no sooner was this Money gather'd, but an Occasion was offer'd of spending it in France, that devouring Gulph of the English Treasure, by a Revolt begun in Britain by Guido, the Husband of Constance, Arthur's Mother, Saveri de Malleon, and Almaric Lusignian, with many other Confederates; who not receiving that Satisfaction they expected from their new Master, call'd in the old one again; shewing us, that only Men's private Interests sway their Affections, though they often pretend Honour and Justice. King John hearing of it, hastened over into Normandy, and by the Forces he carry'd and found there, won the Castle of Mont-alban, and a little after the City of Angiers, and was in a fair way of recovering more; but the King of France, by the Fortune of one Day, (wherein he overthrew and took Prisoners the chief Confederates, Guido, Almaric, and Saveri) forced him to accept of a Truce for two Years, and return into England for more Supplies, which he took his old methods to obtain, by imposing a Tax of the thirteenth part of every Man's Moveables, and others Goods, both of the Clergy and Laity. But his Subjects now seeing their Estates consumed without success, and likely to be a continual Prey to his extravagant Designs, began to bethink themselves of recovering their ancient Immunities, which had been usurped by their late Kings, and ease themselves of those Burthens indirectly laid upon them. The Archbishop of York was the first Man that began the Quarrel between the King and his Subjects, by opposing the Collection of the Imposition, and solemnly Cursing the Receivers of it; and then conveyed himself out of the Kingdom, choosing rather to live in Banishment abroad, than under Oppression at home. And here began the miserable Breach between the King and his People, which cost more Noble Blood to make up again than all the foreign Wars since the Conquest. For this Contest (tho' it had several Intermissions) did not fully cease till the Great Charter (which was first obtain'd of this King John, and confirm'd by his Son Henry III.

<sup>a</sup> It is not certain that Prince Arthur was murder'd, tho' perhaps King John was charg'd with it: Kings themselves, if not lov'd, can't escape foul Aspersions. Arthur was King John's Prisoner of War, and such an one as it seems Adversity could not humble; for when the King in Prison promis'd him his Favour, if he would renounce his Amity with the King of France, and live peaceably, he was so far from compliance, that he threaten'd him; which oblig'd the King to keep him in stricter Imprisonment. And Matt. Paris says, To escape this tedious Confinement, he ventur'd to swim over the River Seine, and was drown'd. Others write, that he dy'd of Grief.

A. D. 1207. but was never observed by either) was freely ratified by that Judicious King, Edward I. in the 27th Year of his Reign, which was above eighty Years after. This was the first Civil Disfention between the King and his Nobles that we find upon Record since the Establishment of the English Kingdom; and to understand the Causes and Occasions of it, I shall take a View of the posture of Affairs at that time.

The Norman Nobility.

It was about an hundred and forty Years since William the Conqueror planted the Norman Nobility here, whose Posterity being now become meer English, were at this time very Numerous, Rich, and of great Spirits, being exercised in the Wars of France, where most of them were Commanders of Castles, and had great Estates, as well as in England. But being under this violent and unsuccessful King depriv'd both of their Employments and Estates abroad, they contriv'd all they could to preserve what they had left, and enrich themselves at home; which, because they could not do so long as they were perpetually harassed at the King's Will, they resolv'd to make use of their own Martial Courage, and the Privileges of the Nation to do it. Their Cause was much better than their Prosecution of it; which filled all things with Injustice and Disorder. The strange Corruption of the Times contributed much to the Mischief. An ambitious Clergy, polluted with Avarice, brought in a feigned Piety to be a Party in it. The Occasion of their Interposition in this Affair began about the Election of a new Archbishop of Canterbury after the Death of Hubert, after this manner: The Monks of that Convent pretending, that it belong'd to them by their ancient Privileges to elect an Archbishop, met in the Night, and chose one Reginald their Sub-prior, on purpose to prevent the King's Nomination, and taking an Oath of Secrecy of him, dispatch'd him to Rome to be install'd. But his great Joy for his Preferment soon brake out, and his Election was openly discover'd at his arrival in Flanders; which the Monks hearing, and fearing the King's Displeasure, they sent to crave leave to elect a fit Person for their See. The King thereupon nominates to them John Gray Bishop of Norwich, whom he favour'd much, and persuaded them to prefer, which, after long Debate, they yielded to: And so John Gray was advanced to the Chair, wherein (saith Matt. Paris) their last Error was worse than their first; and began that Contest, which proved an irreparable Damage to the whole Kingdom.

Both Elections null'd, and Stephen Langton chosen by the Pope.

This Election being made, the King sends to Rome some of the Monks of Canterbury (among whom was Elias de Brantfield, a trusty Servant of the King's) with a plentiful Provision for their Journey, to obtain the Pope's Confirmation of it. The Suffragan Bishops of the Church of Canterbury sent also their Complaints against the Monks, for Electing without their Concurrence, which by Right and Custom they ought to have; alledging, that three Archbishops had been by them elected. The Monks oppos'd their Allegation, and offer'd to bring proof, that they only, by the special Privilege of the Roman See, were accustomed to elect. The Pope appointed a certain Day for the deciding of this Controversie; and upon hearing of both sides fully, pronounced both Elections void, by the advice of the Cardinals; the first, because it was made in the Night, and not in a fit Season; and the other, because the first, tho' irregular, was not juridically made null: And then propounded unto the Monks a third Man, which was Stephen de Langton, an English- man born, and a Cardinal of an high Spirit, whom A. D. he perswaded them to elect; alledging, that it was 1207. in their power by his Prerogative to make good Reg. 9. his Choice. Stephen Langton being thus chosen, and after consecrated at Viterbo, the Pope dismisses the Monks and the King's Agents with Letters to King John, exhorting him to receive this Archbishop favourably, who was canonically Elected, a Native of his Kingdom, a Doctor of Divinity, and Learned in all the Sciences, and which exceeded his Learning, of a good Life and Conversation, every way fit to hold so great a Place, &c. He wrote also to the Prior and Monks of Canterbury, charging them by Virtue of their holy Obedience to receive the Archbishop for their Pastor, and obey him in all Spiritual and Temporal Matters. The Letters being brought to the King, with an account of what had been done at Rome, so enraged him, that in heat of Passion he sent Fulke de Cantlo, and Henry de Cornhill, two fierce Knights, with some armed Men, to expel the Monks of Canterbury, as Traytors, out of the Kingdom, and seize upon all they had, which was as hotly Executed as Commanded, and the Prior and all the Monks fled into Flanders, (except such as were not able through Sicknes to remove.)

Then he wrote a sharp Letter to the Pope, accusing him, that he had done him wrong in making the Election of the Bishop of Norwich void, being a Man he greatly favour'd, and advancing Stephen Langton, a Person unknown to him, and bred up in the Kingdom of France, among his Enemies; and which was more to his Prejudice, and against the Prerogative of his Crown, he had prefer'd him without his consent, which should first have been required. So that he much wonder'd, that the Pope and Court of Rome so little valued his Friendship; and did not consider, that his Kingdom of England yielded them more advantage than any Kingdom on this side the Alps. He also added, That he would vindicate the Liberties of his Crown to Death, and would not recede from the Election of the Bishop of Norwich, whom he knew every way fit for the Place. And in the Conclusion threatens, that if he were not gratified in the Premises, he would hinder all resort to the Court of Rome; and that, if Necessity required, he had in his Kingdom of England, and his other Dominions, Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates, of so great Learning as could do the business of his Nation, without going to beg Justice of Strangers.

The Pope having received this Letter from the King, return'd answer to it, beginning with these words: 'Whereas we wrote to you concerning the business of the Church of Canterbury, exhorting and persuading you, humbly, earnestly, and mildly; you have written again to us (as I may with your leave say) in a contumacious manner, reproving and threatening us; and tho' we took care to give you more than your Right, you have not been careful to give us ours; respecting us less than becomes you: And if your Devotion be most necessary for us, ours is no less fit for you. And whereas we have honour'd no Prince so much as you, you have derogated from our Honour more than any other Prince in the like Case would have done; alledging certain frivolous Pretences, why you can't consent to the Election of our beloved Son Stephen Langton, Cardinal of S. Chrysogonus, made by the Monks of Canterbury, because he hath been bred among your Enemies, and his Person is altogether unknown to you. To which he re-

The Pope's Answer to the King.

A. D. 1207. Reg. 9. plies: That it was for his Reputation, not his Fault, that he had liv'd so long at Paris, where he had made so great Progress in his Studies as to be created a Doctor not only of the Learned Sciences but of Divinity; and for his Life, agreeable to his Learning, obtain'd a Prebend at Paris. Wherefore he could not but wonder, that a Man of so great note, and a Native of his Kingdom should be unknown to him, at least in Fame; especially since (saith he) you have written thrice unto him, since he hath been made a Cardinal by us, assuring him, That tho' you had a Desire to call him to your familiar Attendance, yet you rejoiced that he was exalted to an higher Office. Then he makes an Excuse to the King, that his Consent was not requir'd; Altho' (saith he) in Elections celebrated at the Apostolick See, the Consent of Princes is not to be expected, yet were two Monks deputed to go unto you to ask your Consent, who were stopp'd at Dover, so that they could not deliver the Message enjoin'd them, with many other things. So that at length (saith he) we resolv'd to do, as the Canonical Sanctions order'd, without declining to the Right Hand, or to the Left; that there might be no farther Delays to our pious Designs, lest the Lord's Flock should be without Pastoral Cure, and therefore it can't be revok'd. And in the Conclusion he useth these words; As we have had more Respect to your Honour, than we were oblig'd in Duty, do you give us that Honour which is our Due, that you may deserve God's Favour and ours; lest by doing otherwise, you bring your self into so great Troubles, as can't easily be remov'd. For he in the end must overcome, to whom all Knees bow both in Heaven and Earth and Hell, whose Vicegerency here below we (tho' unworthy) do exercise: Yield not therefore to their Counsels, who desire to involve you in Confusions, that themselves may fish in troubled Waters, but submit your self to our Pleasure, which will tend to your Praise and Honour. Neither is it safe for you to oppose God and the Church, for which the Blessed Martyr and Eminent Bishop Thomas lately dy'd; especially since your Father and Brother, of Glorious Memory, late Kings of England, have by the hands of the Legates of the Apostolick See, abjur'd that impious Custom: We, if you behave your self well, will sufficiently take care, that no Prejudice shall arise to you, or yours hereby. Dated at the Lateran in the 10th Year of our Pontificate. Thus did these two great and powerful Princes defend their Prerogatives with Words: But when the Pope understood with what Severity the King had proceeded against the Monks of Canterbury, he sends presently his Mandate to the Bishops of London, Ely and Worcester, commanding them to treat first mildly with the King, and exhort him to reform his Actions; but if he obstinately persisted, to interdict the whole Kingdom, and if that would not prevail, he would deal more severely with him himself: And withal, charged the Suffragan Bishops of the Province of Canterbury, by Virtue of their Obedience, to receive their Archbishop Stephen, and to obey him with all Respect. The Bishops, according to the Pope's Injunction, went to the King, and shewing him the Pope's Mandate, besought him, For the Love of God, to recall the Archbishop and Monks of Canterbury, and to use them with Kindness and Respect, that he might avoid the Trouble of an Interdiction, &c. The King interrupting the Bishops Speech, broke out into a violent Passion against the Pope and Cardinals, swearing by God's Teeth, That if they or any other should dare to put the Kingdom under Interdiction, he would send all the Clergy of England immediately to the Pope and confiscate their Goods: And if any Person sent from Rome for that end were found in any part of the Land, he would have their Eyes put out and Noses cut off, and so sent home, that by these Marks they might be known of other Nations, charging the Bishops to depart his Presence immediately, as they tender'd their own Safety. The Bishops soon after give the Pope an Account of the Success of their Message, and the Kingdom was thereupon interdicted, the Ministration of Sacraments ceased (except of Confession, Extrem Unction, and Baptism of Children) the dead were buried without Priest or Prayer. The Bishops of London, Ely, Worcester, Bath and Hereford, fled secretly out of the Kingdom. The King to requite this Severity, sends his Sheriffs and other Ministers, to command all the Bishops and their Servants to depart forthwith out of the Kingdom, puts the Bishopricks, Abbies, and Priors into the hands of Lay-men, confiscating all their Revenues; but the Bishops got into the Monasteries, and would not depart, unless expell'd by Force, which the Officers would not do, because their Commission did not reach so far, wherefore they seiz'd on their Goods for the King's Use. The Monkish Writers of those Times give us a Tragical Account of the barbarous Usage the Clergy and Religious Men met withal from the King's Servants at this time, and 'tis probable the incensed King might encourage Men to injure and abuse them, from whom he suffer'd so much; but their rebellious Obstinacy deserv'd such Severities, that their credible Relations will pass for Forgeries.

The King not having been able to prevent this Curse, sets himself to hinder the ill Consequents of it. He was sensible, that this Breach with the Church would endanger his Peace, and probably cause a Defection among his Subjects; and therefore to avoid it, he sent a Body of Soldiers to all the most potent Men in his Kingdom, to require of them Hostages for their Fidelity, which many of them yielded to, sending some their Sons, other their Nephews, and others their nearest Kin. William de Brause, a Nobleman, being requir'd to deliver his Hostage, was prevented in his Answer by his Wife, who told the Commissioners, That the King should have none of her Sons to keep, because he kept Arthur his own Brother's Son so ill; which rash Speech the Baron sharply reproving his Wife for before the King's Servants, told them, That he was ready, if he had offended, to satisfy the King without any Pledge, according to the Judgment of his Court, or that of his Peers at any Time or Place whatsoever. But his Wife's Answer was taken more notice of than his, and reported to the King, who sends immediately to apprehend the Baron; but he having notice of it, or fearing what would follow, got away with his Wife and Children into Ireland, where this afflicted Lady sought all ways to pacify the King's Wrath, and presented the Queen with four hundred Milk-white Cows and a Bull: But this would not procure her Pardon. The King at length apprehended her and her Sons (the Baron himself

The Exchequer removed from London. 1209. The King displeased with the Londoners, removed his Exchequer to Northampton, and with a great Army marches towards Scotland, to make War upon that King for harbouring his Enemies, and assisting them against him. But by mediation a Peace was agreed upon, on these Conditions: That the King of Scots should pay eleven thousand Marks of Silver, and deliver up his two Daughters Hostages to secure the Peace. In his return he caused all the Inclosures of his Forests to be beaten down, to the great Grief of his Subjects; whom, though he never minded to satisfy, yet he sought all means to fasten them in their Obedience, (whereof Love, not Rigour, is the fastest tie) and therefore took Homage of all Free-Tenants, yea even of Children of twelve Years old throughout the Kingdom.

King John Excommunicated. After the Interdiction had lain upon the Kingdom two Years, to the Distraction of the People, but without the effect intended upon the King, the Pope thinking to bring him to compliance, proceeds to the Excommunication of his Person; a piece of Rigour, which his Predecessor Alexander, being better advised, would not use against Henry II. tho' accused of a more heinous Crime upon the Person of Thomas Becket; but this method failed also, and the King grew only the more enraged against the Clergy: So that, notwithstanding the Pope's Mandate, they durst not execute it for many Days after, but kept it close from his knowledge; but at length it came to his Ears, by the means of Jeffrey Arch-deacon of Norwich, an Officer in the King's Exchequer, who conferring with his Fellows about the Sentence, affirmed, That it was not lawful for any Beneficed Men to remain in the Service and Obedience of an Excommunicated King; and so without leave withdrew himself from his place to his own House. The King hearing of this Action was very angry, and presently sent Sir William Talbot with armed Men to apprehend him, and lay him in Fetters in close Imprisonment; and afterward, at the King's Command, he was put into a Sheet of Lead*, in which, with the weight, and want of Victuals, he perish'd.

Otho the Emperor Excommunicated. This Excommunication of the King of England was accompany'd the same Year with another of the Emperor Otho, his Nephew, which like his Uncle's was look'd upon as a strain of the Pope's Pride and Injustice; because it was done in a Case of the Pope's own private Interest, seeking to extend his Authority beyond the bounds of a Spiritual Jurisdiction, which reaches only to their Souls, not Estates. For tho' the Pope had been very Instrumental in raising him to the Imperial Dignity, and opposing the Election of Philip, Son of Fredericke Barbarossa, for his own ends, because in the Vacancy of the Empire he had seized certain Parts of Italy belonging to it, and hoped so to keep them; yet when Otho sought to recover his Right, he procured the Pope's Displeasure, who sent him divers Messages to desist from the Prosecution of his Design, both in respect to himself, and Fredericke King of Sicily, who had put himself under the Protection of the Apostolick See. To these Messages the Emperor replied, That if the Pope desires unjustly to usurp any thing that belongs to the Empire, he must absolve me from the Oath which he caused me to take at my Coronation, which was, That I should recall and recover the Rights which A. D. had been rent from the Empire, and I will desist. 1209. But the Pope refusing this, and the Emperor not desisting from his Claim, the Pope issued out his Excommunication against him, and absolved all the States of Germany from their Obedience to him. And thus were two of the greatest Princes in the World left to the Mercy of their Subjects, so far as lay in the Pope's power; but the Ligaments and Sinews of Government were not so wholly dissolved, especially in England, but the Kingdom continued still in some tolerable Order and Quiet, the Natural Affections of some, Sense of Duty and Obligations of Interest in others, keeping them firm to their Loyalty and Allegiance; so that most of the Nobles adhered to their King.

But because Ease and Idleness would probably corrupt his Loyal Subjects, and make them ready to hearken to the Suggestions of the Pope against him, therefore the King resolv'd to keep them in Employment; and having received an Intelligence of a Revolt of the Irish, he undertakes an Expedition into Ireland to secure his Dominions there. At his first arrival, all the great Men, which held the Castles and Champion Country near the Coasts, came in, and did their Homage and Fealty to him at Dublin; but those that lived in the more remote parts, and held the Forts, refused to come; of which Cathal King of Connaught was the strongest, and the Confidence of the rest. King John therefore attack'd and conquer'd him, and soon became absolute Master of the Country; which to reduce into better Order, he commanded to be govern'd by the Laws and Customs of England, caused English Money to be coined there, of equal Value and alike Current as in England, with many other Constitutions, which if they had been as carefully kept as they were wisely settled, might have kept that Kingdom in entire Obedience ever after, and saved all the Pains and Expence which it cost in after-Ages to preserve it. After three Months stay, having made John Gray Bishop of Norwich Chief Justice there, he return'd home, and presuming upon his strength, summon'd all the Prelates of the Kingdom to appear before him at London, where he extorted from them for the Redemption of their Sees from the Laity an hundred thousand Pound Sterling. With this Sum he was enabled to go on with his Expedition into Wales, which then rebelled under Lewelin King of North-Wales, and reduced it to his Obedience in the twelfth Year of his Reign, taking twenty eight Children of their best Families for Pledges of their future Subjection. At his return, he exacted two Marks of every Knight that attended not upon his Army in that Expedition; and by the way at Northampton is pleased to receive the Pope's Agents, Pandulphus and Durandus, who came from the Pope to make Peace between the Kingdom and Clergy, and found the King so pliable to their Proposals and Advice, in Consideration of the State of the Kingdom, that he consented that the Archbishop and Monks of Canterbury, with all the exil'd Bishops, should return to their Places, but refused to make good their Estates which he had confiscated: At which the Agents of the Pope departing unsatisfied, brought greater Troubles upon the King. For the Pope finding him a little yielding, grew more intolerably Imperious, and would force him to what he pleased; and for that end absolv'd all his Subjects, of what Condition soever, from their Obedience, strictly forbidding them, under pain of Excommunication, the King's Table, Counsel

D. 1212. and Conference; which notwithstanding prevail'd not so much as to keep his Subjects from paying their Service to him; tho' it caus'd a Revolt of the Welsh, and a Conspiracy of some of his People against him. The Welsh he hasten'd to subdue, and hang'd up their twenty eight Hostages for breach of Peace; but before he could effect it, the Conspiracy against his Person being discover'd, he was oblig'd to return to London to suppress the suspected Nobles, of which he got Pledges; but Eustace de Vesey and Robert Fitz-Walter, the Leaders of it, escap'd, the one into France, and the other into Scotland. The Pope being thus again disappointed of his Designs, proceeded to his last Efforts, and pronounced the greatest and most imperious Sentence that ever was given against any Sovereign Prince, viz. an absolute Deposition from the Royal Government of England; and wrote to the King of France, 'That as he desired to have Remission of his Sins, he should undertake to expel King John out of the Kingdom of England, and possess the same for himself and his Heirs for ever. And to the same effect he sent his Letters to other Princes, and great Men of other Nations, 'That they should assist the King of France in ejecting the Contumacious King of England, who had done so great Injury to the Universal Church; granting them the same Remission of Sins, as if they undertook the Holy War.

With the former Commission were the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the other banished Bishops, with Pandulphus, dispatch'd to the King of France for the Execution thereof; which notwithstanding the Pope seems to have done, rather to terrify King John, than greatness the King of France, whom the Pope desired not to make more powerful; for he order'd Pandulphus to condition thus with him apart: 'That if upon the preparations gather'd by him against King John, he could bring the King of England to such Conditions as he should propound, he should be absolved and restored. The King of France, upon this Request and Order of the Pope, and Solicitation of his Ministers, commands all his Nobility and Princes within his Dominions to assemble their Forces, with Horse, Armour, and all Ammunition, to assist him in this business, and be ready in the Spring under pain of being depriv'd of their Estates; preparing also a great Navy for their Transportation into England. King John having Information of these Designs against him, sends to all the Ports of his Kingdom, commanding, That all the Ships, which could possibly be gotten, be ready against the Spring for this Expedition; and summoning 'all Earls, Barons, and all Persons of every Condition whatsoever, that could bear Arms, to be ready at Dover immediately after Easter, furnish'd with Horse, Armour, and all other Military Provisions, to defend themselves and his Kingdom against the intended Invasion, under pain of Culvertag (i. e. being branded for Cowards) and perpetual Servitude. Whereupon so great numbers of People resorted to Dover, Faversham, Ipswich, and other places suspected for their landing, that sufficient Arms and Provision could not be got for them; so that Multitudes were sent home again as unnecessary, and only the choice and abler sort reserved, which amounted to the number of sixty thousand, well provided for Battle, besides the Navy, much greater than the King of France's. King John thus prepared, stood in Expectation of his Enemies, when privately two Knights Templars, sent over by Pandulphus, came to propound a Treaty to him about a Pacification, which, notwithstanding all this preparation, the King accepted. Pandulphus being presently advertis'd of it, withdraws himself out of the French Army, and came over to treat with him; whom he so terrified with the Forces bent against him, and the Danger he was in, that he yielded to any Conditions whatsoever; and not only grants a Restitution and Satisfaction of whatever had been taken from the Archbishop and Monks of Canterbury, and the Bishops of London, Ely, Bath, and Lincoln, who were fled to the Archbishop, but also lays down his Crown, Scepter, Mantle, Sword, and Ring, the Badges of his Royal Dignity, at the Feet of Pandulphus; delivering up therewith the Kingdom of England to the Pope, and submitting himself to the Judgment and Mercy of the Church. Two Days (some write, six) it was before the Legate would restore him his Crown; and at the receiving of it he swore, (his Earls undertaking for him) That he and his Successors should hold the Kingdom of England, and the Lordship of Ireland, of the See of Rome, at the Yearly Tribute of a thousand Marks of Silver. And this, with his Homage and Fealty, he confirm'd by his Charter at an House of the Templars near Dover. The weighty Reasons which moved King John to condescend to such dishonourable Terms are said by the Historians of those Times to be these: 'The Sense of his own Sins against God, having lived five Years excommunicated, and the Troubles the Kingdom was in by the Interdiction. 2. The Greatness of his Enemies, the King of France, and his Adherents. 3. The doubtful Allegiance of his Nobility, whom he had offended. 4. The Approach of Ascension-day, after which one Peter, an Hermite and Southsayer, had prophesied, he should be no more King of England; which, tho' mistaken in the manner, was in some sort fulfilled by this Resignation. But the Southsayer and his Son was put to Death not long after for his otherwise Interpreted Divination. But notwithstanding this Submission of King John, the Interdiction of the Kingdom continu'd, and his own Absolution was deferr'd, till full Restitution was made to the Clergy, for whom eight thousand Marks of Silver was presently deliver'd to Pandulphus, who at the receiving thereof trampled it under his Feet, as contemning the base Matter in respect of the Grace conferr'd upon the Transgressor; and so return'd with it into France, where he declared what had pass'd in England; and forbids the King of France, upon pain of Excommunication, to proceed any farther in this Expedition, since King John has so much submitted himself to the Church.

The King of France being in a readiness for this great Invasion, and full of hopes of Victory, flew into a great Passion at the Receipt of this sudden and unexpected Message, and was hardly diverted from his Intentions, by reason of the great Charge he had been at, and through the

A. D. 1213. Reg. 15. Dishonour of the thing; but at last, seeing his Confederates all discouraged by the Menaces of the Church, he gave it over, tho' unwillingly; but for his own Reputation, and through desire of Revenge, having so great Forces a-foot, and his Navy ready at the Mouth of the Seine, he resolv'd to undertake something that might give Satisfaction to the Adventurers, and his own People, who had embark'd in that Action. And because Ferrard Earl of Flanders, who was in Friendship with King John, refused to follow him in this Expedition, he falls upon him, who was next him, and enters his Port of Dam, vowing, That Flanders should be France, or France Flanders. Ferrard seeing this Tempest coming on him, sends to King John to assist him, who being glad that he had escap'd a defensive War at home, was eager to enter into an offensive one abroad, both to employ his Navy and keep his People in Action, who would be unsatisfied (he knew) if he dismiss'd them without Action; and therefore sends away five hundred Sail of Ships, with seven hundred Knights, unto Flanders, under the Conduct of his base Brother William Longespee Earl of Salisbury, and Reginald Earl of Bologne; whom being driven out of France for some Demerit, he had entertain'd in his Court, and allow'd him a Pension. These arriving at the Port of Dam found the French Navy in great Disorder, and without Defence (the Forces being gone out of it to invade the Country) and setting upon it defeated it wholly; and afterward, joining their Power with Ferrard's, drove the King of France's Army home with great Dishonour and exceeding great Loss.

John endeavours to recover his lost Dominion in France. King John being elevated with this Victory, and his Peace with the Church, resolves upon great Designs; and taking the Opportunity of this Overthrow of the King of France, contrives to recover all his Dominions on that side the Sea, by assailing that King on all sides, engaging his Nephew Otto, the Emperour, to joyn the Earl of Flanders and invade the East Parts of France, while he with all his Forces would enter the West; for the Execution of which purpose, he sends first a Supply of Money to his Captains in Flanders, and then assembles a great Army at Portsmouth to pass the Seas: But all his Contrivance was delay'd and spoil'd by the Revolt of his Nobility, who refus'd to assist or attend him in it till he were absolved, and had confirm'd their Liberties to them. This unexpected Opposition to his Affairs in hand much enrag'd him, but seeing no way to avoid it, he sends immediately for the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the other Bishops who were yet in France, and promis'd them Restitution and Satisfaction under the Hands and Seals of twenty four of his Barons, and Earls who undertook for the Performance thereof according to the Form of the Charter made on this account before. Pandulphus, with the rest of the exil'd Bishops, came over forthwith and find the King at Winchester, where he came forth to meet them, and on his Knees with Tears receiv'd them, beseeching them to have Compassion on him and of the Kingdom of England. He was absolv'd with great Repentance, and Compassion of all the Beholders express'd with Tears, and swears upon the Evangelists, 'To love, defend, and maintain Holy Church, and the Ministers thereof, against their Adversaries, to the utmost of his Power: That he would bring into Use again the good Laws of his Predecessors, and especially of King Edward, abrogating all unjust Laws: That he would judge all his Subjects according to the just Judgment of his Court; and that immediately after Easter next following, he would make a full Satisfaction of all that had been taken from the Church. Which being done, he return'd to Portsmouth with an Intention to pass over into France, committing the Government of the Kingdom to Jeffrey Fitz-Peter, and the Bishop of Winchester, injoining them to order all Affairs and Businesses by the Counsel of the Archbishop of Canterbury. And here a great Company of Soldiers repair'd to him, complaining, that by their long Attendance their Money was spent, so that they could not follow him, unless he would supply them out of his Exchequer; which the King refusing to do, he took Ship in a Rage, with his Family, and sail'd to the Isle of Jersey, expecting that his Nobles would follow him: But seeing none of them come, and the Season for Action being over, he was forced to return again into England, where he gather'd an Army to chastise his Barons, who had forsaken him. But the Archbishop of Canterbury follows him to Northampton, Urging, 'That it was against his Oath, taken at his Absolution, to proceed in that manner against any Man without the Judgment of his Court. To whom the King in great Passion replied, 'That he would not lay aside the Business of the Kingdom for his Pleasure, seeing the Judgment of the Laity did not belong to him, and so in a Fury marches to Nottingham. The Archbishop still pursues him, and plainly told him, 'That unless he would desist from his Intention, he would excommunicate all such as took up Arms against any Man, before he releas'd the Interdiction, and would not leave him till he had obtain'd a convenient Day for the Lords to come to his Court, which he at length granted. And a Parliament was soon after called, and met in St. Paul's Church, at which the Archbishop of Canterbury produced a Charter of King Henry I. by which he granted to his People their ancient Liberties (which had been violated by his Predecessors unjust Exactions) according to the Laws of King Edward, with those Amendments, which his Father by the Council of his Barons did ratify. This Charter (which is extant in M. Paris) being read among the Barons, they much rejoiced at it, and swore in the Presence of the Archbishop, That for these Liberties they would, if need requir'd, spend their Blood; and making an Agreement with the Archbishop to that end, the Parliament brake up.

Shortly after this dy'd Jeffrey Fitz-Peter, Chief Justice of England, a Man of a generous Spirit, learn'd in the Laws and skilful in Government; the only Man, who in those divided Times kept himself disengag'd, performing the part of an equal Counsellor and Officer between the King and his Subjects; whom tho' the King most used, he most feared and least loved, as bad Princes do their Worthiest Ministers, whose Gravity and Judgment keeps them in Awe. The King hearing of his Death, was much pleas'd, and said, When he comes into Hell, let him salute the Archbishop Hubert, whom he will certainly find there; and turning to those that attended, he swore by the Feet of God, That now at length he was King and Lord of England, being now at Liberty (as he imagin'd) to free himself from the Oath he had made to his great Men against his Will, and

A. D. 1213. to break the Peace he had lately concluded. And first to make himself an absolute Master of his Subjects (of whose Combination against him he had gotten Intelligence) it is said, That he sent an Ambassage by Thomas Hardington, Ralph Fitz-Nichols, Knights, and Robert of London, Clerk, his Commissioners, to Miramumalim the Moor, the great King of Africa, Morocco, and Spain; who was then the Terror of all Christendom, with his mighty Army, promising him to resign his Kingdom to him and hold it ever after by Tribute from him, as his Sovereign Lord, to forsake the Christian Faith (which he held vain) and become a Mahometan, if he would lend him a sufficient Aid to accomplish his Designs; but they return'd with an ineffectual Answer, either because (as his Enemies the Monks relate) he disdain'd the Baseness and Impiety of the Offer, or he was made unable to do it by reason of the Overthrow of his great Army with the Death of his Son, which soon after happen'd. The King being disappointed in this Attempt, takes another way to bring about his Designs, and try Pope Innocent (a Person easie to be induc'd to do any thing for Money) with great Sums, and a repeated Assurance of his Subjection, which he shortly after confirm'd by a fresh Oath and a new Charter to the Pope's Legate, the Bishop of Tusculum, who was sent over by the Pope for that purpose, with a full Authority to compose all Differences between the King and the Church. Several Assemblies were had in divers places to settle this Agreement, and in the end the King having promis'd, and given Security to pay thirteen thousand Marks more in full Satisfaction for the Damages done to the Church. The Interdiction was released<sup>a</sup>, which had continu'd six Years, three Months, and fourteen Days, to the inestimable Loss of the Church and Churchmen, and the King recommended to the Court of Rome for a most tractable, obedient, and indulgent Son of the Church; and the Clergy, instead of a Satisfaction for their particular Damages which they brought in to the Legate, receiv'd a sharp Reprimand for their Obstinacy in opposing him.

John's Success in Poitou.

The King having referr'd the Determination of this whole Controversie to the Legate and some of his own Ministers (being fully assur'd of the Pope's Favour) was gone into Poitou to attack the King of France, according to his Design and Agreement with the Emperour Otho, who was to invade him by the way of Flanders. He landed at Rochel with his Queen, and having receiv'd the Fealty of many of the Barons of Poitou, march'd forward into the Country, and recover'd many Castles and Places of Importance (as appears by his Letters from Parthenas to the Justices of the Exchequer, in which also he says, that he had promis'd his Daughter Joanna in Marriage to the Earl of Marche's Son, tho' the King of France had desir'd her for his Son, but fraudulently.) From thence he goes into Britain, takes the City of Nantz, and prepar'd to encounter Lewis the French King's Son, who was come into those Parts with a mighty Army to stop his Proceedings. But the Poitevins having discover'd the Force of the Enemy, refus'd to fight: Whereupon the King to his extream Grief, forsook the Field, and was forced to come to a dishonourable Peace with the King of France, and so irrecoverably lost his Dominions there. But his Forces in Flanders, which were joyn'd with the Emperour's, and Ferrand's, had far worse Luck; for the King of France having gather'd all his Forces he could together, encounter'd them at Bouvines Bridge, and overthrew the Emperour with all the Confederate Army, which consisted of one hundred fifty thousand Foot, besides Horse; of which fifteen hundred Knights were slain, and Ferrand Earl of Flanders, the Earls of Salisbury and Bologne, and (as the Annals of Flanders relate) the Dukes of Brabant and Lemburg, and the Earls of Savoy and Luxemburgh were taken Prisoners, the Emperour Otho IV. himself hardly escaping, who lived not long after.

The Barons of England hearing of the King's Misfortunes, and fearing his outrageous Anger at his return, assembled themselves at St. Edmondsbury; where after a long Conference about the late produced Charter of Henry the first, they swore to one another upon the high Altar, That if King John refused to restore and confirm to them their Liberties and the Rights of the Kingdom contain'd in it, they would make War upon him, till he had given them Satisfaction therein; and agreed, That after Christmas next they would petition him for the same, and in the mean time furnish themselves with Horses and Arms to be ready (if the King should recede from his Oath made at Winchester at the time of his Absolution, for the Confirmation of these Liberties) to compel him to ratifie their Demands. After Christmas accordingly the Barons came in a Military manner to the King, who then lay in the new Temple, urging their Desires with great Vehemency. The King seeing their Resolution and Inclination to War, made them Answer, 'That the Matter they desir'd being of Importance, he would take time to consider of it till Easter, and in the mean time takes upon him the Vow of the Cross rather through Fear than Devotion; thinking himself safer among Infidels than Rebellious Subjects. The Lords continuing their Resolution, and foreseeing that the King would grant them nothing but by Force of Arms, summon'd their Army to Stamford, wherein 'tis said were two thousand Knights besides Esquires among the Foot; and from thence march'd towards Oxford, where the King expected their coming, according to the time appointed for Answer to their Demands. The Barons being come to Brackley with their Army, the King sent the Archbishop of Canterbury, William Earl of Pembroke his Marshal, with other grave Counsellours, to demand of them what were those Laws and Liberties: To whom they gave a Schedule, or List of them, to deliver to the King; which when the Commissioners read to the King, he ask'd them in great Anger, 'Why the Barons did not likewise demand the Kingdom? And swore, That he would never grant those Liberties whereby himself should become a Slave. The Barons having receiv'd this Answer, and being as hasty as he was averse, resolve to seize upon the King's Castles; and having <sup>a</sup> This Embassy to Miramumalim, the Moorish Emperour, is judg'd by our English Historians a Monkish Lye, invented to blacken the Memory of this King, because he had been so severe to them; for it was the common Calumny of the Monks, that they had no Religion who lov'd not their Orders. Mat. Paris is the only Author that relates this Story; yet it seems improbable, that he who liv'd and wrote in the Reign of this King's Son, and by his particular Encouragement, should dare to report such a scandalous Embassy if it was not true.

A. D. 1215. made Robert Fitz-Walter their General, whom they entitled, The Marshal of the Army of God and Holy Church, they presently march towards Northampton, which they besieged; but finding it in vain, departed to Bedford, where William de Beuchamp surrender'd to them; and the Londoners sent a private Message to them to invite them into their City, which they would deliver up to be ruled by them. The Barons, glad of this news, repair immediately thither, and are joyfully accepted. And now being in Possession of the greatest Strength of the Kingdom, they not only increased daily in their Party, but grew bolder with the King; making another solemn Protestation, never to give over the Prosecution of their intended Design, till they constrain'd the King (whom they held perjurd) to grant them their Rights. The King seeing himself in a manner wholly forsaken, having scarce seven Knights faithful to him, counterfeits the Bishops Seals, and writes in their Names to all Nations, 'That the English were turn'd Apostates; and who-so-ever would come to invade them, he by the Pope's consent would confer upon them all their Lands and Possessions. But this Device taking no effect, because of the small Confidence they had either in him or his People, a Parly by the mediation of the Earl Marshal and others was obtained with the Barons, to be had between Windfor and Stanes, in a Meadow call'd Running Mead, (a place anciently used for such Conferences) where, after many Meetings and much Debate, the King freely consented, for the Glory of God and Benefit of the Kingdom, to confirm those Laws and Liberties formerly restored, and in part ordained by Henry the First (contained now in the Great Charter, and Charter Foresta.) And that there might be no Differences in this kind for the future, he granted them a Security for the firm and long Enjoyment of these Laws and Liberties in this manner: 'That there should be twenty five Barons chosen out of their Number, whom they would, who to the utmost of their power should cause the same to be observed. And if the King, or his Chief Justice, should break any Article of those Laws, and their Offence be discover'd, four Barons of the twenty five should come to the King, or in his absence out of the Kingdom, to his Justice, and signify the Offence, requiring a Redress without delay; which, if it were not made within forty Days after notice given, then those four should refer the Cause to the rest of the twenty five, who with the Commons of the Land, may compel and force him by all means they could, viz. by seizing his Castles and Revenues, (his own, Queen's and Childrens Persons excepted) till redress be made according to their Arbitration. And that whosoever would, should take their Oath for the Execution of it, and obey the Command of the twenty five Barons without prohibition; and if any of them dissented, or would not assemble, the major part shall have the same power of proceeding. And for the greater Caution, the four Governours of the Castles of Northampton, Kenselworth, Nottingham, and Scarborough, should be sworn to obey the Command of the twenty five Barons, or the major part of them, in whatsoever they thought fit concerning those Castles, and none should be placed in them, but such as were faithful, and would observe that Oath, &c. That several Strangers, of which divers are expressly nam'd, should be bannish'd the Kingdom, and a general Pardon for all Persons concern'd in this Difference and Contest from first to last: That both Parties should engage by Oath to keep this Agreement inviolable in all its Articles. The King also sends his Letters Patents to all the Sheriffs of his Kingdom, to cause all his Subjects, of what Degree soever, within their several Shires, to swear to observe those Laws and Liberties thus granted by his Charter.

After this manner, and no better, were the Rights of the Kingdom recover'd; whereof, tho' the Nobles and People seem'd to have had the Livery, yet they wanted the Seisin. For the King being among evil Counsellors<sup>a</sup>, who told him, that by this Grant he had made himself a King without a Kingdom, a Lord without Dominions, and a Subject to his Subjects; presently pretends, that what he had done was by Force, and therefore he had no Obligation to perform it, and resolv'd that he would not; and so withdraws himself into the Isle of Wight. From hence he sends his Agents to Rome (where he could do almost any thing) to complain of this forced Act to the Pope, who by his definitive Sentence first condemns and makes void what had been done, and after excommunicates the Barons. During the King's absence in this Retreat, the Barons knowing the Violence of his Nature, and sensible of their own Danger, kept themselves in and about the City of London, and under a shew of Tournaments, and exercise of Arms, retain'd with them such a number of Men as was sufficient for their own defence; neither seeking to surprize his Person, nor intercept his Agents, both which they could easily have done, had they acted as Enemies, and not as Subjects, who sought not the Destruction of their Prince, but Restitution of their own Liberties, and the Rights of the Kingdom. Nor was the King idle in this his Retreat in the Isle, tho' he seem'd so; but in order to put his Designs in Execution, he dispatch'd the Bishop of Worcester, then Chancellor of England, the Bishop of Norwich, and others, with his Seal to procure him Forces from such foreign Princes as held Correspondency with him, appointing them to repair to Dover about Michaelmas following. In the mean time, without any Equipage, (except a few Servants, and Mariners) he spent his time in Fishing, and Excursions at Sea; insomuch that the common Reports ran, That he was a Fisherman, Merchant, or Pyrate. But at the appointed time he meets at Dover, with those Forces which had been gather'd for him out of Poitou, Gascony, Lovain, and Brabant, under the Conduct of Savarie de Maleon, Jeffrey and Oliver Buteville Brothers, Walter Bucke, and others, all desperate Adventures, leading as desperate a Multitude of Soldiers, whose low Fortunes made them forward in any the most hazardous Attempt. With these the King sets upon his Subjects, who could hardly be call'd Rebellious; and had not Hugh de Boves, who was come from Calis with a farther addition of forty thousand Men, been drowned in the Passage, he had no doubt made a more general Conquest of England than the Norman did, considering what he effected with the Survivors. For after he had recover'd the Castle of Rochester (which William de Albines with memorable Courage held out three Months against him, and was forced to resign, because the Barons dare not relieve him) he marched over the whole Kingdom almost, and within half a Year got in all the Castles of the

A. D. 1215. Barons, as far as the Borders of Scotland, and was absolute Master of all England, except the City of London, on which he was afraid to adventure, because of the united Power of the Barons, who had vow'd to die together in the defence of it: But dividing his Forces, with one part he cut off all ways of Supply, that he might annoy them; himself with another part marching Northward, and laying waste the Countries as he went, as far as Berwick. He was intended to have invaded Scotland, as appear'd from his threatening Alexander King of the Scots, That he would hunt the Fox out of his Hole; alluding to his red Hair: But the

1216. news of some fresh Designs plotted by the Barons brought him back from those parts. For they seeing themselves depriv'd of their Estates, (which were given to Strangers) their Wives and Daughters raviſh'd, and all their Substance consum'd, desperately fall upon another extrem, and fend for assistance to Lewis the French King's Son, promising him by their free Election to invest him with the Crown of England, and engaged to give him Pledges for the Performance; being persuaded, that upon the approach of the French, King John's French Forces would forsake him. Lewis gave a good entertainment to the Message, and in a Parliament call'd for that purpose by his Father Philip, it was resolv'd upon, and a Message sent to the Barons, that he would speedily send them Relief, and be not long behind them himself in Person; having hopes of the Crown of England, not only from their proffer'd Election, but also upon the Title which he pretended from Blanch his Wife, King John's Sister's Daughter. The Intelligence of this Design soon flew to Rome, and got to the Pope's Ears, who presently sends his Agent to the King of France with Letters to intreat him not to suffer his Son to invade or disquiet the King of England, but rather to defend him, in regard he was a Vassal of the Roman Church, and the Kingdom, as to the Dominion of it, did belong thereunto. The King of France answers: 'That the Kingdom of England never was, nor is, nor ever shall be, the Patrimony of St. Peter; and that King John was never lawful King thereof, and if he were, he had forfeited it by the Murther of Prince Arthur, for which he was condemned in his Court; neither could he give away the Kingdom without the Consent of the Barons, who are bound to defend the same: And if the Pope would maintain this Error, 'twould be a pernicious Example to all Kingdoms. With this Answer the Pope's Agents depart, but unsatisfied; and Lewis first having dispatch'd Commissioners to Rome, to declare his Right, and justifie his Undertakings, sets forth from Calis with six hundred Ships, and eighty other Vessels, and lands at Sandwich with his Army. King John waited at Dover for his landing, with purpose to encounter him; but upon notice of his great Forces, and distrusting the Faith of his Mercenaries, forsook the Field; and having committed the keeping of the Castle to Hubert de Burgh, flies first to Winchester, and after to Glocester, and leaves all to the Will of his Enemy Lewis; who, after he had gotten the Submission of all Kent, (except of Dover-Castle, which he never could obtain) he march'd to London, where he is received by the Barons with great Joy; and upon his Oath to restore their Laws, and preserve their Rights, hath Homage and Fealty done to him as their Sovereign Lord. To him also came the Earls Warren, Arundel, Salisbury, and William Marshall the younger, with many others, forsaking King John, and render'd themselves to him. Guallo, the Pope's Agent, pursu'd Lewis; and tho' he passed through many Dangers by Lewis's party, got to Glocester, shews King John the Pope's Care and Zeal for him, and in a solemn manner pronounces the Sentence of Excommunication against Lewis, and all his Adherents: Which, tho' it brought some little Comfort to John for the present, yet did his Enemy little or no harm, nor could confirm his hired Soldiers in their Fidelity to him: For soon after most of them left him, and either went over to Lewis, or return'd home with the Spoils they had gotten; yet was he not so utterly forsaken, but he had Forces enough to annoy, tho' not to encounter his Enemy, and some Ministers at a distance from him, that stood firm to him. Dover-Castle held out with a small Company against all the Forces Lewis could bring against it; and Windsor-Castle, with sixty Men, stood out against all the Barons could do; and Nottingham and Lincoln Castles made a resolute Resistance, and could not be gain'd. Nothing was effected almost, but the Ruine and Destruction of the open and undefended Country, and that in the most fruitful and plentiful parts of the Nation, viz. about Glocester, the Marches of Wales, Lincolnshire, Cambridgeshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Kent, and London, which were the Seat of the War. But this Mischiefe, which had continued all that Summer, came to an end about the latter end of October, when a burning Fever seized upon this fiery King. The Cause of it was thought to be from the extrem Grief he had conceiv'd by the loss of his Carriages, which passing over the Sands between Lin and Boston, were lost<sup>a</sup>, and was increased by a Surfeit of Peaches and New Ale, gotten at the Abby of Swinshead; from whence he was convey'd in great Weakness to Newark, where, after he had receiv'd the Eucharist, and taken Order for the Succession of his Son Henry, he dy'd in the one and fiftieth Year of his Age, having Reigned eighteen Years, five Months, and four Days<sup>c</sup>. The Abbot of Crockerston, a Person well skill'd in Physick, and at that time the King's Physician, disbowell'd him, and would no doubt have given notice to the World had his Master (as it was afterward reported) been poison'd by a Monk of Swinshead-Abby;

Lewis the French King's Son sent for.

<sup>d</sup> Matt. Paris writes, That the Earth open'd, and Men, Horses and Carriages sunk down into the Gulph. The Abbot of Cogshall says, They were overtaken by the Tide in the Washes, and lost in the Water and Quickſands.

<sup>e</sup> He dy'd on the 18th of October, 1216. He was elected King the 27th of May, 1199. He Reign'd therefore seventeen Years, four Months, and three Weeks; or reckoning from the Death of King Richard on the 6th of April, 1199. seventeen Years, six Months, and twelve Days.

<sup>f</sup> Mr. Daniell seems to be of Opinion, That the Relation that King John was kill'd by Poison, which is follow'd by most of our modern English Historians, as Mr. Fox, Speed, and Fuller, is forg'd, depending upon the Authority of Matt. Paris, who liv'd in those Times, for the Truth of what he says. But since many ancient Historians, both Printed and Manuscripts, which are quoted by Mr. Speed, assert it, and Paris himself relates a Passage in King Henry his Son's Life, which intimates as tho' the King himself believ'd his Father was poison'd by the Monks, tho' perhaps he could get no clear proof of it; it is more reasonable that Matt. Paris should conceal so dangerous a Crime in his Son's Life, than the other Monks, who wrote afterward, should so grossly bely their own Order by an Invention, which became so famous, that it must needs meet with great Contradiction. Caxton was the first that told the Story of his being poison'd, in English; and no Author who liv'd within sixty Years of the time ever mention'd it. Caxton also writes, That the Monk poison'd himself so poison the King, drinking first of the same Bowl. Walter Herisingford relates, He was poison'd by a Dish of Pears. And their Difference in their Report, adds to the Discredit of it.

Of those that came over to Henry from Lewis, the chief Men were William Earl of Salisbury, the King's Uncle, who brought over a considerable Party with him; the Earls of Arundel and Warren; and William the Son and Heir of the Great Marshal, who having been six Months in the Service of Lewis, more out of Policy than Disaffection, return'd again to their Fidelity to their Natural King. Yet Lewis found Assistants enough to keep London, with all the Countries about, a whole Year after: So that the young King was obliged to remain about Gloucester, Worcester, and Bristol, till his vigilant and politick Ministers could find out ways to break their united Forces, and draw them from their strong Hold, the Head of the Kingdom. And this they did first by besieging the Castle of Montfourel in Leicestershire, which belonged to Saer de Quincy Earl of Winchester, a principal Man of Lewis's Party, to relieve which a considerable Body was sent from London, and the adjoining parts, who after went to Lincoln, and possessed themselves of that City, all but the Castle, which was defended against them for a whole Year by a Noble Lady named Philippa, a Woman of Masculine Courage; tho' of what Family she was, Time hath depriv'd us of the knowledge.

Lewis and his Party overthrown. The French Forces having here posted themselves, the Earl Marshal, the Protector of the King and Kingdom, with his Son William, the Bishops of Winchester, Salisbury, and Chester; the Earls of Salisbury, Ferrers, and Albemarle; William de Albini, John Marshall, Jeffrey Lucy, and many other Barons and great Captains, with all the young King's Army (which increas'd daily in their March) came to a place call'd Stom, within eight Miles of Lincoln, where Guallo the Legate (to inspire the Army with Courage and Resolution) caused, upon the Confession of their Sins, the Eucharist to be administer'd to them, and gave them a plenary Absolution of all their Sins; and having afterward accursed Lewis, with all his Adherents, as separated from the Church, they set forward to besiege the City, and assaulted it so violently on all sides, that notwithstanding they made a gallant defence (in which the Earl of Perch was slain, valiantly fighting) the City was taken, and all their principal Men made Prisoners; of which these are named, Saer Earl of Winchester, Henry de Bobun Earl of Hereford, Gilbert de Gant, made Earl of Lincoln by Lewis, Robert Fitz-Walter, Richard Montfitchet, William Mowbray, William Beauchamp, William Maudit, Oliver Harcourt, Robert Cressy, William Coleville, William de Ros, Robert de Ropsey, and Ralph Chanduit, Barons, besides four hundred Knights, or Men of Arms, with their Servants, Horse and Foot; by which Victory the King gave Lewis such a blow, that it was the last Battel he ever fought in England. The Spoils of the City, which fell to the King's Party, were very great, it being at that time a place full of Rich Merchants; whom, while they pillaged, they term'd it in Derision Lewis's Fair. Some of the Besiged escap'd out of the Overthrow, but were most of them slain by the Country People in their Passage towards London to Lewis, who upon this Loss sends for more Men into France, and summons all his Party in England to London. The Earl Marshal, with the young King, bend all their Forces immediately thither, intending either to assault the City in their Distraction and Trouble for their Loss, or bring Lewis to some Agreement to relinquish the Kingdom. At their approach, the first being found difficult and dangerous, the latter was propounded; but would not at all be listen'd to by Lewis, until he had received the news, that his Recruits coming out of France were beaten by Philip de Albenie and Hugh de Burgh, with the Forces of the Cinque Ports; and then, being void of all hopes of any future Success, or staying with Safety, he came to this Agreement, 'That upon the Payment of fifteen thousand Marks for his Voyage he would abjure his Claim to this Kingdom, and procure, as far as in him lay, that the King's Father should restore the Provinces of France, which belong'd to the Kingdom of England; and when himself came to the Crown of France, to restore them in a peaceable manner, which he promis'd by Oath to perform. On the other side, Henry takes his Oath, and the Legate and Protector for him, to restore unto the Barons of this Realm, and all his other Subjects, all their Rights and Inheritances, with those Liberties, for which the Contest between the King and People began. A General Pardon is granted, and all Prisoners released on both sides; Lewis is honourably dismiss'd, and attended as far as Dover, from whence he pass'd out of England about Michaelmas, two Years after his first arrival, having been received for the most of that time as King, and more likely to have establish'd himself, and made a Conquest of the Kingdom, than the Norman, because he was invited hither by a strong Party, and maintain'd by others Arms: But God, who is the wise Disposer of all things, order'd it otherwise, and sav'd us from a foreign Enemy. Thus were the Destructions wrought among the English by the Violences and Oppressions of an unruly King again compos'd, and the Son, notwithstanding the Father's Faults, received by the People, who are naturally given to love and obey their Princes, unless forced by Oppression, and despair of Redress, to vindicate their own Rights and Privileges. In this Settlement Guallo was a chief Instrument, tho' more for his own Ends, and the Pope's Interest, than the real advantage of the Kingdom; and so what he did was less worthy of Thanks or Reward: Yet, because his Service was advantageous to the King, he was well paid for his pains; and notwithstanding the great distress of the Kingdom, carry'd away with him to Rome twelve thousand Marks.

The Nation being thus eased of the principal Cause of her Disturbance, began to hope for Days of Peace and Quietness; but this could not be effected, so long as many troublesome Members, who had no way to live but in Wars and Confusion, remain'd in it. For many of the Nobles, who had sided with the King, being unsatisfied in their Expectations, and having no Estates to maintain their Greatness, fell to mutiny,

Things being thus compos'd and settled by the Vigilance and Care of the Protector the Earl of Pembroke, the State receiv'd a fresh Calamity by his Death, which happen'd immediately after, to the great Loss and Sorrow of the whole Kingdom, leaving behind him a great Name for his admirable Courage, Policy, and Love of his Country and King.<sup>b</sup> The Bishop of Winchester was immediately upon his decease chosen Protector of the young King, and together with such of the Nobility as he thought fit to joyn in Council with him, administr'd the Publick Affairs of the Kingdom. While the King was under his Care, he was again crown'd<sup>c</sup>, and had by a Parliament granted to him for Elcuage two Marks of Silver of every Knight's Fee, for the Affairs of the Kingdom and the Recovery of his Dominions beyond the Sea, which was now design'd; and Malleon de Savery the Poictovine, with William Longsword Earl of Salisbury, sent over into Guien to try the Affections of that People to the King of England, and found them inclinable to yield Obedience to him. The King of France also was requir'd to make Restitution of what he had usurped from the English Crown, but returned Answer, 'That what he had got-ten by Forfeiture and Law of Arms, he would keep. To hold Friendship with Scotland, and secure Peace at home, Joanna the King's Sister, was marry'd to Alexander King of Scots; and Margaret, Alexander's Sister<sup>d</sup>, to Hubert de Burgh Chief Justice of England, and the Chief Person that manag'd the great Affairs of the Kingdom. At this time likewise the Welsh under their Prince Leweline revolted, and gave the Nation some Trouble and Charge, till not long after they were subdued wholly. Hugh Lacy also rais'd a Commotion in Ireland, but it was soon appeased by William Earl of Pembroke, Son to the late great Marshal; and so the Kingdom remain'd quiet for some Years, saving that Fulke de Brent, with certain Governours of Castles (the Dreggs of War) having fortified the Castles of Bedford, and some other Forts, committed several Outrages to the Disturbance of the Peace, till they were taken by Assault.

The King come to Age of Management. 1222. The King being now arriv'd at Years of Understanding (viz. An. Regn. 7. and the 17th Year of his Age) was now in a Parliament assembled at London, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Stephen Langton, put in mind of his Oath made by himself, and taken by others for him at the Conclusion of the Peace with Lewis, to confirm the Liberties of the Kingdom; for which there had been such bloody Contentions with his Father, and without which the Peace now settled would not hold, advising him timely to prevent the miserable Inconveniences of such Contests, and ratifie their Ancient Laws and Liberties. Some of his Ministers oppos'd the Proposition (of whom one William Brewer a Counsellor was one) and urged, That his Promise and Oath was constrain'd, and ought not to be perform'd, but their Advice prevail'd not so far as to hinder it: For the King promis'd to ratifie them, and to that end twelve Knights, or other sufficient Men of every Shire were sent into the Nation, and charged to examine the Laws and Liberties, which the Kingdom enjoy'd under his Grandfather, and return the same by a certain Day. This Delay shew'd too great a Compliance with those that counsell'd him against it, and was look'd upon as a shift by several of the Nobility, whose Affections towards him cooled upon this Denial: For presently the Earls of Chester and Albemarle, with many other great Men and Officers, met at Leicester to consult upon removing from the King Hugh de Burgh, Chief Justice, and other Officers about him, who were suppos'd to hinder this Motion. But the Archbishop of Canterbury, with his Spiritual Power, and the rest of the Nobility, who were careful to preserve the Peace of the Kingdom, stood up in the Defence of the King, and would not suffer any violent Proceedings in that kind as yet; and so the Lords effected nothing at that time, but were constrain'd to come in and submit themselves. At this Parliament the King by an Act resum'd such Lands, as had been alienated from the Crown by his Ancestors<sup>e</sup>, that he might have Revenue sufficient to maintain his Kingly Dignity without pressing his Subjects; but these were not enough to do it, for in the next Year another Parliament was held at Westminster, wherein he requir'd the 50th part of all moveable Goods, both of the Clergy and Laity, for the Recovery of those Countries in France, which Lewis the present King, contrary to his Oath and Promise, made in England before his Departure, with-held from this Crown: And tho' this Motion much concern'd the Honour and Dignity of the Kingdom (being the Inheritance of the King, and most of his Nobility, which no doubt they were very desirous to recover) yet they would not grant this Subsidy until their Liberties were confirm'd; which in the end they obtain'd in the same Words and Form as King John had granted them in the two Charters aforesaid, and twelve Knights or sufficient Men were chosen in every Shire, and sworn to part the old Forests from the new, and all such Forests as had been made since, or Lands added to Forests, since the first Coronation of Henry II. to be disforested and disposed to such Persons as were the lawful Owners of them. Whereupon they were plowed, and improved to the great Comfort and Advantage of the Subjects, and Men better maintain'd by the Use of those Lands, which before were left to the wild Beasts, Industry making those Places fruitful, which Pleasure had caused to lie barren.

<sup>d</sup> These Marriages were not celebrated till the Year 1221. The Resumptions began in the Year 1224. and were not done by Authority of Parliament. The King began with the Earl of Chester, and demanded Restitution of certain Lands that had formerly belong'd to the Crown, the Earl being too weak to stand out against the King, now the Nation was in Peace, resign'd them, and other Barons follow'd his Example. Hol. p. 205.

<sup>e</sup> In this Parliament the Barons granted the King the Wards and Marriages of their Heirs, which prov'd what it was call'd at first by such as had a large Prospect into the Consequences of things, Infantum Mali.

A. D. 1225. Two Years were these Liberties enjoy'd by the Kingdom with general Peace and Content, where the King called a Parliament at Oxford, and there declaring himself to be of Age, and free from a Guardianship, to dispose of the Affairs of the Kingdom, he disannuls and cancels the Charter of Forests, as being granted in his Non-age, when he had no Power of himself or Seal, and therefore of no Force; and causes Proclamation to be made, That the Clergy and all others, that would enjoy their Liberties, must come and have their Charters renew'd and confirm'd again under his new Seal; for which they were forc'd to pay, not according to their Abilities, but as the Chief Justice Hugh de Burgh pleas'd, who bore the Blame of the Fact, and the Hatred of all the People; but this bred a new Insurrection of the Nobility against the King upon this Occasion. Richard Earl of Cornwall, the King's Brother, had the Castle of Barkamsted belonging to his Earldom, which the King seiz'd upon without the Earl's Consent, and put it into the Custody of one Walleran, a Dutchman. The Earl returning out of Gascoigne with Forces, flush'd with Honour, seizes upon his Castle, and turn'd out Walleran. The King hearing it, commands his Brother to restore the Castle to Walleran, which he had given him for his good Services, or depart the Kingdom. The Earl answers, That he would do neither, without the Judgment of his Peers; and so departed to his House, leaving the King much disturb'd at his Answer. Hugh de Burgh, Chief Justice, fearing a Disturbance of the Peace, advises the King to apprehend the Earl, and commit him to close Custody; but the Earl either guessing at the Effect of the King's Anger, or having notice of his Design, flies presently to Marlborough, where he finds William Earl Marshal his Friend and Confederate by Oath, with whom he went to Stamford. While he remain'd here, the Nobility, who were lately under a great Discontent for his cancelling of their Liberties and Charters, flocked to him, and seem'd to abett his Quarrel. The Heads and Leaders of them were the Earls of Chester, Glocester, Warren, Hereford, Warwick, Ferrers, and many others, who being attended with a considerable Force of arm'd Men, send to the King to advise him to desist from injuring his Brother, of which they accus'd Hugh de Burgh of being the Cause and not himself, and require Restitution to be made immediately of the Liberties of the Forests, which he had lately cancell'd at Oxford; which if he refus'd to do, they would compel him to it by the Sword. The King, to avoid this impending Danger, appoints them a Day to meet them in a Parliament at Northampton, where they at length came to an Agreement; and the King to satisfy his Brother, restor'd to him his Castle, and gave him besides, his Mother's Dower, and all the Lands that the Earls of Britain and Bologne held in England, and so the Parliament was dismiss'd. After the Dissolution of this Parliament, there was a Motion made for the Holy War, which found so great Entertainment in that credulous and zealous Age, that sixty thousand able Men are said to have undertaken that Voyage under the Command of Peter Bishop of Winchester, and William Bishop of Exeter.

About this time the King receiv'd a fresh Invitation by Hugh le Brun Earl of March, who had marry'd his Mother, from the Nobles of A. D. Gascoigne, Poitou, and Normandy, to come over 1227. in Person into France to recover his Right, upon Reg. 12. the great Alterations which happen'd there on this Occasion. Lewis VIII. the Son and Successor of Philip II. being dead, after his great Siege of Avignon, and his War with the Albigenses in Provence, left his Son Lewis, a Child of twelve Years old, to inherit his Throne; who being too young to manage the Affairs of a Kingdom, his Mother Blanch took the Regency of it upon her in his Minority. This Action so discontented the Princes of the Blood, that they rebell'd, as holding it both dishonourable and dangerous, that a Woman and a Stranger should by the Counsel of the Spaniards (whom she entertain'd and preferr'd above the Natives of the Kingdom) govern all according to her Pleasure, and therefore joyn'd in a League against her. The Chief of them were Philip Earl of Bologne, the King's Uncle by Father side, Robert Earl of Champagne, Peter de Dreux Duke of Britain, and Robert Earl of Dreux his Brother, and with them Hugh the Earl of March took part, being instigated to it by his Wife the late Queen of England, who was angry with the Queen Regent for requiring her Husband to do Homage to her Son Alphonso lately made Duke of Poitou, by which she thought her Greatness would be much lessen'd, and drew in his Brother the Earl of Lusignan into that Conspiracy: But not thinking themselves able to oppose the Power of the Queen, they invited the King of England over to assist them. Henry readily accepts their Desires; and having supply'd himself with Money for this Occasion, by exacting great Sums of the Clergy, and the City of London for their Liberties; and by taking a third part of all the Goods of the Jews, pass'd over with a great Army, lands at St. Malo's, and is there met by many Nobles of Poitou, who with the Earl of Britain did him Homage, and assisted him in making great Preparations to obtain his Provinces, which had been gotten from his Father by the King of France. The Queen Regent raises a powerful Army to stop the Proceedings of the King of England, and much Mischief was done by both sides in Poitou, Xaintonges, and Angoumois, as well to their Friends as Enemies; but at length they were both weary of their fruitless Quarrel, and came to a Peace. The King of England having expended a great Mass of Treasure, and lost divers of his Nobles and valiant Men in this Expedition, returned home; bringing with him the Earl of Britain, and many of the chief Men of Poitou to receive their promis'd Reward, for which farther Sums must be wrung from the poor People of England. And first to the Earl of Britain, by whose Counsels he was now chiefly directed and dissuaded from a Marriage with the King of Scots Sister, which he had entertain'd with great dislike of his Nobility, he gave five thousand Marks, and to the Poitevins the Preferments which he got by displacing his Officers, Receivers, and such as he thought fit to call to an account, and cast out under a Pretence of defrauding him; of whom the chief were Ralph Bretton, Treasurer of his Chamber, whom he imprison'd and fin'd, and Hugh de Burgh his Chief Justice, who had been a principal Man with him, was cast out of his Office, and Steven de Segrave, a worse

Minister

A. D. 1228. Minister a great deal for the Kingdom put in: But no sooner was this great Man fall'n under the King's Displeasure, but whole Loads of Accusations were brought against him. The Citizens of London charge him with the Murder of one Constantine, who was slain in a Riot in St. James's Fields some Years before, and crave Justice for his Blood. Others bring all the Crimes that Malice could invent or urge against him: So that to avoid the Rage of his Enemies<sup>a</sup>, he was forced to fly to the Church of Merton for Sanctuary, but the Sacredness of the Place could not protect him from his Enemies; for being pursu'd by arm'd Men he was drawn out by Force, and committed to Prison. This Breach of Privilege of Sanctuary being heard of by the Bishop of London, in whose Diocese it was; he made his Complaint to the King, and prevail'd so far with him, that Hubert was brought back again to the same Chapel. But this would not secure him from the King's Displeasure; for the King commanded the Sheriffs of Hartford and Sussex to set a strong Guard about the Chapel, that no Sustenance could be brought to him, and so starv'd him into a Compliance: So that he came out and submitted himself to the King's Mercy, and by him was sent Prisoner to the Devises; and his Money, then in the Custody of the Templars, seiz'd upon for the King's Use, as stol'n out of the Exchequer. Walter, Bishop of Carlisle, was put out of his Office of Treasurer, and William Rodon, Knight, deprived of his Place of Marshal of the King's House, and all the Counsellors, Bishops, Earls, and Barons of the Kingdom, were removed for Distrust, and Strangers put into their Places; Peter, Bishop of Winchester, and one Peter de Rivalis being blam'd as the Authors of these Changes.

The Lords combine for the Defence of the Kingdom, and refuse to come to a Parliament at Oxford.

These injurious and arbitrary Actions in the King so exasperated the Nobility, that many of them under the Command of Richard Earl Marshal enter'd into a League for the Defence of the publick Liberties, boldly shewing the King his Error, and unadvised Actings, in preferring Strangers to be the chief Officers about him to the Disgrace and Injury of his own Natural Subjects, contrary to their Laws and Liberties; and telling him, That unless he would reform these Abuses, whereby his Crown and Dignity was in imminent Danger, they would withdraw themselves from his Council. The Bishop of Winchester return'd them Answer; That it was lawful for the King to employ what Strangers he pleas'd, about him, for the Defence of his Crown and Kingdom, that he might by that means bring his proud and rebellious Subjects to their Duty and Allegiance. This Reply bred such Dissatisfaction in the Lords, that they went away in great Anger, and vow'd, That in a Cause of that general Concern to all Englishmen, they would spend their Lives. The King fearing what might follow, immediately sent for whole Legions of Poictovins, and withal summon'd the Lords to a Parliament in Oxford, to try whether they would come or no to it;

but the Lords seeing themselves despised at Court, and not thinking it safe to venture themselves among such Multitudes of Strangers as the King had about him, refused to come; nor would be persuaded to it by a second and third Citation. And now the Signs of a publick Breach became so evident, that Robert Bacon, a Preaching Friar, from the Pulpit in a grave Discourse, and Roger Bacon in a jesting way, told the King plainly, That he would make Shipwreck of his Kingdom, if he did not avoid what the Seamen chiefly feared, Petra & Rupes wittily alluding to the Advice of Peter de Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester, by whom he was misled at this Juncture. But the King proceeded in other Methods, and call'd another Parliament at Westminster, and summon'd the Lords to it; but they dealt now more plainly with him, and sent him word, That they would not come, unless he would remove the Bishop of Winchester and the Poictovins from his Court; which, if he refused to do, they would expel him and his evil Counsellors out of the Realm, and create a new King. These bold Threats, which sounded harsh in the King's Ears, caused him to require of all his Nobility Pledges of their Allegiance by a certain Day, and to issue out his Writs to all, who held any Lands of him by Knights Service to repair to him at Glocester; which being both refus'd by the Earl Marshal and his Confederates, the King without the Judgment of his Court, or their Peers, proclaim'd them Outlaws, and seiz'd upon their Lands, which he gave to the Poictovins, and sent out his Writs to attach their Bodies in any Place of his Kingdom. The Bishop of Winchester to weaken the Earl Marshal's Party, drew away from them the Earls of Chester and Lincoln by a Gift of a thousand Marks, and the King by his Kindness won from them his Brother the Earl of Cornwall. The Lords being a little weaken'd by these Losses, withdrew into Wales, and there strengthen'd their Party by a Confederacy with Lewelin, and the other great Men of that Country; who with Hugh de Burgh, who was then lately escaped out of the Devises Castle, took an Oath one to another, that they would not come to any Agreement with the King. The King, soon after their Departure, pursues them with an Army into Wales, engages them, but with so much Loss, that he return'd with great Dishonour to Glocester; and tho' he sought to recover it by new Recruits of Strangers, yet he mis'd of Success. And now Force being found useless, another Stratagem was invented to heal the Difference, by sending a Friar of the Order of Minors, to confer with the Earl Marshal, and persuade him to come in and submit to the King's Mercy, who was inclinable to pardon him, restore him to his Estate, and give him so great a part of Herefordshire besides, as should maintain him in great State and Grandure. The Fryar pressed him very earnestly to submit, telling him, That as it was his Duty, so 'twould be his Advantage and Safety: But the Earl being nothing moved told him, That the King's <sup>a</sup> Mr. Daniel delivers this Story of Hubert's taking Sanctuary very confusedly and unruly; for the Sanctuary at Merton was not a Chapel, but the Abby-Church, nor was it in the Diocese of the Bishop of London, nor was Hubert taken out of the Sanctuary at Merton by Force: But the Course of this Affair was thus; Hubert having fled to Sanctuary to the Abby-Church at Merton in Surrey, the Citizens of London would have taken him by Force from thence, and were marching in a Body of twenty thousand thither, but were countermanded by the King; and so Hubert abode safe there. After some time Hubert left Sanctuary at Merton, and endeavour'd to get to Bury to his Wife. The King having Intelligence of it, sent Sir Godfrey Crancumb and his Soldiers to intercept him in his Passage; of whom Hubert seeing himself in Danger, took Sanctuary again in Brentwood Chapel in Essex, but Sir Godfrey took him from thence by Force. Roger Bishop of London, in whose Diocese it was, complain'd to the King of Sir Godfrey's Breach of Sanctuary, and procur'd that Hubert was return'd to the Chapel again; but being guarded by the Sheriffs of Hartford and Essex (not Sussex) so that no Provision could be brought to him, he was forc'd to yield himself to the King's Mercy. This Event happen'd in the Year 1232.

<sup>b</sup> King Henry fought the Welsh about Michaelmas, and Hubert de Burgh was in Sanctuary in the Church of the Devises on the 15th of October, as appears by the King's Letter (on the Record of the Tower) to the Good Men of Wiltshire, informing them, That he had sent Ralph de Mowbray and Ralph de Norwich, his Justices, to take Hubert de Burgh's Abjuration of the Kingdom, if he would not come out of the Church and stand to the Law, and if he would do neither, to guard the Church and starve him there.

Promises

A. D. 1232. Promises could not be depended upon so long as he had those evil Counsellors about him, who intended only Mischief to all Loyal Subjects. The Fryar farther urged the Danger he was in from the King's Power: But the Earl concluded, That he fear'd no Danger, and never would relinquish the Justice of his Cause to yield to the King's Will, which was guided by no Reason, and was the Cause of so much Injustice; for he valu'd Right and Honour more than all Worldly Possessions. This Negotiation therefore proving ineffectual, the War went on furiously on both sides with an Effusion of Blood, all the Borders of Wales as far as Shrewsbury being laid waste. But at length a way was found to draw the Earl Marshal into Ireland to defend his Estate there, which being very large, was seiz'd upon and spoil'd by the King's Commillion: And here in recovering of his Estate, he lost his Life by Treachery, to the great Grief both of his Enemies and Friends; to whom the King disown'd his Commillion, to excuse himself from the Blame of his Death. Two Years these Disturbances continu'd in the Nation, when the King called a Parliament at Westminster, wherein the Bishop gravely advis'd the King from the Consideration of his Father's Example, and the Mischief of these civil Dissentions, to come to an Agreement with his People, and remove those Strangers and others from his Person, who were the Cause of these Troubles, and made him disaffected to his Subjects; and besought him to govern his People by his own Subjects and Laws, as other well-govern'd Nations do, otherwise they would proceed with Ecclesiastical Censures both against his Counsellors and himself. The King seeing now no way to compass his Designs, yields and consents to call home his Lords out of Wales, and to restore them to their Places and Estates, to remove all the Strangers from him, and call his new Officers to an Account; whereupon the Bishop of Winchester, Peter de Rivallis, and Stephen Segrave, took Sanctuary, but upon Mediation, and the Payment of great Fines, were restor'd to their Liberty, dearly paying for their two Years Preferment.

1235. The King having thus settled Affairs in Peace, gave his Sister Isabel to the Emperour Frederick II. who succeeded Otto in the Empire, and was Grandchild to Frederick Barbarossa. The Archbishop of Cologne and Duke of Lorain were sent for her, she was conducted to Sandwich by the King, with a thousand Horse, and was married at Wormes. Henry gave the Emperour with her thirty thousand Marks, besides an Imperial Crown<sup>b</sup>, and other Ornaments of great Value, to furnish out which he had two Marks upon every Hide of Land, and propounded to himself great Advantages by the Alliance; but this Emperour was engag'd in such continual Wars abroad, with four Popes successively (viz. Innocent III. Honorius, Innocent IV. and Gregory IX.) who endeavour'd to extort from him his Hereditary Countries in Italy, with his Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, besides the Troubles he underwent at home by Excommunications, that he was not able to assist his Friends. He left a Son and Successor Conradus, but with him dy'd all his Imperial Power in Italy. He had one Son by Isabel King Henry's Sister, to whom he gave the Kingdom of Sicily, and a thousand Ounces of A. D. Gold; but he liv'd not to enjoy them. The 1236. next Year Henry himself marry'd Eleanor the Reg. 20. Daughter of Raymond Earl of Provence, an Alliance necessary by reason of some private Promises made to her Father, but in it self disadvantageous having no Dower with her, and many poor Kindred to depend upon her: However, there was no Consideration of these Circumstances at first. The Marriage was solemniz'd with great Magnificence<sup>c</sup>, and soon after a Parliament call'd to meet in the Tower<sup>d</sup>; but because the Lords were not willing to assemble there, it was remov'd to a Place of greater Freedom. In this Parliament, after many things propounded for the Good of the Kingdom, it was order'd, That such Sheriffs as were found guilty of Bribery should be displac'd, and Men of abler Estates and Integrity should be put in, who should take an Oath, To receive no Gifts, but of Provision, and that but moderately. In it also he removed his Steward, and some other of his Counsellors, and offer'd to take the Great Seal from the Bishop of Chichester his Chancellor; but the Bishop refus'd to deliver it, alledging, That it was entrusted to him by the Common Council of the Kingdom, and without the Consent of the same he would not resign it; and having carry'd himself well in his Office, he was much favour'd by the People. Peter de Rivallis, and Stephen Segrave, were again received into Favour, a great Argument of the mutable Temper of this King, which begat no good Opinion of him among his People. At this time also he would have revok'd some Grants, by the Pope's Authority, which he had made formerly; because they were done, as he pretended, without the Consent of the Church, and beyond his Power, which increased the Displeasure of the People, before taken up against him.

In the twenty first Year of his Reign another Ninth Parliament was held, or rather the same met by Parliament. Adjournment at London, where in Consideration 1237. of his own and Sister's Marriage, he requir'd a 30th Part of the Moveables both of the Clergy and Laity: But he met with great Opposition from the whole Assembly, who recounted the several Taxes he had already receiv'd of 20th, 30th, and 40th Parts; and alledged, That it was unreasonable to suffer a King, who never did any good to the Kingdom, either by driving out or subduing an Enemy, or enlarging its Dominions, but had rather lessen'd it and made it subject to Strangers, to extort so many great Sums from his People. The King hearing this, and being desirous to pacifie this general Murmur, promised by Oath, That he would never injure the Nobles of the Kingdom, if they would relieve his present Wants, since he had exhausted his Treasure by the Marriage of his Sister and himself; but they plainly reply'd, 'That both were done without their Advice, and they ought not to bear the Punishment of that, which was not their Fault. Yet after four Days Consultation, the King having promised to use the Counsel of his Natural Subjects only, and granted them an inviolable Observation of their Liberties, under pain of Excommunication, he had the thirtieth part of every Man's Moveables granted him (reserving to them their ready Mo-

<sup>b</sup> She was marry'd to the Emperour about March 1235. and in May 1236. an Agent came from her Husband to demand the Money which was promis'd him with the Princess Isabel; for notwithstanding the Tax, it seems 'twas not then paid.

<sup>d</sup> The Assembly or Parliament was summon'd to meet at London, and at the opening of the Session the King remov'd to the Tower; but the Lords refusing to come thither, he was forc'd to go back to his Palace at Westminster.

A. D. 1237. Reg. 21. ney, Horse and Armour for the Service of the Common-wealth.) For the Collection of this Subsidy, four Knights of every Shire, and one of the King's Clerks were appointed, and sworn to deliver it, after they had gather'd it, either to some Abby, or Castle, to be reserved there; that if the King failed in the performance of his Grants, it might be restored to the Country from whence it was collected. Before this Parliament broke up, the King, to shew the Realty of his Intentions in performing that promise, which he had frequently repeated, of using the Counsel of his own Subjects only, caused the Earls Warren and Ferrers, with John Fitz-Jeffrey, to be sworn his Counsellors; but after it was dismissed, he neither gave the Kingdom satisfaction concerning Strangers, nor observed such a method in levying the Tax as was easie and convenient for his Subjects. For he caused Men's Estates to be over-valued, and made William Valentine, the young Queen's Uncle, his Chief Counsellor; invited over the Earl of Provence, a poor Prince, to share in his Treasure; marry'd Simon de Monford*, a Frenchman, secretly to his Sister Eleanor, (Widow of William Earl of Pembroke, Great Marshal) and by the Right of his Mother Amice, Daughter of Blanchman Earl of Leicester, made him Earl of that County. These Actions of the King much incensed the Nobility, and all the King's Subjects in general, and put them into a new Commotion, of which Richard Earl of Cornwall, the King's Brother, an ambitious Youth, and Heir apparent to the Crown, was chosen the Head; it chiefly concerning him (as they said) to preserve the Good of the Kingdom, and remove all destructive Grievances from it. Richard accepts this Employment, and going to the King, represents the Discontents of his People to him, and reproves him for his lavish Expence of his Treasure upon Strangers, his heavy Exactions from his People, his impious Gains made of the Vacancies of Arch-bishopricks and Bishopricks, Abbies, Earldoms, Baronies, Wardship, and Monasteries; and yet his Treasure, which should be the strength of his Nation, empty. Moreover, he objected to him his Obsequiousness to the Roman See, and his Fondness of the Pope's Legate, without whose Advice and Consent he would do nothing: So that he seem'd perfectly the Pope's Feudary, which troubled his People at the Heart. The King upon this plain and severe Remonstrance of his Brother, fearing a Rebellion (after he had try'd the Affections of the Londoners, and found them averse to him, and by the Pope's Legate sought to draw his Brother over to him in vain) call'd a Parliament at London, where the Lords came arm'd, both for their own defence, and to constrain the King (if he refused) to observe his former Promises, and reform his Courses. In this Meeting, after several Debates, the King (having sworn) refers the whole Controversie to the Determination of certain Grave Men of his Kingdom, and Articles between both Parties are drawn, sealed, and publickly set up, with the Seals of the Legate, and several great Men. But before any thing was agreed, Simon de Monford A. D. 1238. and the Earl of Lincoln having made their Peace with the Earl of Cornwall, he grew cold in the business; and the other Earls being discouraged by his Indifferency, fell off from that Enterprize, and so nothing was effected, but the Miseries of the Kingdom continu'd as they had been.

A Commotion of the Nobility.

Tenth Parliament.

Shortly after this, the King being displeas'd with Gilbert Earl of Pembroke (the third Son of William the Great Marshal) shut him out of his Court at Winchester, whereupon he retired into the North. And to shew his Inconstancy in disposing his Favours, he removed Simon Norman, the Master of his Seal, yea, as he was call'd, Master of the King, Court, and Kingdom, took his Seal from him with disgrace, and gave it to the Abbot of Evesham. Likewise he turn'd his Brother Jeffrey, a Knight-Templar, out of his Council, because they would not yield to grant Reg. 21. to Thomas Earl of Flanders, the Queen's Uncle, a Groat upon every Sack of Wool; in which Action, tho' they lost the King's Favour, yet they regain'd the good Opinion of the Nobility and People of the Nation, who having often desired their Removal from the King's Council, as corrupt Officers, were found by this Deed better Friends to the Kingdom than they were imagined; and proved, that Officers under bad Princes are not many times so faulty as the World thinks them. But notwithstanding this, the King granted to the Earl of Flanders three hundred Marks to be paid annually out of his Exchequer.

Besides the great Exactions of this King, the Bishop of Rome, to maintain his Wars against the Emperor, extorted great Sums from the Kingdom through the permission of the King; which encouraged the Pope, that he was so bold as to seize upon their Possessions, sending over three hundred of the Roman-Clergy, and commanding by his Mandate that they should be prefer'd to the first Benefices that fell, which much amazed the Clergy in general; and especially Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury, who foreseeing that these Encroachments upon the Liberties of the Church would tend to his disgrace and damage, who should withstand it, gave over all, and retired into the Abby of Pontinac in France, to spend his Life in Contemplation; but before his departure, he gave eight hundred Marks to the Pope as a Ransom for his Church. But the other Clergy bore not the Pope's Usurpations so cowardly; for besides their open and daily Exclamations against the Pope's Avarice, they made as strong an Opposition to his Rapine as they could; and that they might do it the most effectually, they repair to the King, and represent it to him, how prejudicial and derogatory it was to his Regal Power, and Liberty of the Kingdom, to suffer such Proceedings, which none of his Predecessors would ever endure, and would be of dangerous Consequence to his Successors. The King, either not apprehensive of the Mischief, or content to joyn with the Pope to punish and awe his Kingdom, not only refers all to the Legate, but offers to deliver up the chief Op-

† He was Canoniz'd by the Council of Lyons.

‡ The Students in Oxford, griev'd and incens'd at the Oppressions of the Church, assaulted the Legate's House in his abode there, and kill'd his own Brother; for which Fact the University was interdicted, and could not be releas'd from that Infliction but by thirty Students going Barefoot to the Legate's House from St. Paul's, which was a Mile. Matt. Paris writes, He was honourably receiv'd by the Scholars, and that the Occasion of the Quarrel was this: A poor Irish Student begging Alms at the Kitchen-Door of Osney-Abby, where the Legate lay, his Cook threw a Ladle full of Boiling Water in his Face; a Welsh Parson or Clerk seeing this, and having a Bow in his Hand, shot the Legate's Cook through the Body with an Arrow, and a Fray ensu'd between his Servants and the Scholars; the King sent Earl Warren with some Soldiers to assist the Legate, the Earl brought him off; and with much ado the haughty Prelate was prevail'd upon to accept of the slavish Submission the Scholars were forc'd to make him.

D. 1239. posers of the Pope's Impositions to him; which so encouraged the Pope's Legate, that he more pre- Reg. 23. remptorily urges them to supply the Pope's present Wants, and calls a Convocation at London for effecting the same. The Clergy, tho' deserted by the King, yet stood stoutly to the Privileges of their Nation, and told the Legate, ' That the Contribution now required of them by the Pope for the Destruction of the Emperor, and the Effusion of Christian Blood, was unlawful; he not being an Heretick, nor condemn'd as such by the Judgment of the Church, tho' Excommunicated: That it was against the Liberties of the Church of England, being required under pain of Ecclesiastical Censure, as a thing of Servitude and Compulsion: That they had heretofore given a Tenth to the Pope, upon Condition that he should not exact any thing of them for the future, lest it be drawn into a Custom; for as much as Binus actus inducat consuetudinem: That they should create an Enemy to themselves by it, and hinder their Passage to Rome through the Emperor's Dominions: That they should impoverish the King by it, who had many Enemies, and could not live without War long, which would not be safe for the Kingdom: That the Church having made divers Contributions for the furnishing out many Noblemen for the Holy War, was so poor as hardly to be able to sustain it self: That General Contributions were to be made by a General Council, &c. These Reasons somewhat stagger'd the Legate, but not daring to desist from his attempt, he first won the most powerful Opponents with Promises of Preferment, after which the rest were forced to yield: And so the Pope prevail'd in this business by Treachery, and Division of the Council.

Edward the Prince born. The King about this time had a Son born, whom he named Edward; and Richard Earl of Cornwall, having also issue, was at this time allow'd by the Nation to undertake the Cross, (which he was deny'd before) with whom his Uncle William Longsword Earl of Salisbury, and many other Noblemen, joyn in the Expedition. After their departure, Peter of Savoy, another of the Queen's Uncles, comes into England, is feasted sumptuously, Knighted, and made Earl of Richmond, besides many Gifts bestow'd on him out of the Jews Pockets, who were compell'd by the King that Year to pay twenty thousand Marks; and Boniface, the Son of Peter of Savoy, the Queen's Nephew, was made Archbishop of Canterbury. After this the King made another Expedition into Wales, which had often put him to great Charge and Trouble, but all in vain, so long as Llewellyn the Prince or King of North-Wales liv'd; but he being dead, his two Sons, David and Griffin, among whom his State was divided, fell into Quarrels one with another, and so made themselves a Prey to their common Enemy. For David calling Henry to his assistance, did him Homage for his own part to assist him to conquer the other; and so without Labour or Charge (for David paid the Charges of his Journey) he became Master of that which he could not purchase before with much Blood.

Henry goes again into France to recover his Dominions. The Earl of March, with his Wife, the Queen Dowager, and many other great Lords of Poitou, solicit the King again to undertake an Expedition into France, to recover his Dominions there, and by their Assurances of Success, so prevail'd with him, that he resolves upon it, and moves it to a Parliament for their Assistance: But the Design met with a general Opposition, it being al- A. D. ledg'd, ' That it was a great Expence, and the 1241. last Attempt was very prejudicial to the King- Reg. 25. dom; and besides, That it was unlawful to break the Truce made with the King of France, who was now too strong for them to do any good, &c. Yet these Arguments did not deter many of the Nobility from listening to it, being allur'd by fair Promises, and hopes of Recovery of their Estates; and so the Action was resolv'd on, and an Aid demanded for it. But a Motion for Money, after so many Taxes as this King had had from the beginning of his Reign, was very distasteful, and begat nothing but a fresh Memory of the heavy Impositions of Carucage, Hydage, Escuage, Escheats, Amercements, and several parts of their Moveables, which the King had received of them, besides the Exactions of the Pope, and their Expences for the Holy War, they would grant no more, especially considering, that the thirtieth part of their Moveables, which was levy'd about four Years before, and laid up in the Castles, and not to be deliver'd out but by the allowance of four Peers, could not be spent, the King to their knowledge having had no necessary occasion to employ it for the Publick. The King seeing this, comes in Person to the Parliament, and in a most submissive manner craves their Aid at this time; shewing them a Letter from the Pope to persuade them. But all he could do prov'd in vain, they had vow'd not to yield to any Solicitations, and so they held out. Whereupon the King was forced to get what he could of private Men, either by Loan or Gift; with whom he found so much Interest, as that he carry'd over with him thirty Barrels of Money; and so taking the Queen along with him, he went over into France, leaving the Government to the Archbishop of Tork, having contracted for his greater Security an Alliance with the King of Scots, by the Marriage of his Infant Daughter Margaret to his eldest Son Alexander, to whom he committed the Government of the Marches. This second Expedition was as unsuccessful and unfortunate to him as the first; for in it he spent all his Treasure upon Strangers, discontented the English Nobility, (who for that reason left him) and being deceived by the Poictovines, whom he trusted, was after an whole Year's stay forced to make a dishonourable Truce with the King of France; nor could return home, till he had received Provision out of England, and a Tax of Escuage to defray the Charges of his Passage.

After his return he imposed another Tax upon 1243. the Jews for their Redemption, requires a Con- A Tax im- tribution of the Londoners, and was visited by posed upon his Wife's Mother, the Countess of Provence, who the Jews and Lon- bringing with her her Daughter Zanobia, was doners. sumptuously Feasted, and a Marriage shortly after solemnized between the young Lady and Richard Earl of Cornwall, the King's Brother, whose Wife was lately dead, and himself returned from the Holy Wars. The old Countess at her departure was presented with many Rich Gifts, besides the four thousand Marks which she had yearly from the King, upon an Agreement, that he should after her decease have the Earldom of Provence; which yet she disappointed him of soon after her return home, giving the same with her youngest Daughter Beatrice to Charles the French King's Brother, who was after King of Naples and Sicily: So that she liv'd to see all her four Daughters Queens, Richard Earl of Cornwall being elected King of the Romans.

A. D. 1244. After these large Expences of the King's in Marriages and Entertainments, there happen'd an occasion for farther Supplies for the necessary Defence of the Kingdom against the Inroads of the Scots and Welsh, who now revolted. The King had now no way to raise Money but by the Parliament, which was therefore assembled at Westminster this Year, Anno Regn. 28. and the King's just Occasions urged and pressed upon them, but nothing could be effected without an Assurance of a Reformation, and the due Execution of Laws, tho' the King came to it in Person; and to this end it was insisted on, That four of the most grave and prudent Peers should be chosen Conservators of the Kingdom, and being sworn of his Majesty's Privy Council, should see Justice duly administered, the Treasure frugally and wisely expended, and always attend upon the King: That the Lord Chief Justice, Lord Chancellor, two Justices of the Benches, and two Barons of the Exchequer, should be chosen by the Parliament: That as their Office was publick, so should their Election be. But while these things were debating, the Enemy of Mankind, and the Disturber of Peace, the Devil (saith Matt. Paris) hinder'd the Accomplishment of them by the coming of one Martin, a new Legate from the Pope, with a larger Power to exact Money upon the Kingdom than ever, which he supposed was now moulded so, as to yield to any thing; but he soon found himself mistaken: For the Parliament gave him a bad Reception, and sent him home with this unpleasant Message, 'That the Kingdom was poor, and involv'd in Wars: That the Church was in debt, and not able to give any thing: That these Impositions were of ill Consequence to the Kingdom, which would thus seem expos'd to the Pope's Pleasure; and therefore since a General Council was shortly to meet at Lyons, if the Church wanted any Relief, it is fit it should be done by a General Consent in that Council. And indeed the Parliament were encouraged the rather to give this Answer to the Pope at this time, because they had received Letters from the Emperor Fredericke, which were read in the Assembly, desiring, 'That the Pope might have no Supplies out of England, which were only to uphold him in his Oppression of the Empire, whose Cities and Castles he had, contrary to all Justice and Piety, seized; and to detain them from him, had proceeded against him in all foul and hostile ways, to Excommunicate and make War against him: That he had referred his Cause to the Arbitration of the Kings of England and France, and the Barons of both Kingdoms, and hoped that they would not take part with his Enemy, whom he had made his Judges: Adding in the Conclusion, 'That if the King would be advis'd by him, he should free his Kingdom from that unjust Tribute which Innocent III. and other Popes had laid upon it. The Interposition of this Affair took up so much time, that nothing was done in this Parliament more, besides a Tax granted to the King for the Marriage of his Daughter, twenty Shillings of every Knight's Fee, and that with much unwillingness, and a Repetition of all his former Taxes. Having obtained it, he undertook an Expedition against Alexander King of Scots, and commanded all his Barons, both Laymen and Ecclesiastick, which held any Lands of him in Capite, to attend him with all military Provisions, and Thomas Earl of Flanders, with sixty Knights, and an hundred Servants, came over to assist him; which was taken ill by the Barons, because it shew'd, that the Strength of the Kingdom was not thought sufficient for that Action; but it was suddenly ended by a fair Conclusion of a Peace with that King, who is highly commended by the Writers of those Times for a Virtuous Prince. Being arrived at London again, he calls another Parliament in the Winter, and moves for a Tax to enable him to go against the Welsh, and pay his other Debts, which, as he urged, were so great, that he could not stir out of his Chamber for the Clamour of such as he ow'd Money to for Wine, and other Necessaries of his House; but they told him unanimously to his Face, they would grant him nothing. Whereupon he fell upon violent Courses to supply his Wants, viz. He quarrell'd with the Londoners, and made them pay fifteen thousand Marks: He gives a Commission to one Passeleve his Clerk to enquire out all such as had encroached upon his Forests, and fine them severely; which he did with so much Rigour, that tho' he undid many of the King's Subjects, he filled the King's Treasure, and had gotten himself a Bishoprick, as a Reward of his Fidelity, (viz. the Bishoprick of Chichester) but that the Bishops oppos'd the King in it.

And now, that the King might be acquainted with the State of the Nation, and the Oppression of the Popes, it was appointed, that an Enquiry should be made throughout the Kingdom, what Revenues the Romans and Italians had out of England; and it was found that they received sixty thousand Marks, which was more than the Yearly Revenues of the Crown of England; which so moved the King, that he caus'd the same to be represented to the General Assembly at Lyons, with other the Pope's Exactions. This Complaint (with the ill usage of his Legate Martin) so angered the Pope, that he is said to have utter'd these words, It is high time that we make a quick end with the Emperor, that we may crush these petty Kings, (viz. of France and England) For if the Dragon be once appeased or destroyed, the lesser Snakes will soon be trodden down. This impious Speech from a Mouth which should have utter'd nothing but Words of Peace and Charity, gave great Offence, and awaken'd those Princes to secure themselves; but chiefly the King and Clergy of England, who were always most forward to vindicate the State and Church from his Oppression: For upon the Pope's rejecting the Consideration of the Grievances of England, particularly deliver'd to him by the King's Procurators at this Council at Lyons, and despising the King's Message, (who, he said, began to Frederize) it was peremptorily ordain'd, under great Penalty, That no Contribution of Money should be given to the Pope by any Subject of England; and the King so strenuously oppos'd these Exactions, as gave some hopes that they would now cease. But being of a timorous and fickle Temper, he soon gave over the pursuit of what he had bravely begun; and so the Pope continued his Rapine. And tho' through the Exclamations of the Clergy he pro-

* An Elegant Epistle was written to the Council of Lyons in the Name of the General Body of the Kingdom; which Epistle was carry'd to the Assembly by the Earl Roger Bigod. John Fitz-Jeffrey, William de Cantilupe, Philip Basset, and other Barons, who, having no satisfactory Answer from the Council, made a solemn Oath or Protestation, That they would never pay, nor permit to be paid to the Roman See, that detestable Tribute granted by King John.

The King himself gave the Parliament a List of those Grievances which the Kingdom labour'd under, and which requir'd a speedy Redress. 1. That the Pope extorted great Sums of Money from his Subjects without his assent. 2. That he depriv'd Patrons of their Right of Presentations to Benefices by his Provisions. 3. That he oppress'd his Subjects by insufferable Penfions, by requiring Appeals, by dispensing with Oaths, Customs and Grants, and the King was zealous to have them reform'd by Law.

A. D. 1246. mised never to send any more Legates into England, yet he employ'd other Ministers, under the Name of Clerks, who had the same power, and wrought as mischievous things in this Realm.

And as the Church, so also the State, found great Cause of Complaint. For Peter de Savoy, Earl of Richmond, brought over several young Virgins to be marry'd to the King's Wards, young Noblemen of Edgland, of which Edmund Earl of Lincoln had one, and Richard de Burgh another; and the same Year three of the King's Brothers, by Mother-side, viz. Guy de Lusignan, William de Valence, and Athelmer Clerk, were sent over to be provided of Estates and Preferment in England.

1247. Thomas of Savoy also (some time Earl of Flanders, in right of his Wife) came with his Sister Beatrix, Countess of Provence, the Queen's Mother, and they were greatly Treated and Gifted at the Expence of the People. These things were also represented to the King by the Parliament, which met in London in Candlemas-Term, and boldly reproved the King for his breach of Promise (upon his requiring another Supply) having vow'd and declar'd (at the Grant of the last Tax) by his Charter, 'That he would never injure the State again in that kind: They blame him also for taking up Provisions of Wine, Dyet, Silks, &c. of the Sellers against their Wills, to the great Discouragement of Merchandize: That his Judges went their Circuits under a pretence of doing Justice to fleece the People; and Robert de Passeleve had extorted great Sums from such as border'd upon his Forests, and therefore they wonder'd he could desire any Relief from the Commons he had so much impoverish'd, and advise him to take what he wanted of his Favourites, and resume the old Lands belonging to the Crown. They reprove him also for holding the Bishopricks and Abbies in his Hands vacant, contrary to the Liberties of the Church, and his Oath made at his Coronation. Lastly, They all complain'd in general, that the Chief Justice, Chancellor and Treasurer, were not made by the Common Council of the Kingdom, as they had been in the time of his Predecessors, as was convenient they should; but such were advanced to those places of Trust, as wholly sought how to please him, and profit themselves, without regarding the Advantage of the Kingdom. The King patiently endured all this Reproof, and gives them Promises of Redress, in hopes to obtain his Desires; but nothing was granted, because they were resolv'd to see how the King would behave himself towards them first, and accordingly obey and satisfy him; and after many Debates they were prorogu'd till Midsummer. But this Delay produced no good Advantage: The King grew more harsh and severe to his People, insomuch that at the next Session he made a Speech to them to this effect: 'Would you curb your King and Lord at your pleasure, and impose a servile Condition upon him? Will you proudly deny him that which every one of you hath power to do? It is lawful for every one of you to take whose Counsel he pleases, and for every Master of a Family to prefer whom he pleases to any Office, and remove him from it as he will; and will you rashly deny your Lord and Sovereign to do the like? Servants ought not to judge their Masters, nor Subjects their Prince, or hold them to Conditions: For the Servant is not above his Lord, nor the Disciple above his Master. Neither is he your King, but Servant, 1248. 'who must submit to your pleasure. Wherefore he answers them plainly, That he would not remove the Chief Justice, Chancellor, or Treasurer at their Desire; and so he replied to their other Objections, requiring positively a Tax, which he said concern'd their Right as well as his: And so the Parliament broke up in great Discontent. The King being now left to furnish his own Wants, sold all his Plate and Jewels, being told, That as Rivers return'd to the Sea, so they would revert to him again. The City of London bought them; which, when the King heard, he inveigh'd against it, and fought all ways to draw the Trade from it.

The Christmas following he pass'd without any Royal Magnificence, meanly requiring New-years Gifts of the Londoners; and shortly after writes to them imperious Letters to aid him with Money, which at length with much unwillingness they consented to do, to the Sum of twenty thousand Pound; for which, the next Year after, he craved Pardon of them, sending for them to Westminster Hall. And notwithstanding his continual taking up all Provisions for his House, yet he so lessen'd his Hospitality, (introducing, say they, the Roman way of Living) that it was held very dishonourable, and unusual to the English Magnificence of their Kings. Then, whereas he could obtain nothing of his Parliament, he either sends for, or writes to every Nobleman apart, declaring his Poverty, and that he was bound by a Charter in a Debt of thirty thousand Pound to those of Burdeaux, and the Gascoignes, ever since he was last in France; notwithstanding which, he required nothing of them, but in Favour; which, where he found, he would return the like. But he could obtain nothing of them, no more than of the Bishops, to whom he address'd the same Requests. By much Importunity he got an hundred Pound of the Abbot of Ramsey; but the Abbot of Brough deny'd him the like Sum, tho' the King told him, That it was more Alms to give to him, than to a Beggar that went from Door to Door. The Abbot of St. Albans was more yielding, and gave him sixty Marks. To such a lowness did the Necessities of this King, through his own Lavishness, bring him. But tho' his own Subjects felt not the weight of his Wants, yet the Jews did, whom he always polled at every low ebb of his Fortunes.

One Abraham, who was found delinquent, was forced to pay seven hundred Marks for his Redemption. Aaron, another Jew, protested, That the King had since his Voyage into France taken from him at times thirty thousand Marks of Silver, besides two hundred Marks of Gold, which he had presented to the Queen. And in like manner he used many other of the Jews.

The Lords meet again at London, and urge the King with his Promise made to them, That the Chief Justice, Chancellor and Treasurer should be constituted by the General Council of the Kingdom; but by reason that Richard Earl of Cornwall was not present, which was thought to have been on purpose, they could not obtain their Desire; so that the Discontents of both sides still remained, to the great Distraction of the Nation, and great Strugglings were on both parts. But tho' the King could get nothing for himself, he was very zealous to gain something for others, especially to prefer his Brother Athelmar to the Bishoprick of Durham; and to that end, endeavours all he could to persuade the Covent to chuse him. But he could not prevail, because of his Youth and Insufficiency: Wherefore he tells them,

A. D. 1248. Reg. 32. The King's Friends provided for.

The King's mean ways of getting Money.

1249. His Exaltation on the Jews.

The King grows severe.

1250. The King prefers his Brother Athelmar.

* He was marry'd to the Daughter of Guarin de Muntgenst, and created Earl of Pembroke.
* Saying, On my Conscience the City of London were able to purchase the Treasure of Augustus.

A. D. 1250. That he would keep it eight or nine Years in his hands, till he was grown to a greater Age. Shortly after the Bishoprick of Winchester became void, and thither he immediately sends his Agents to prepare the Monks of that Cathedral to elect his Brother; and that he might not meet with a Denial from them, he went down thither in Person, enters the Chapter House, as a Bishop or Prior, gets up into the President's Chair, begins a Sermon, and takes this Text, Justice and Peace have kissed each other; and thereupon uses these Words, 'To me and other Kings, and to our Princes and Judges, who are to govern the People, belongs the Administration of Judgment and Justice. To you, who are Men of Religion and Piety, Peace and Tranquillity: And this Day I hear that you have for your own Advantage been favourable to my Request, and so Justice and Peace have kissed each other. I was angry once with you for opposing me in the Election of William Rale, your late Bishop, a Man that I lik'd not; but now I am Friends with you for this Election, and will both remember and reward your Kindness. As by a Woman came the Destruction of the World, so by a Woman came the Remedy. I to satisfy my Wife, who was desirous to prefer her Uncle William Valentine, disquieted and damned you; so now being willing to advance my Brother by the Mother, will reconcile myself to you, &c. Consider, that in this City I was born, and in this Church baptiz'd; and therefore you are bound to me in a straighter Bond of Affection, &c. Then he commended the high Birth and good Parts of his Brother, and what Honour and Benefit they would have by electing him, but concluded with some Threatnings: So that the Monks seeing him thus to require the Bishoprick, thought it in vain to deny him, and Atbelmar is elected; but with this Reservation, If the Pope allow'd thereof. Soon after happen'd the Memorable Cause of Sir Henry Bath,<sup>a</sup> one of the Judges of this Kingdom, and a great Counsellor to the King; who having gotten a great Estate in his Place by Bribery and Corruption (for he is said to have gotten 200 l. per Annum in one Circuit) was at length accused by Sir Philip D'arcy of Injustice in his Office, and Treason; which so incens'd the King, that in the Parliament holden about this time at London, Proclamation was made, That every Person that had any Action or Complaint against Sir Henry Bath, he might come in and should be heard; whereupon one of his Fellow-Judges accus'd him of acquitting a Malefactor for a Bribe. But Sir Henry was so strong in Relations and Friends, who were at hand ready arm'd for his Rescue, that the King saw he could not be punish'd openly; and therefore he breaks out into a Rage, and said, That whosoever would kill Henry de Bath, should be acquitted for that Deed. But this Heat was soon after allay'd, by the Mediation of the Earl of Cornwal and Bishop of London, who urging the Danger of the Time, and the Discontents of the Kingdom, and that his severe Proceedings with one that had serv'd him in so great Business, would discourage others from serving such a Master; who upon malicious Accusations would forsake them, whose Places are ever expos'd to Detraction, so prevail'd with the King, that Sir Henry upon the Payment of two thousand Marks, was restor'd to his former Place and Favour. The King keeping his Christmas at Tork, the Marriage between Alexander King of Scots and Margaret his Daughter was solemniz'd there with very great Costliness of Apparel and Provision, the Archbishop giving sixty fat Oxen to be spent at one Feast, and four thousand Marks for other Charges, which shews that the Poverty of the Church was not so great as was pretended, seeing the Churchmen could find Money to shew their Greatness, tho' they deny'd it at other times.<sup>b</sup>

The Pope, and Alphonfus King of Castile, solicit the King to undertake the Cross, the latter offering to accompany him in Person to rescue the King of France; who having empty'd his Country both of his Treasure and Nobility, was taken Prisoner by the Sultan, and kept in miserable Captivity, out of which he could not easily be redeem'd; because the Money, which with much Difficulty had been collected for his Ransom, was lost in a Tempest at Sea. This made the Captive King seek other means, and offer the King of England to restore Normandy, if he would undertake to rescue him; which tho' the Nobility of France took ill, and blam'd the Weakness of their King for, yet upon the Pope's Solicitation, and a Grant of a Tenth both of the Clergy and Laity for three Years to come, the King of England undertakes the Cross; yet rather to get the Money (which had it been collected, would have amounted to 600000 l.) than to perform the Journey, which he saw was nothing but a political Device of the Pope's to impoverish his Kingdom, and the other Princes of Europe, that he might enlarge his own Power and Dominion. However the King, as if his Design had been real, first summon'd the Londoners to Westminster, and there by the Bishops of Winchester and Gloucester declares his Intention to them, who added their Exhortations to the People to attend him, but few were moved by their Persuasions; only three Knights, and they of no great Note, are nominated, whom the King embrac'd, kiss'd, and call'd Brethren, checking the Backwardness of the Londoners in so pious an Action, and swearing to set forth on Midsummer-Day. After this, the Parliament was call'd at London to confirm the Tenth granted by the Pope, not by the People; and the Bishops Consent in this so pious a Work was first requir'd to induce the rest, but they absolutely refus'd the same: Which Example the Lords so closely follow'd, that the King in a Rage drove them out of his Chamber. Then the King tries to persuade them to it severally, and first began with the Bishop of Ely, and in a mild manner tells him, 'How many Favours he had receiv'd from his hands, and how forward he had formerly found him to supply his Occasions, and therefore intreats him now to give a good Example to others. The Bishop reply'd, 'That he was glad, that he had at any time done him good Service; but in this he besought his Highness not to expect a Compliance, since he thought it a dishonest Act to recede from the Universal Determination of the Nation, and therefore dissuades him from that Journey by the Example of the King of France, on whom he saw the Judgment of God fall'n for robbing his People to enrich his Enemies, who were grown fat with the vast Treasure that Christian Princes had transported thither. The King hearing this positive Answer of the Bishop, commanded his Servants in a great Passion to thrust him out of his Palace; and judg-

<sup>a</sup> He was a great Lawyer, and the King's Favourite, yet his Master refus'd to take Bail for him when he was arrested.
<sup>b</sup> When this Marriage was solemniz'd, King Henry would have had the Scots King do him Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland, as he had done for Lothian and other Places, which he held of the King of England; but Alexander evaded it, and King Henry was not in Circumstances to oblige him to do it.

A. D. 1252. ing by him what he was to expect of the rest, fell to his old Courses of raising Money by Violence and Extortion. During this Parliament (an ill time for Suitors) Isabel Countess of Arundel, a young Widow, came to him about a Ward detain'd from her by reason of a small parcel of Land held of the King in Capite, which depriv'd her of her Wardship for the rest. The King gave her a sharp Answer, and turn'd away from her: Whereupon she said to him, 'My Lord, Why turn you away your Face from Justice, that we can't obtain our Rights in your Court? You are God's Vicegerent, but you neither govern your self nor us wisely, but shamefully oppress your Nobles and the Kingdom. To this Speech the King reply'd in Disdain, 'Lady Countess, Have the Lords made you a Charter to be their Advocate, and sent you, being an Eloquent Speaker, to defend their Cause? No, Sir, she said; 'I have no Charter, but that which your Father and you made, and have sworn so often to observe, that you might get Money from your Subjects, but you do unworthily transgress. Where are the Liberties of England so often granted and bought? I thought a Woman, and with me all your Natural Subjects, appeal against you to the Tribunal of the most High Judge to avenge us. At these words the King being disturb'd, ask'd her, 'If she expected no Favour from him, being his Kinswoman. She said, 'How can I hope for Favour from you, when you deny me Right? I appeal to Christ against those Counsellors of yours, who have infatuated and bewitch'd you for their own Gain. As boldly, tho' in fewer words, did the Master of the Hospital of Jernusalem at Clerkenwell reprove him; who coming to complain of an Injury done them against their Charter, the King told him, 'That the Bishops, but especially the Templars and Hospitallers, had so many Liberties and Charters, that their Riches made them proud and their Pride mad; and 'tis best for them, that those things which were unadvisedly granted should be revok'd; alledging, 'That the Popes had often recall'd their Grants by a Non-obstante, and why might not he disannul those Charters, which his Predecessors had inconsiderately granted? The Prior answer'd, 'God forbid you should do as you say: 'So long as you observe Justice, you may be a King, but if you violate it, you will cease to be a King. The Fryars, call'd Minors, when he sent them a Load of Freeze to cloath them, sent it back again, with this Message; 'That he ought not give Alms of what he had extorted from the Poor, nor would they accept of such an abominable Gift. Such Affronts did this King meet withal from his Subjects, whose Duty should have taught them more Manners to a worse Prince; but when Princes have once lost the Love of their People, and their Reputation, every one will be ready to shake off their Power, and put off all Reverence to them.

This ill Behaviour of the English to the King harden'd him every Day more and more against them, and made him encourage the Insolencies of Strangers against his People; who proud of the King's Favour, were ready enough to gratifie his Anger, in committing many Riots and Oppressions upon them. Thus William de Valence, an hot and fiery Youth, going from his Castle of Hartford to a Park of the Bishop of Ely's, which lay near his Manour of Hatfield; he destroy'd the Game, and after entering the Bishop's House, where he found no other Drink but Ale, he caus'd the Cellar-door to be broken open by his Attendants, and when they had drank their fill, let out the rest upon the Floor. The Bishop A. D. Elect of Winchester also did great Wrongs to an Official of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Guy de Lusignan being entertain'd by the Abbot of S. Albans, violates all the Laws of Hospitality and Civility, and many others did the like Injuries to the English; insomuch, that their general Complaint was, 'Our Inheritance is given to Aliens, and our Houses to Strangers, which notwithstanding the King sought the more to prefer: For a Daughter of Guy de Lusignan Earl of Angoulesm, is marry'd to Richard (or Gilbert) de Clare Earl of Gloucester, an eminent Man, and much lov'd of the Nobility, learn'd in the Laws, and a great Patriot of the Rights of the Subject; from which this near Alliance to the King could not keep his hands, but he would still defend the Liberties of the Nation. The King promis'd to the Earl five thousand Marks for a Dower, and sought to borrow it of many, but could not; wherefore he again compels the Londoners to contribute a thousand Marks.

The People of Gascoigne being about to revolt, unless a speedy Remedy were taken, the King caus'd general Musters to be made, and gave order, That whoever could expend 13 l. per Annum, should furnish out an Horse for that Expedition. This, with the extream Wants of the King, occasion'd another Parliament, wherein the States wisely considering, that all their Opposition did no good, the King's Wants must be supply'd one way or other; and that it was heavier for private Men to do it, than for the Kingdom in general, agreed to relieve him rather by the usual way, than force him to those extravagant Courses he took: Yet upon condition, that he would reform the Government, and ratifie their ancient Laws and Charters, which (after fifteen Days Consultation about the way of raising a sufficient Sum for this Expedition, which was at length agreed to be done by a Tenth from the Clergy for three Years, and three Marks of every Knight's Fee) was done after the most summan manner, and with as much Ceremony as Religion and State could devise; for the King, with all the Chief Nobility, and Bishops in their Robes, and with Candles burning in their hands, being assembled, the Charters granted by King John his Father were openly read, and the terrible Sentence of Excommunication being pronounc'd against all the Breakers of the same in these Words; 'Autoritate Dei Omnipotentis, &c. they all threw down their Candles, which lay smoaking on the Ground, and all cry'd out, 'So let them who incur this Sentence, be extinct and stink in Hell. And the King, who laid his hand on his Breast all the while the Sentence was read, said with a loud Voice, 'As God shall help me, I will, as I am a Man, a Christian, a Knight, a King crown'd and anointed, inviolably observe all these things. And at this the Bells rung out, and all the People shouted for Joy: So that never Laws were publish'd with more Ceremony than these, except those of God himself from Mount Sinai; and if Prayers could have procur'd the same Thundrings and Lightnings, it should have been done to make them reverently to be observ'd, and the Breach of them formidable. After this, the Business of Gascoigne was readily taken into Consideration, being the thing that requir'd their present Care; which to understand, we must look back a little to the Original. The King, by the Counsel of the Lords, had twenty seven Years before this, freely granted to his Brother Richard all that Province of Gascoigne, which thereupon receiv'd him as their Lord, and swore Fealty to him.

The

A. D. 1253. The Queen, after the King had a Son by her, solicits him to revoke his Grant to his Brother, Reg. 37. and confer it upon his eldest Son Edward, which he immediately did. But Richard, tho' he were depriv'd of the Possession, would not yield to forego his Right; so that when the King was last in Gascoigne, the People were doubtful whom to attend. The King therefore in great Displeasure commands his Brother to resign his Charter, and renounce his Right; which he refusing to do, the King commanded the People of Burdeaux to take him and imprison him; but they considering his Greatness, and the Mutability of the King's Temper, would not venture to do it till he promised them a large Reward of Money; by which the Earl perceiving he was in danger, escaped from Burdeaux, and got into England. The King after his departure assembles the Nobility of Gascoigne at Burdeaux, where having much inveigh'd against his Brother, as a covetous Oppressor, and promised them not only a better Governour, but thirty thousand Marks, (which they required him to confirm to them by his Charter and Oath) he nulled the Charter of Donation to his Brother, and takes their Homage and Fealty to himself. In which, tho' they pleased him, yet by holding him to the performance of his Oath, they afterward lost his Love; and to be reveng'd of them, he sent Simon Montfort, Earl of Leicester, a rough and warlike Man, to curb their Pride, gave him a Charter for six Years, and furnished him with ten thousand Marks, that he might execute his Command the better. Montfort by his severe management so discontented the People of Gascoigne, that they after three Years Sufferings send over the Archbishop of Burdeaux, with other great Men, to complain of his hard Dealings, and accuse of several heinous Crimes, who were heard before the King and Council. Montfort is sent for over to answer for himself; but was so abetted and befriended by the Earl of Cornwall, and the Lords his Friends, that the King taking the People of Gascoigne's part, more to curb his Nobles, than in favour to them. Montfort in an undutiful manner upbraided the King with his Expenceful Service and Breach of Promise, gave him the Lye, and threaten'd to make him repent of that Action, if his Regal Dignity did not protect him, called him no Christian, with many like Abuses; which caused the King to tell him, That he repented that he had admitted him into England, and so much preferred him. The Gascoignes after this were sent for privately by the King, who comforted them, and encouraged them against Montfort, whom he told them he would send over again to his Charge with clipt Wings, that they might be reveng'd of him; and confirmed the State of Gascoigne to his Son Edward, whom he promised shortly to send over to them, wherewith they were well pleased; and having done him Homage, depart. The effect of this Contrivance was but bad. Montfort returns in Flames, plagues the Gascoignes, and they in like manner him; but he by his great Alliance in France, got so many Forces, as overmatch'd that People, and so spoil'd their Estates. The People being thus oppressed by a powerful Army, send over their Complaints again; alledging, That unless they were speedily reliev'd, they must of necessity put their Country into some other hands to protect them. In this State was Gascoigne at the meeting of this Parliament. Wherefore the King, as soon as he obtain'd the Supply (laying afide his Eastern design) goes over with three hundred Sail of great Ships, and lands at Burdeaux in August, in the 38th Year of his Reign, having first deposed Simon Montfort from his Government, and made void his Charter by Proclamation. Montfort retires, and is offer'd Entertainment by the French, but refuses it. Before Winter the King had pretty well appeased the Country, and taken those Castles which had long held out against him, and the late Governour. For they having put themselves under the Protection of the King of Spain, who was a near Neighbour, to maintain the Factions of the Country, the King was forced to be more quick in dispatching that Affair; and the rather, because the King of Spain pretended a Title to Aquitain; of whom, that Henry might be the more secure, he sends to him to treat of a Marriage between Prince Edward and his Sister Eleanor; to which the King of Spain willingly consented. After this the King kept his Christmas at Burdeaux, whither the Queen sends him a New-years Gift of five hundred Marks; and the next Summer she went over to him with the Prince, and the Marriage was solemnized at Bourges, where the King of Spain knighted the Prince, and by his Charter quits his Claim to Aquitain for him and his Heirs for ever. The King of England also invests the Prince and his Wife therein; and besides, gives him Ireland, Wales, Bristol, Stamford, and Grantbam; which being dispatched, the King prepares for his Return, having consumed all his Treasure in these Journeys, which was reckon'd 2700000*l.\ more than all the Lands which he had in those Countries were worth, had they been sold right-out; which, when he was told of, he desired it might not be published to his Disgrace. The Seas being dangerous in the Winter, the King obtains leave of the King of France (lately released from his Captivity) to pass through his Country homeward; and in his Passage goes to Paris with a Retinue of a thousand Horse, besides Sumpters and Carts, where he staid eight Days, and was magnificently feasted by the King of France, which he returned with equal Charge and Pomp, in respect to the two Queens with him, and the Countesses of Cornwall and Provence. About Christmas the King arriv'd in England, and was presented by the Londoners with an hundred Pounds in Silver, which being received without Thanks, they gave him a piece of Plate of double the Value, which had a more kind acceptance, though it could not excuse them from greater Sums afterwards.

The main business of the King after his arrival being to recruit his Treasure, and ease himself of his Debts, which he had by his Prodigality contracted, and now lay heavy upon him, he studied all ways to raise Money. And first he begins to supply himself for the present with Loans, and borrows great Sums of the Earl of Cornwall upon Pawn. The Londoners were also compelled to pay him three thousand Marks for suffering a Prisoner to escape; and the poor Jews are again squeeze'd, and then let out to farm to the rich Earl of Cornwall to make the best of them. At length he calls a Parliament in Easter Term, of which he expected large Contributions to his Wants; but instead of that, he meets with nothing but Complaints of Breaches of their Charter, and other Grievances from them, who insisted upon their pretended Rights of chusing the Chief Justice, Chancellor and Treasurer: About

A. D. 1247. which things, when there had been much Debate to no purpose, the Parliament was adjourn'd to Michaelmas, without any Grant of Money to him; because, as was pretended, many Peers were not summon'd according to the Tenure of Magna Charta. But tho' the King got no Supplies, he had fresh occasions for Charge. Thomas Earl of Savoy, the Queen's Brother, is at War with the City of Tburen, and must be supply'd with Money by the King and Queen, and Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury his Brother. The Bishop of Toledo Elect, the King of Spain's Brother, came over, with other Great Men of that Nation, stay at the King's Charge, and are richly Presented. Shortly after Eleanor, the Prince's Wife, visits the King, with a multitude of Spaniards; and she must be met, and received by the Londoners in a costly manner, and is after much Feasting sent home with Rich Presents. The Pope sends the Bishop of Bononia with a Ring of Investiture to Edmund, the King's second Son, for the Kingdom of Sicily (with which Innocent IV. had deluded the King himself before) and he also was sent back with great Rewards. Then arrives Rustandus, with power to collect the Tenths of England, Scotland, and Ireland, for the use of the Pope and King, and absolve the King from his Oath for the Holy War, upon Condition that he should come to destroy Manfred, the Emperor Fredericke's Son, who was now in Possession of the Kingdom of Sicily and Apulia, and put his Son Edmund in that Kingdom; which the King was so pleased with, that he vow'd to go presently upon that Expedition; being encouraged to it by a Report, that Manfred had received a Defeat by the Pope's Power in Apulia, which proved false; for Manfred had conquer'd the Pope's Army, and was established in his Government by the general Consent of the Sicilians, who were angry with the Pope for giving away their Country without their consent to Strangers. But Rustandus could not obtain that he came for of the Clergy, (tho' he got a rich Present at Tork of the King) who protested, That they would rather lose their Lives and Livings, than yield in this thing either to the Will of the Pope or King, who, they said, were as the Shepherd and the Wolf, who combined to destroy the Flock.

The Complaint of the Merchants of Gascoigne. The King this Year keeps his Christmas at Winchester, and here the Merchants of Gascoigne, who had their Wines taken from them by the King's Officers, without due Satisfaction for them, complain of it to the Prince, who was now their Lord, and tell him, 'That they had better trade with Sarazens and Infidels, than the English, if they were thus used. The Prince addresses himself to his Father, and begs a Redress; but was so far from gaining it, that he brought the Storm upon himself. For the Officers having preposited the King, that their Complaints were false and unjust, he brake out in a great Rage at the Prince's Motion, and said, 'That his own Bowels, his Son, afflicted and opposed him, as his Brother had done; and the Miseries of his Grandfather Henry II. were come upon him. But this Passion being allay'd by his Council, he gave order, That those Injuries should be redressed. However, the Prince fearing future ill effects of his Father's Displeasure, enlarged his Train, and rode with two hundred Horse for his Guard. While the Prince, who was very young, rash, and unexperienced, remained in England with a Train of Strangers, most of them of no Estates, and of youthful and violent Spirits (said to be more Ravenous than the Crew which Lewis brought with him out of France) many Outrages were committed to the great Trouble of the King's Subjects; for they made every thing a Prey that they could get into their power; yea, and the Prince himself is laid upon the Road to have caused the Ear of a young Man to be cut off, and one of his Eyes put out, whom he met travelling about his business; which foul Act made many to have no good Opinion of his Disposition, and fear what he would after prove. But long Experience in Travel, and an innate Nobleness of Mind, so suppressed his Vices, that he after proved a very worthy Prince. But for the present he suffered some Disgrace for his Youthful Follies; which the Welsh not having that Patience to endure as the English had, broke out into open Rebellion against him, who was then their Governour. He craved the Assistance of his Father, Mother, and Uncle Richard, to suppress them: But the King's Treasure was gone over the Alps with Edmund, the Queen's to the Duke of Savoy, and Earl Richard had lent more already than he could get again; and so nothing was done, but only a rough Message sent him, That 'twas his Princedom, and he must find ways to defend it. But the King used all the Shifts he could to supply his own everlasting Wants. He comes himself into his Exchequer, and with his own Voice order'd, 'That every Sheriff which appeared not yearly in the Ostaves of S. Michael with his Money, as well of his Farms, as of Fines and other Dues, for the first Day he should be fined five Marks, for the second ten, for the third fifteen, and for the fourth at the King's pleasure. In like manner, that all Cities and Free-Towns, which answer by their Bailiffs, should be fined for the same Defaults, and the fourth Day to lose their Freedom. Besides every Sheriff throughout England was fined five Marks, because they did not distrain within their Countries all that held ten Pound Land per Annum, and came not to be made a Knight, or freed by the King. Then he fell to the Examination of Measures for Wine and Ale, Bushels and Weights, which brought him in some small Sums; and every Year he had a Quarrel with the Londoners for one thing or another, and got something out of them. Thus by various ways supporting his great Charge.

But now happen'd a business, which as it took up some time, so it was look'd upon by all the World as advantageous to the English, viz. The Election of Richard Earl of Cornwall to be King of the Romans, by the general Consent of all the Electors, who sent for him to receive that Crown. It was first debated in the Council, whether he should accept of the Offer: Some, who thought his Presence necessary for the Affairs of this Kingdom, were against it, and dissuaded him from it by the Examples of two lately elected to that Dignity, Henry Landgrave of Turing, and William Earl of Holland, who were miserably destroyed. But others, of which the King himself was one, persuaded him to it, judging him too great for a Subject, and very useful if a foreign Prince: This the Earl yielded to, tho' with a seeming unwillingness. But the German Writers (who are best Witnesses of their own Affairs) give a different account of it, and say, That after the Murther of the Earl of Holland the Electors were divided about a Successor; some were for their old Custom of electing a Native, others were for a Stranger, who might support their declining State, which was most politick, and at last prevailed. But in this they had some difference about the Competitors, Alphonfus King of Spain, and Richard Earl

Welsh rebel against the Prince.

Richard Earl of Cornwall made King of the Romans.

* His Natural Son.

* The Elector of Treves, and several other Princes, oppos'd his Election.

A. D. 1257. In the Conclusion Richard, who was nearest in Person and Money readiest, was prefer'd and crown'd at Aquisgrave. He behav'd himself, say they, with great Tyranny and Severity to those who had oppos'd his Election, thinking thereby to confirm himself in his Power, but it proved contrary: For having consum'd his Riches by purchasing their Votes, and by giving great Gifts afterward, he was forsaken and dispossest by his Subjects, and forc'd to return into England to his Brother Henry, who was then in War with his Nobles. Thus they deliver it, but in our Histories we find it thus: Before the Earl departed out of England, the Earl of Glocester and Sir John Mansell were sent into Germany to try their Affections towards him, who return'd well satisfied of the Business; and shortly after the Archbishop of Cologne came to conduct him over, and the Earl bestow'd five hundred Marks on him towards his Charges, and a rich Mitre set with precious Stones. This Prince, the Earl of Cornwal, is reported to have been able to expend an hundred Marks a Day for ten Years, besides his Revenues in England. The French, and especially the King of Spain, were much displeased with this Choice, and complain'd to the Pope and King of England, that he was supplanted by the Earl, Spain pretending that he was first elected: But he being a Philosopher, and studious of Mathematicks (which he reviv'd in Europe) he was drawing Lines when he should have drawn his Purse, and so lost his Hopes, and Richard slept in before him.

And sent for over.

Nineteenth Parliament
The King desires Money to furnish out Edmund his Son to be King of Sicily.

About the time that Earl Richard departed out of England, while the Kingdom was yet in its Jollity for this new Promotion, the King calls a Parliament to set forward another, of his Son Edmund, whom bringing forth to them in an Apulian Habit, he thus spake to the Assembly. 'Behold, my good Subjects, here my Son Edmund, whom God of his Grace hath called to the Dignity of Regal Excellency, how worthy is he of your Favour, and how inhumane will it be in you, in so important an Affair, to deny him your Counsel and Aid? And then he shews them, how by the Advice and Kindness of the Pope, and the Church of England, he had for the attaining of the Kingdom of Sicily, bound himself under a Covenant of losing his Kingdom of England in the Sum of an hundred forty thousand Marks; That he had obtain'd a Tenth of the Clergy for three Years to come of all their Benefices to be valu'd at the full Rate, without Deduction of Expences, unless very necessary, besides their First-fruits for three Years; which Declaration was not very pleasant to the Clergy, as may be judg'd from their former Grumbings. Nevertheless, after some insufficient Excuses for their Poverty, they promis'd, upon the usual Condition, That Magna Charta, and the Liberties of the Kingdom should be finally establish'd, which had been so often bought before, fifty two thousand Marks, tho' this satisfied him not. Wherefore the next Year he summons another Parliament at London, wherein he press'd them hard for such Supplies as might enable him to pay his Debts to the Pope; but the Lords tell him plainly, 'That they would not yield to pay him any thing, and if he had without their Consent, unadvisedly bought the Kingdom of Sicily, and was cheated, he should impute it to his own Weakness, and have taken Example by his Brother; who when it was offer'd him by the Pope's Agent, absolutely refus'd it, because it lay so far off; so many Nations were between, the Pope full of Cavils, the People unfaithful, and the Pretender powerful, &c. Then they repeated their own Grievances, how that he had broke his Promises, contemning both the Keys of the Church, and the Charter he had solemnly sworn to observe; how insulting his Brethren, and other Strangers were, against whom no Writ, by his own Order, was to pass in any Cause whatsoever out of Chancery; That their Pride was intolerable, especially of William de Valence, who had given the Lye to the Earl of Leicester, and was not punish'd for it upon Complaint; That they abounded in Riches, and kept him so poor, that he could not suppress the small Forces of the Welsh, who wasted the Borders of England, but going the last Year against them, return'd with Dishonour. The King hearing this, grew sensible of his Fault; and being urg'd with Necessity humbled himself, and told them, 'That he had indeed been seduc'd by ill Counsel, but promis'd by Oath, which he took upon S. Edward's Tomb, to reform all these Errors. But the Lords not knowing how to hold this ever-changing Proteus (as Paris says) got the Parliament to be adjourn'd till S. Barnabas's Day, and then to assemble at Oxford. In the mean time, the Earls of Glocester, Leicester and Hereford, the Earl Marshal Bygot, Spencers, and other great Men, enter into a Confederacy, and provide Force sufficient to effect their Desires; whilst the King put to great Straights for Money, procures the Abbot of Westminster by Promises of great Preferments, to give him a Deed seal'd with the Seal of the Covent for three hundred Marks; to encourage others to do the like; which he sent by some trusty Officers to the several Monasteries with his Letters, and his said Deed, to effect. But all the Art and Threats that they could use, could not bring them to yield to such Deeds. They were told, That their King was Lord of all they had, and therefore they ought readily to offer a small part for the Supply of his Wants; but they reply'd, That they acknowledg'd the King Lord of all they had, but it was to defend and enrich, not to destroy and undo them. So the Officers return'd without Success, and the King was disappointed; and the Prince, who shar'd in the Miseries of his Father's Wants, forc'd to mortgage the Towns of Stamford, Brabam, and many other Places, to William de Valence; that out of his Stores he might supply his Father and himself with Money, which prov'd the Breach of all Love and Favour between them.

And now drew on the time for the Parliament's meeting at Oxford in an hot time, but in Arms at Oxford. The Discontents of the Nation, which burst out then into furious Flames, were much hotter than the Season. The Lords appear'd with a very great Train, as for War, which indeed they pretended to be design'd against the Welsh, and landing of Foreigners at the several Ports; but the Orders given by them to the Londoners to keep their Gates shut, and the Association under Hands, and with Oaths which they had enter'd into one with another, proved some other Design. At the opening of the Parliament they began to call for their former Liberties, and require strictly the Observation of them, according to the King's Oath formerly made, That the b 'Tis said he carry'd over 700000 l. with him into Germany, an immense Sum in those times.

c He oblig'd his Covent for 2500 Marks. M. Paris.

A. D. 1258. Chief Justice, Chancellour, and Treasurer should be chosen by the People; That twenty four Conservators of the Kingdom be appointed, twelve by the Election of the King, and twelve of the Lords, and many things else which they imagin'd to be for their Security. The King seeing their Strength, and observing after what manner they requir'd these things, swears solemnly again to the Confirmation of them, and causes his Son the Prince to take the same Oath. But the Lords were not thus satisfied, the King's Brethren, all the Poictovines and Strangers must be presently remov'd, and the Kingdom clear'd of them; and this they would have all the Peers of the Nation to see done: But the Prince, Earl Warren, and Henry the eldest Son of Richard, now King of the Romans*, strongly oppos'd it, the last refusing to take his Oath without his Father's Leave: Whereupon the rest told him, 'That if his Father would not joyn with the Barons in this Case, he should not hold a Furrow of Land in England. In the end, the King's Brethren, and all their Followers, are deprived of their Estates, and banish'd by Proscription under the King's own hand, directed to the Earls of Hereford and Surrey, with a Charge not to suffer them to pass either with Money, Arms, or Equipage, other than as the Lords appointed; and after their departure, he enjoy'd the City of Bristol and other Ports, not to permit any Strangers or Kinsman of his to enter the Kingdom, unless they behav'd themselves as both he and the Lords should like. The Poictovines flying to Bologne in France, sent to King Lewis to beg a safe Passage through his Country into Poitou; but by the French Queen's means, who had heard they had disgrac'd her Sister of England, they were deny'd, and Henry Son to the Earl of Leicester is sent to incense the French against them. And now, as Envy is always ready to thrust headlong, such as are falling, the Poictovines have all the Mischiefs laid to their Charge imaginable. The Sickness and Death of divers great Men, which happen'd soon after this Fatal Parliament, are imputed to Poisons made and given by these Gentlemen, and some executed, as Walter Scoyny, the Earl of Glocester's Steward, because his Master and his Brother had been dangerously sick, tho' they could prove nothing against him. Elias, a converted Jew, asserted, That the Poison was prepar'd in his House, but it was when he was a Devil, not a Christian: Every Man that had receiv'd any Wrong by these great Men, put up their Complaints, and are heard with Aggravations of their Insolence and Injustice. Guido de Rochfort, a Poictovine, to whom the King had given the Castle of Rochester, is banish'd, and all his Goods confiscated; William Bussey, Steward to William de Valence, is committed to the Tower of London, and cruelly used as an Instrument of his Master's Insolencies; Richard Gray, whom the Lords had made Captain of Dover Castle, is set to intercept whatever the Poictovines carried that way to convey out of England, who took a great deal of Treasure from them, and the Elect of Winchester, besides great Sums which they had put in the new Temple, all which were seiz'd into the King's Hand. And that the People in this Execution of Justice, as 'twas thought, tho' much Wrong was done under that Umbrage, might not think themselves forgotten, the new Chief Justice Hugh Bygot the Marshal's Brother (who was chosen by the Parliament) procures, that four Knights in every Shire should inquire into the Oppressions of the Poor, done by those great Men, and certifie the same under their Hands and Seals to the Barons, that Redress might be made. Moreover Order was taken, 'That from thenceforth no Man should give any thing (but Provisions) for Justice, or to hinder it; but the Corrupter and corrupted to be grievously punish'd. But notwithstanding this Care for the Publick, yet the Lords oppress'd the King's Tenants that dwelt near them, and became Totidem Tyranni: For they furnish'd the chief Forts of the Kingdom with Garrisons of their own, sworn to be faithful to the State, and to the like Assurance of all the Sheriffs, Bailiffs, Coroners, and other publick Officers, inquiring by Oath into the Behaviour of many Commissioners; and to make their Cause the more popular, they gave it out, that the King's Necessities must be supply'd out of the Peoples Estates, and that he would not want while they had it: Whereupon the King issues out his Proclamation, declaring, 'That whereas certain malicious Persons had falsly and seditiously reported, that he design'd unlawfully to charge his Subjects, and subvert the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom, and by such false Suggestions, drew the Hearts of his People from him; he desir'd them not to give Credit to such Disturbers of their Peace, because he was resolv'd to defend all Rights and Customs belonging to them; and that they might be assur'd of it, he had caused these his Letters to be made Patents.

And now Montfort, Glocester, and Spencer, who had by the late Constitution of the twenty four Conservators of the Kingdom, gotten the whole Management of all things into their hand, forc'd the King to call a Parliament at London, where the whole Authority of the twenty four was devolv'd upon them, and Order taken, That three of them at the least should always attend at Court to dispose of the Custody of Castles, and manage other Busineses of the Kingdom, to direct the Chancellor, Chief Justice and Treasurer, and all other Officers both great and small; and besides, oblige the King to loose them from their Obedience whensoever he broke his Charter. In this State and Condition was the Kingdom, when there came Intelligence to the Lords, that Richard King of the Romans was coming over into England; which being not expected, gave them grounds to suspect, that he was sent for by the King to come over with an Army to overthrow their Constitution, as King John had done: Whereupon they sent to him to know the Cause of his coming, and require an Oath of him before he landed, that he would do nothing prejudicial to their Establishment newly made in the Kingdom. But the King of the Romans gave them a stern Answer and Refusal, saying, 'He had no Peer in England, being the Son and Brother of a King, and therefore was above their Power; and if they saw it necessary to reform the Kingdom, they ought first to have sent for him, and not so presumptuously attempted a Business of so great Importance without him. The Lords, upon the hearing of this Answer, sent down a Force to guard the Ports, and came down well arm'd, and attended to encounter him if necessary; but finding his Train small, viz. only his Queen, two German Earls, and eight Knights, they permitted him to land upon his Promise of taking their Oath, which they propounded to him; but would not permit him nor the King, who also came Strangers to be banish'd.

Twentieth Parliament

Richard King of the Romans comes into England.

* The Judges also making some shew of Opposition, incur'd the Odium of the People so much, that they would not admit them to do their Office in their Circuits.

A. D. 1258. down to meet him, to enter into Dover Castle. At Canterbury they brought him into the Chapter-house, and the Earl of Glocester standing forth in the midst, called out the Earl, not by the Name of King, but Richard Earl of Cornwall, who in a reverent manner came forth, and took his Oath in this form: 'Hear all Men, that I Richard Earl of Cornwall do here swear upon the Holy Evangelists, to be faithful and diligent to reform with you the Kingdom of England, which hath by the Counsel of wicked Persons been heretofore much disorder'd; be an effectual Assistant with you to expel the Rebels and Disturbers of the same: And this Oath I will inviolably observe under the penalty of losing all the Land I have in England. So help me God.' By this means the Lords endeavour'd to joyn this Earl to them, supposing that his Power was greater than it really was; which at length they found to be nothing but an airy Title. For having in two Years consumed all those vast Riches which he had gather'd with great frugality in many, he return'd home poor, and forsaken of the Germans, without any Means to trust to, but what he had in England.

1259. Upon the Earl's return into England the King takes heart, and sought all means to recover his Power, which the Barons had retrench'd; and to that end first of all sends his Ambassadors to Rome to procure an Absolution from his forced Oath made to them, and then sends into Scotland to the King, and Queen his Daughter, for Aids to be ready upon occasion. And that he might not be diverted in his Design by the King of France, he makes an absolute Resignation of his Right to the Dutchy of Normandy, and the Earldoms of Anjou, Poitou, Turene, and Main; for which he was to receive of the King of France three hundred thousand Pounds (some say Crowns) of Angloine Money, and to be secured in the Enjoyment of all Guien beyond the River Garonne, all the Country of Xantonge as far as the River Charente, the Countries of Lanousin and Quercy, for him and his Successors, doing their Homage and Fealty to the Crown of France, as a Duke of Aquitain, and a Peer of that Kingdom. The Lords likewise, on the other side, seek all ways to strengthen their Association, by keeping each other to their Oaths, and Observation of their Orders, which was very hard for them to do, being of several Inclinations, and sometimes at odds among themselves. For the Earl of Leicester, (a chief Leader of the Faction) finding the Earl of Glocester a little staggering, told him plainly, 'That he cared not to live with Men of such mutable and uncertain Tempers, as my Lord of Glocester seem'd to be; who, as he was the most eminent, so he was the most obliged to stand to what had been undertaken for the good of the Kingdom. By these Heats he incensed many, being animated in them by Walter Bishop of Worcester, and Robert Bishop of Lincoln, who enjoyned him upon Remission of his Sins to prosecute the Cause unto Death; affirming, 'That the Peace of the Church of England could never be established but by the Material Sword. Many also were drawn by various Temptations to leave them, especially after the King of France had given his Sentence against them, being chosen an Arbiter in the Quarrel; for tho' he allowed the Confirmation of King John's Charter, yet he condemned all the Provisions of Oxford; which, tho' they pretended to be grounded upon the Charter, yet it much advantaged the King's Cause, and made them thought unlawful; so that many dispensed with their Oaths, and left their Party: Among whom were Henry the Son of the Earl of Cornwall (on whom the Prince had bestow'd the Honour of Tickbill) who coming to the Earl of Leicester, told him, 'That he would not be against his Father the King, nor his Allies; but added, 'My Lord, I will never bear Arms against you, and therefore I crave leave to depart. The Earl cheerfully replied: 'My Lord, Henry, I am not sorry for your Departure, but for your Inconstancy; Go, return with your Arms, and I fear them not at all. This Example was followed by Roger de Clifford, Roger de Leiborn, Haymo Le-Strange, and many others, who were won by Gifts, to forsake the Barons. Shortly after this Roger Mortimer, who was for the King, begins the Quarrel about three Years after the Parliament at Oxford, entering into the Lands of the Earl of Leicester, and spoiling all before him, because the said Earl combining with Llewellyn Prince of Wales, had sent Forces to seize upon Mortimer's Lands in those parts. The Prince joyns with Mortimer, and surprizes the Castle of Brecknock, with other places of Strength, which he delivers into his Custody. The Earl of Leicester recovers the Town and Castle of Glocester, and forces the Citizens to pay a thousand Pound for their Redemption; then goes with his Army to Worcester, where he possessed himself of the Castle; and so went to Shrewsbury, and so comes about to the Isle of Ely, conquers the same, and became very powerful. The King not being fully ready for him, and fearing lest his approach to London should prove prejudicial to him, mediates for a Peace, and obtains it upon these Conditions: 'That all the King's Castles should be put into the keeping of the Barons; That the Provisions of Oxford should be inviolably observed; That all Strangers by a certain time should depart the Kingdom, except only such as by a general

Diffentions among the Lords, and several desert them, and go over to the King.

* The Earl of Leicester protested against this Resignation in right of his Wife, who, as King Henry's Sister, had a Title expectant.

* Henry is said to have repented of this Bargain, tho' under vast Necessities, and never to have taken the Money.

* The Reference made to the King of France, which Mr. Daniell gives no account of, and so leaves this part of the History, concerning the Breach between the King and his Barons, in the dark, was thus: Soon after the arrival of the King of the Romans in England, Henry assum'd of his too easie Condescensions to the Barons Encroachments upon his Prerogative, especially by the late Provisions of Oxford, calls a Meeting in the same City, and declar'd plainly to his Lords, 'That for as much as he evidently saw, that they sought not the Kingdom's, and his, but their own advantage, and went about to subvert the Regal Authority to their Wills, he would no longer be rul'd by them or their Council, but provide some way to secure his Dignity from them. The Lords, as resolute to hold what they had, as zealous to get it, boldly Answer, 'That they would hold to the Provisions at Oxford, and maintain them to their Lives end: And so were departing. But the Bishops seeing what would ensue, interpos'd between the King and Barons, and persuaded them to refer the Controversie to the King of France, which both Parties agreed to; yet did not cease to make Preparations for their own Defence on both sides. The King of France gave Sentence wholly for the King, and therefore the Quarrel ought to have ended, tho' it did not. Some Lords indeed came over to the King upon it; but the Earl of Leicester had a strong Party still, which held out against King Henry. Some other Authors say, The Barons were so far from referring the Matter to the French King, that when Lewis the Ninth propos'd to have the foreign Lords, who had been banish'd by Procurement of the Barons, restor'd to their Places and Estates, the Earl of Leicester, in the Names of the English Lords, reply'd, 'That they were not oblig'd to give any account of what had been done in England in the Court of France, but only in that of their own Prince, and that only by Judgment of their Peers. (Annals of St. August. and a Manuscript Hist. in the Cottonian Library.) Yet afterwards, by the Persuasion of the Bishops, the Lords consented, that Lewis should be Arbitrator of their Differences; and the King of France, who was after his Death canoniz'd for his Piety, gave this Sentence, the 3d of Febr. 1263. 'That the Provisions of Oxford were null and void; That notwithstanding the ancient Laws and Constitutions, the King might nominate his Chief Justice, Chancellor, Treasurer, and all other Officers of the Kingdom; and that Foreigners were as capable of Offices and Dignities in England as the Natives.

A. D. 1264. Reg. 48. Consent should be judged faithful, and profitable for the same. All this he granted to get time only to greaten his Party. The Prince had fortified Windsor-Castle, well victual'd it, and put in Strangers to defend it; himself marching to Bristol, where in a Quarrel between his Men and the Citizens, he had the worst; and was forced to send for the Bishop of Worcester (a considerable Man on the Barons side) to protect him, and conduct him back. When he came near Windsor, he got into the Castle, which the Earl of Leicester was come to besiege; and being about Kingstone, the Prince met him to treat of a Peace; but the Earl refusing it, lays Siege to the Castle, which was surrender'd to him; and the Strangers being turn'd out, were sent into France. The King, to get a little more time, calls another Parliament at London, wherein he gained many Lords to his Party; with whom, and the Prince, Richard Earl of Cornwall, Henry his Son, and William de Valence, with the rest of his Brethren, he marched to Oxford, where several Lords of Scotland came to his assistance, viz. John Comin, John Baliol, Lord of Galloway, Robert Bruce, and others, as also several of the Northern Barons, as Clifford, Percy, Bassett, &c. From Oxford with all his Forces he marched to Northampton, where he took Simon Montfort the younger, with fourteen other great Men, Prisoners; and from thence he passed to Nottingham, laying waste the Estates of the Barons which lay in those parts. The Earl of Leicester draws towards London in the mean time to gain that City, as of greatest Importance, and seeks to secure Kent, and the Ports; but the King, to stop his proceedings, sends Relief to the Castle of Rochester, which was then besieged; and was so successful, that the Earls of Leicester and Gloucester, in behalf of themselves and their Party, write to the King, humbly protesting their Loyalty, and declaring, That they opposed not him, but such only as were his and the Kingdom's Enemies. The King returns them answer, That they were the Disturbers of his Kingdom, and Enemies of his Person, and sought the Destruction of both, and therefore defies them. The Prince also and Earl of Cornwall sent their Letters of Defiance to them. The Barons, notwithstanding this, distrusting their Strength, and unwilling to put all to the hazard of a Battel, send the Bishops of London and Worcester to mediate for a Peace, offering thirty thousand Marks to the King for the Damages done in these Wars, so that the Statutes of Oxford might be observed. But this yielding Grant procured them no advantage, being interpreted as an Argument of their own Weakness and Distrust; and the King, secure of Victory, would hearken to no Proposals of Peace. The Earl of Leicester seeing that there was a necessity of venturing the Fortune of a Battel, and being a Man skilful in such Affairs, studies to supply the want of Hands with Wit, gets ready sooner than was expected, and having placed his Soldiers very advantageously upon the side of an Hill, near Lewis, (his Men wearing white Crosses to denote the Justice of his Cause) offer'd to give the King Battel; which he, confident in his own Power, as readily embraced. The Battel was very bloody, but the Victory fell to the Earl of Leicester; Simon

de Montfort, and the King, Prince, Earl of Cornwall, and his Son Henry, the Earls of Arundel and Hereford, and all the Scotch Lords, taken Prisoners. Reg. 48. The Earl Warren, William de Valence, Guy de Lusignan, the King's Brethren, with Hugh Bigod the Earl Marshal, saved themselves by flight; and five thousand were slain in the Combat. The Earl of Leicester for a Year and a half kept his Royal Prisoners in his power, and carry'd the King about with him to countenance his Actions, till he had gotten all the strongest Castles of the Kingdom into his Hands. He seem'd now a King, even of Kings, and England wholly his, when on a sudden Providence made way for a Change, to humble prosperous Rebellion several ways. The Prince made his escape out of Hereford Castle, and got a Party to recover his Father's Losses; which yet was despicable in the Eyes of the great Earl, till an addition was made to it by his own Party upon this occasion: The Earls of Leicester and Gloucester coming to make a Dividend of their Gains by Victory, according to the Agreement of their Confederacy, fell into a sharp Debate; and Gloucester taxes Leicester (as Fortune often makes Men forget themselves) of neglecting the common Good to promote his own private and particular Interests, in that he took to himself the benefit and disposal of the King's Castles, assumed the Power of the Redemption of Prisoners as he pleased; and to prolong the business, would not use the means of a Parliament to end it. This Charge incensed Leicester, but more angered his Sons, who, exalted with their Father's Greatness, behav'd themselves with strange Insolence to him; which Gloucester took so ill, that he left him, and betook himself to the Prince, to whom he carry'd over a great Party with him, by which he was enabled to gain many places of Strength in England and Wales. The Earl of Leicester, to stop the proceedings of this mighty Prince, (who was now with his Army about Worcester) encamps in a Plain near Evesham to give him Battel; and as the Prince's Forces drew up to him, observing their orderly approach, he said to his Followers: These Men come on bravely, they learnt it not of themselves, but of me. And seeing himself likely to be beset and overpower'd with Numbers, he advised his Friends, Hugh Spencer, Ralph Bassett, and several others to shift for themselves; which, when he saw they refused to do, he said, Let us commit our Souls to God, for our Bodies are theirs; and so undertaking the main stress of the Battel, perished in it; and with him were slain his Son Henry, and eleven other Barons, with many thousands of common Soldiers. At the time of the Earl's Death there happen'd so terrible a Thunder, Lightning, and Darknes, as affrighted them more than their terrible Slaughter. And thus dy'd the great Earl of Leicester, the worthiest Man of his time, had he been as good a Subject; yet so much honoured by the People after his Death, that they would have worshipp'd him as a Saint, if the succeeding Kings would have permitted it. This Battel delivered the Captive King, and rid him of his Goaler, Montfort, whom he hated, and long feared, more than any Man living. After his Deliverance, the King, with the victorious Prince, who had redeemed both him

* The King was at the Abbey of Lewis in Sussex at this time, and the Lords about six Miles distant from it.

* The King of the Romans, and Henry his Son, the Earl imprison'd in the Tower, Prince Edward in Wallingford-Castle, but the King he carry'd about with him where-ever he went in Triumph.

* The Earl of Gloucester claim'd his share of the Ransom-Money paid by the Prisoners, and particularly demanded the King of the Romans, and Henry his Son, who surrender'd themselves to him at the Battel of Lewis.

* This Battel was fought on the 4th of August, 1265.

A. D. 1265. and the Kingdom, went to Winchester, and call'd a Parliament; in which all who adher'd to Simon Montfort, were depriv'd of their Estates, which were conferr'd upon others at the King's Pleasure. The Londoners had their Liberties taken from them; Simon and Guy de Montfort, the Sons of the Earl of Leicester, with the disseized Barons, and others, who had escap'd the Battel of Evesham, took and defended the Isle of Ely. The Castle of Killingworth was defended by the Servants of the late Earl, tho' it were in the Heart of the Kingdom, and maintain'd a Siege of half a Year against the King and his Army; but in the end, their Victuals failing, yielded upon Condition, 'That they should depart with their Lives, Members, and Goods safe: And thus concluded this Rebellion. And it is worthy of our Observation, That we find no Executions of Men put to Death, except in open Battel, in all these Combuſtions; or any Nobleman dying on the Scaffold, either in this King's Reign or any other since the Conqueror, which is now almost three hundred Years. Only in the 26th Year of this King, William Marshal the Son of Jeffrey Marshal, a Nobleman of Ireland, being condemn'd for Piracy and Treason was hang'd, headed and quarter'd, which is the first Example of that kind of Punishment, which we read in our Histories.

the King.

After this Parliament at Winchester, the King marches with an Army against the disseized Barons and their Adherents, who were many desperate Persons strongly linked together; but being come to Northampton, Simon and Guy de Montfort, by the Mediation of Friends and Promises of Favour, came and submitted themselves to the King; who at the Request of the Earl of Cornwall their Uncle, and the Lord Philip Basset, had restor'd them to their Estates: But Glocester and some others, who doubted their Affections, perswaded the King to keep them under; so that they were forc'd in the end to flee the Kingdom and make their Fortunes, the elder in France and the younger in Italy, where they rais'd two great Families. Their Mother was banish'd soon after the Battel of Evesham: 'She was a Lady of great Worth, the Daughter and Sister to a King, culpable only by her Fortune; who being spoil'd of her Coronet of miserable Honour, betook her self to a Religious Life, and dy'd a Nun at Montargis in France. Three Years the disseized Barons held out in those Fortresses of the Kingdom, where they could best defend themselves, making many Salles to the great Damage and Vexation of the King's Subjects. At length Conditions of Surrender are propos'd, but the King's Council was divided concerning them. Mortimer, an eminent Man, and much in Favour with the King, who was possess'd of many disseiz'd Barons Estates, opposes their Restoration to them, alledging, 'That it is a great piece of Injustice to have that taken from them again, which the King had for their Labour and Fidelity bestow'd on them, and was forfeited by them for their Treason and Rebellion, and therefore they would hold what they had. Glocester, and twelve more, who were empower'd to settle the Peace of the State, stood for a Restoration, and his Friends with him; but not obtaining his Design as he expected, he takes up new Displeasure, retreats from Court, refuses to come to the King's Feast on S. Edward's Day, and sends Messengers to warn the King, 'To remove Strangers from his Council, and observe the Provisions of Oxford, according to his last Promise made at Evesham; otherwise that he should not marvel, if he himself did what he pleased. Thus Victory could not settle Peace in these factious and discontented Times; wherefore it was thought fit to have recourse at last to a Parliament, the surest way to cure these Distempers, and accordingly one was call'd at Bury, whither all Persons who held Lands by Knights Service were summon'd to appear with sufficient Horse and Armour, to subdue those depriv'd Malecontents, who contrary to the Peace of the Kingdom held the Isle of Ely. From hence John de Warren Earl of Surry, and William de Valentia, are sent to persuade the Earl of Glocester (who had gotten an Army on the Borders of Wales) to come peaceably to the Parliament; which tho' he refused, yet he gave the Earls thus much under his Hand and Seal, 'That he would not ever take up Arms against the King, or his Son Edward, but defend himself, and pursue Roger Mortimer and his other Enemies, for which he pretended, that he took up Arms. After this, the Business of the Parliament went on, and the first Demand was made by the King and the Legate, 'That the Clergy should grant a Tenth for three Years to come, and for the Year past so much as they gave the Barons to defend the Ports against the landing of Strangers. To this they answer'd, 'That the War, which was begun upon ill Motives, and yet continu'd, made it more necessary to deliberate of settling the Peace of the Kingdom, than to set on foot such Demands, that this Parliament might prove for the Benefit of the Nation and not Damage, as the extorting Money from them would prove, since the Land had been so miserably harass'd by War, as that it would scarce ever recover it. 2. Then it was requir'd, That the Clergy should be tax'd by Lay-men, according to the true Value of their Revenues. They answer, 'Twas no reason, but unjust, that Lay-men should collect Tenths which they would never consent to, but would have the ancient Valuation to stand. 3. Then it was requir'd, That they should pay the Tenths of their Baronies and Temporalities, according to the utmost Value. They answer'd, That they were impoverish'd by their Attendance upon the King in his Wars, and that their Lands lay wast by reason of them. 4. Then it was requir'd, That the Clergy should in lieu of a Tenth, give amongst them thirty thousand Marks to discharge the King's Debts, contracted for Sicily, Calabria, and Apulia. They answer, They would give nothing, because those Expences were not converted to his own, or the Kingdom's Benefit. 5. All this being deny'd, demand is made, 'That all Clergy-men that held Baronies, or other Temporalities, should serve the King in his Wars. They answer, They were not to fight with the Material, but Spiritual Sword; That their Baronies were given them as Alms. 6. Then it was requir'd, That the whole Clergy should discharge the 9000 l.

* The Lord Mayor, and forty of the Principal Citizens, were thrown into Prison. The King gave the Estates of sixty of the most Eminent Citizens to his Favourites, and requir'd fifty thousand Marks Composition of the rest, which on their humble Submission and Petition he forgave.

* The Isle of Axholm in Lincolnshire, as some think.

* Simon Montfort was to have five hundred Marks a Year Pension, on which Consideration he agreed to leave the Kingdom; but afterwards he fell off from his Agreement, and join'd with the Privaters of the Cinque Ports.

* At this Feast Ottobon, the Pope's Nuncio, sat above the King.

A. D. 1267. Reg. 51. which the Bishops of Rocheſter and Bath, and Abbot of Weſtminſter, were bound for to the Pope's Merchants for the King's Service, when they were at Rome. They answer, They never conſented to any ſuch Loan, and therefore were not bound to diſcharge it. 7. Then the Legate from the Pope requir'd, 'That they ſhould thro' the whole Kingdom exhort Men to take the Croſs for the Holy War. To this they ſaid, 'That the Nation was almoſt conſum'd already by the Sword; and if they ſhould put Men upon this Action, the Nation would not be able to defend it ſelf, but be a Prey to Strangers. 8. Laſtly, It was urg'd, 'That the Clergy had ſworn to yield to all the King's Demands by their Oath at Coventry, where they ſwore to aſſiſt him in all they could. They answer, 'That when they took that Oath they meant no more than ſpiritual and whoſome Counſel. So the King met with Denials only in this Parliament, and obtain'd nothing of the Clergy.

The Barons who were depriv'd of their Eſtates held Ely againſt the King, who ſubſequent to ſubmit.

The Legate alſo ſent certain Perſons to the diſinherited Lords, which held the Iſle of Ely, to ſolicit them, 'To return to the Faith and Unity of the Church, their Duty and Allegiance to the King, according to the Proviſion made at Coventry, for redeeming their Eſtates from ſuch as held them by Gift from the King for ſeven Years Profits, and to leave off their Robberies. The Lords return'd this Answer to the Legate, 'That they retain'd the Faith, which they receiv'd from their Catholick Fathers, and paid Obedience to the Roman Church, as the Mother Church of all Chriſtians, but would not ſubmit to the Covetouſneſs and cruel Exactions of thoſe that govern'd the ſame: 'That they accounted themſelves unjuſtly diſinherited of their Lands, left them by their Predeceſſours, who had purchas'd it by Conqueſt: 'That they had formerly taken an Oath to defend the Kingdom and Holy Church, the Bishops thundring out Excommunications againſt ſuch as oppos'd them, and they were ready to venture their Lives to make good that Oath; and ſince they made War for the Safety of the Kingdom and Holy Church, they ought to live upon the Goods of thoſe Enemies who kept their Eſtates from them: That the Legate ought to ſee their Eſtates reſtor'd, that they might not be forc'd to prey upon others: That the Spoils they had taken were not ſo great as was reported, but that the Prince committed great Robberies, and laid them on their Party to make them odious; wherefore they deſir'd the Legate not to give Credit to ſuch Reports, becauſe if any among them had done ſuch things, they themſelves would have puniſh'd them for it. Farther, they declar'd to the Legate, That he had taken out of the Kingdom the Bishops of Wincheſter, London, and Chicheſter, Men of great Caution and deep Judgment, whereby the Council of the Kingdom was much weaken'd to the great Danger of it; wherefore they adviſed him to take Care of the Reformation of the ſame, and that they might be reſtor'd to their Lands without Redemption: That the Proviſions of Oxford might be obſerv'd: That they might have Hoſtages ſent to them into the Iſle to hold the ſame A. D. 1267. peaceably for five Years to come, until they could ſee how the King would perform his Promiſes. Thus did theſe Lords treat with the King, not as reduc'd to the loweſt Ebbs of Fortune, but as Men of Power to capitulate, being elevated either with the Opinion of their Cauſe, or Hope of their Party. But this Stubbornneſs of theirs ſo exasperated the King, that the next Year he gather'd a very great Army, beſet the Iſle: So that they were confin'd to it, and Prince Edward with Bridges made of Boats enter'd it in ſeveral Places, and compell'd them to yield. In the mean time the Earl of Gloceſter, with his Army which he had gather'd upon the Borders of Wales to aſſiſt them, came up to London and were receiv'd by the Citizens: But the Legate, who then reſided in the Tower, ſo prevail'd with him, that he ſurrender'd himſelf up to the King's Mercy, and by the Mediation of the King of the Romans and Lord Philip Baſſet, was reconcil'd upon Condition, that he ſhould forfeit twelve thouſand Marks if he ſhould raiſe any Commotions again. Having ſettled things thus at home, the King goes with his Army into Wales againſt Prince Lewellin, for aſſiſting Simon Monfort and the Earl of Gloceſter in their late Rebellions againſt him; but his Wrath being appeaſed by a Gift of 32000 l. Sterling, a Peace was concluded between them, and four Cantreds of his Country reſtor'd to him by the King, which had been taken away by the War. And here was an end of the firſt Barons Wars in England, wherein both ſides got nothing but Trouble and Vexation to themſelves; and whilſt the one ſtruggled to do more than they ſhould, and the other leſs than he ought, both Parts ſuffer'd heavily, according to the uſual Fate of ſuch National Conteſts and Differences.

The Prince forces the Barons in Ely to ſubmit.

Earl of Gloceſter ſubmits.

The next Year after this Pacification, the Legate Ottobon ſigns with the Croſſado both the King's Sons Edward and Edmund, the Earl of Gloceſter, with many other Noblemen, whom by his earneſt Solicitation he had induc'd to undertake the Holy War, with the King of France; who notwithstanding his former Miſfortune in this Action, would again adventure in it, either to recover his Honour, or merit another World. Prince Edward wanted Money to furniſh himſelf and Company out, and therefore borrow'd thirty thouſand Marks of the King of France, for which he mortgag'd Gascoigne to him, which might ſeem a piece of Policy rather than Piety in this King, to engage an active Prince in foreign Wars, to keep his own Dominions in quiet at home. And now, while this Preparation is in hand, King Henry is labouring to ſettle his Kingdom in perfect Peace, and reform thoſe Extravagancies the War had bred, cauſing by his Proclamation Stealth of Cattel to be made a Capital Crime; and the firſt that ſuffer'd for it was one of Dunſtable, who had ſtollen twelve Oxen from the Inhabitants of Colne, and being purſu'd to Redburn, was by the Bailiff of S. Albans (according to the King's Proclamation) condemn'd and beheaded. And the ſame Year the King aſſembled his Parliament at Marlborough, where the Statutes bearing that Title were enacted.

Prince Edward and others go to the Holy War.

Twenty third Parliament at Marlborough.

* He was admitted into the City by Order of the Nuntio, whom he had deceiv'd with his fair Pretence of Loyalty.
* The King alſo promiſ'd, 1. That he would do nothing without the Conſent of nine Counſellors, or two parts of them, choſen by the Nation. 2. That the Church ſhould be reform'd. 3. That all his Officers in his Court ſhould be Engliſhmen. 4. That all their Party ſhould be pardon'd. And 5. That the old Cuſtoms of the Realm ſhould be obſerv'd.
* Mat. of Weſt. writes, That he only gave ten thouſand Marks Security, that he would no more make War againſt the King.
* Riſhanger, the Continuator of Mat. Paris's Hiſtory, ſays, he only mortgag'd the Revenues of Bordeaux, and the Charter or Deed of Agreement between King Lewis and Prince Edward witneſſes, that the Money was to be rais'd out of the Cuſtoms of the City of Bordeaux.
* Colney, belonging to the Abby of S. Albans, Cony in Hertfordſhire.
* It appears by the Title of the Statutes of Marlbridge in Pulton's Edit. of Statutes, that the Parliament of Marlborough was holden in the fifty ſecond Year of this King's Reign, Anno 1268. tho' Mr. Daniel and Dr. Brady place it in the following Year.

A. D. 1271. Near two Years it was after the Prince had undertaken the Cross, before he set forth in that Expedition; a time long enough to have alter'd his Resolutions, if they could have been shaken, for going on with so hazardous an Enterprize; but so strong were his Desires, that no Worldly Respects could deter him from it, otherwise he had Discouragements more than enough to have done it. His Father Henry was aged, and broken with Labour and Troubles, so that the Kingdom, if not at present, yet shortly must need his Person to govern it. His Wife Eleanor, who resolv'd it seems to accompany him in all his Fortunes, was newly with Child. The King of France, who with two of his Sons, the King of Navarr, and a mighty Army, was gone before, and by the way besieged the City of Tunis in Africa, (then in the Possession of the Sarazens, who much infested Christendom) died of the Pestilence, that raged in his Army, and with him one of his Sons, and many of his Nobility; whereby their Design was utterly quash'd. Charles King of Sicily, Brother to the King of France, who came to assist him, lost the greatest part of his Navy in his return home. Yet such was the undaunted Courage of this Prince, that all these sad Examples of others Calamities, would not deter him from proceeding; but he set forward for the Holy Land. In his Passage many of his own People were desirous to return home; at which the Prince being angry, smote upon his Breast, and swore, That if all his Followers forsook him, he would yet enter Ptolemais, or Acon, tho' only with his Horse-keeper Fowin. By which Speech they were encouraged to go on with him. But his Cousin Henry, Son to the King of the Romans, obtains leave of him to depart, and was set on Shoar in Italy, where he found, what he sought to avoid, Death; being slain in the Church of Viterbo at Divine Service, by his own Cousin-German Guy de Monfort (Son to Simon late Earl of Leicester) in Revenge of his Father's Death. The News of this barbarous Murther hasten'd the Death of the King of the Romans, his Father, who died shortly after. Henry himself surviv'd not his Brother long, for he dy'd the next Year, in the 65th Year of his Age, and 56th of his Reign: A time so full of remarkable Contingents, partly through the Inconstancy of the Prince, and partly through the Pride and Impatience of a stubborn Nobility, that it takes up a tenth part of the History from the Norman Conquest.

He had by his Wife Eleanor six Sons, of which only two surviv'd him, Edward and Edmund; the rest, viz. Richard, John, William, and Henry, dy'd young; and two Daughters, which liv'd to be marry'd; Margaret the eldest was marry'd to Alexander III. King of Scots, and Beatrix to John I. entitled Duke of Britain.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Henry the Third.

IN the 5th Year of his Reign two Impostors were crucify'd for giving out, they were both of them the Messiah, or Christ; and two Women were executed, the one for pretending to be the Virgin Mary, and the other Mary Magdalen.

In the 6th Year there was a dreadful Tempest of Thunder, Lightning, and Rain, in February, which threw down several Churches, and rooted up Trees. This was follow'd by extraordinary Rains; and that by a Dearth, another violent Tempest, an Earthquake, a prodigious Storm of Wind, Inundations, and a Comet. Hol.

In his 17th Year, it Thunder'd for fifteen Days together. The next Year began with terrible Tempests of Thunder, Rain and Floods, which spoil'd the Fruits of the Earth.

In April, 1233. Matt. Paris affirms, There appear'd four false Suns in Worcestershire and Herefordshire. The true Sun was of a red Colour, with a great Circle of Chrystalline Colour, whose Circuit seem'd as large as the Kingdom of England; from its sides went forth certain half Circles, in whose Sections the four false Suns appear'd. The true one was in the East, it being about seven in the Morning, the Air clear, and the Sky serene. The Bishop of Hereford and Sir John Monmouth saw and witness'd to this Wonder. In June, near the Sea-side, two huge Dragons were seen fighting in the Air; after a long dispute, the one vanquish'd the other, and drove him into the Sea; and the Conqueror following him, they were both no more seen. The same Year there was a Dearth, which was preceded by an Earthquake. Hol.

In his 20th Year, according to Matt. Paris, the most credible Historian of those Times, Near Rock-Abby in the North two Troops of arm'd Men seem'd to rise out of the Earth, and to engage with Spear, Shield, Sword, and Banners display'd; they wou'd sometimes tilt as at a Turnament of Triumph, and the Country People beheld them at a little distance wounding and unhorsing one another. What was most strange was, the Grass of the Ground where they appear'd to give Battel seem'd trodden down, and Prints of Feet remain'd there. The same Sight was seen more apparently in Ireland. This Year was full of Prodigies, Thunder, Lightning, Floods, &c. which destroy'd abundance of People and Cattel.

* Prince Edward overtook the King of France at the Siege of Tunis, and with his Army soon brought the City to offer a Capitulation. Edward refus'd to hearken to it, as contrary to their Vow; the Kings of France and Sicily accepted it, and so it was surrender'd upon these Articles. 1. That all Christian Captives should be releas'd. 2. That the Christian Religion should be freely profess'd and preach'd in that City. 3. That the King of Tunis should pay their Charges: And, 4. Hold his Kingdom of the King of Sicily, as Tributary. But the Misfortunes that beset these two Kings soon after, were imputed to their Breach of Vow; and so much the more, because Prince Edward, who oppos'd them, escap'd any such Calamity.

Walter Hemingsford, p. 590. affirms, The Prince sail'd directly from Sicily to the Holy Land, taking Cyprus in his way. Most Authors agree, that he was not at the Siege of Tunis.

<sup>b</sup> Henry, before his Death, constituted the Earl of Glocester Ruler of the Kingdom in his Son's absence, if he return'd not before his Death, and swore all the Peers to accept and obey his Son Edward for their King, tho' he were at his Death out of the Kingdom.

<sup>g</sup> He had three Daughters by his Queen, Margaret, Beatrix, and Katherine, who was born in November, Anno 1253. and dy'd at five Years of Age.

On

On the 16th of June, 1239. the 23d of this King's Reign, Prince Edward his eldest Son was born. Before his Birth-day there appear'd a new Star in the Heavens for several Days together. It was carry'd with a swift Course through a long Circuit of Air; it seem'd sometimes to bear Fire along with it, and sometimes to leave Smoak behind it. In the next, there was a great Battel of Fish at Sea; the Consequence of which was, that eleven Whales were cast on the Shoar, and appear'd to be dead of some Wounds they had receiv'd. Matt. Paris tells this Story. Not long after, a great Sound was heard at one time in all parts of England, as if it had been the Noise of Mountains fall'n into the Sea.

In the 26th Year the Sun was Eclips'd in a terrible manner; and two Years afterwards so many Stars seem'd to fall in one Night, that (says Hollinshead) if there had so many fall'n indeed, there wou'd have been none left in the Sky.

In his 32d Year, a dreadful Earthquake happen'd on the 14th of February, and the Sea, for a long Tract near the Coast of England, ceas'd to ebb and flow near three Months together. The next Year the Town of New-Castle was destroy'd by Fire; and an Earthquake threw down several Steeples and Houses in Somersetshire.

On the 1st of October, in his 34th Year, the Moon appear'd red and bloated, which was the Pre-sage of a Storm of Wind, so violent, that the Sea flow'd twice without ebbing, and in the Night seem'd to burn: Soon after an Earthquake was felt at St. Albans. In the following Year, the Chimney of the Chamber where the Queen and her Children were was blown down by a terrible Storm, and her whole Appartment (at Windfor) shaken and torn; Oaks in the Park were rent asunder, and turn'd up by the Roots; and all was accompany'd with such Thunders and Lightnings, as had not been heard or seen in the Memory of Man.

In May, the New Moon appear'd three Days before her time; and the Sun, Moon and Stars, for fifteen Days successively, seem'd of a red Colour. A Dearth, and a Murrain among Cattel follow'd this Prodigy. In his 38th Year, the New Moon in February was seen four Days before the Course of her Time. In his 39th Year, a Ship was seen in the Air at St. Albans; and in his 40th, a Comet.

In his 52d Year, the two Companies of Goldsmiths and Taylors of London fought, and several were kill'd on both sides. The Sheriffs appeas'd the Tumult, and thirteen of the most Mutinous of them were hang'd. As were thirty Citizens of Norwich in the last Year of his Reign, for quarrelling and fighting with the Monks of that City.

Hollinshead has many more Miracles, Prodigies, and extraordinary Sights, in his History of King Henry the Third: But we have reported enough to let the Reader see, that the Seasons were as much distracted as the Times, and that Nature seem'd to be disturb'd in all her Productions during the Reign of this weak Prince; who had, however, many brave Subjects, and govern'd a People that shew'd they might have been Great and Happy, had their Prince known how to have made them so.

Men Famous in his Days for their Valour and Wisdom were

Simon Earl of Leicester, and his Sons Simon and Guy Montfort, Gilbert de Clare, the Earls of Chester and Glocester, Roger Mortimer, great Warriors; Hubert de Burgh, and Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, Masters in Politicks.

In Learning the most Eminent were

Robert Curson, made a Cardinal for his Knowledge of Divine and Humane Letters, Gervaise de Melkelie, Albricius of London, Hugh Kirkstead, Richard of Ely, Peter Hexham, John Giles, an excellent Physician; Caducan, a Welshman, Bishop of Bangor; Alexander, Author of several Treatises in Divinity, Philosophy, and Humanity, both in Prose and Verse; William Lantbony, Peter of St. Saviour, a Canon of Trinity-House near London; Alexander Hales, an excellent Divine, Thomas Aquinas's and St. Bonaventure's Master; Ralph Abbot of Coggeshal in Essex; Alexander Essebiensis, who wrote an Epitome of our Englisb Annals; Matthew Paris, a Monk of St. Albans, whom the Bishop of Carlisle calls One of the most renown'd Historians of this Kingdom; his History comes down to the Year 1259. in which he dy'd; Alexander Neckam, Robert Bacon, John Shiffbed, and Robert of Glocester, who wrote a Rhiming Chronicle; Ralph Earl of Chester, and Henry Bracton, both learned in the Laws of England; Roger Bacon the Astronomer, thought to be a Conjuror by the vulgar sort of People; Richard surnam'd Medicus, an excellent Physician; Alexander Wendock Bishop of Chester, Edmund Rich, Robert Rich, John Blund, Richard surnam'd Theologus, Walter of Elbam, Ralph Fresburne, Laurence Somercot, Cardinal Somercot his Brother, Dr. Nicholas Fernbant a Physician, Simon Langton Brother to Archbishop Langton, Richard Fisaker, Simon Stokes, John of Kent, William Shirwood, Michael Blaunpain, John Goddard, Vincent of Coventry, Aubery de Vere a learned Baron, Richard Wick, John of Basingstoke, Roger Waltham, William Sepingbam, and Robert Grostest Bishop of Lincoln, who had a long Dispute with Pope Innocent IV. Johannes a Sacro Bosco, who wrote of the Sphere, and is made an Englisbman by Leland and Bale, but Sir James Ware puts him among the Irish Writers.

Edward
proclaim'd King, tho' in the Holy Land.

Immediately after the Death of King Henry, Edward his Son was proclaim'd King by the Order of all the Chief Bishops and Peers of the Kingdom, who for that purpose met in the New Temple, and there all swore their Fidelity to him; tho' at that time they knew not whether he were alive or dead. But till they were certified of the Truth of either, they proceeded to settle and secure the Government, caused a new Seal to be made, and appointed fit Ministers and Officers for the Management of his Treasure, and Preservation of the Peace, while he remain'd in Palestine, where he rais'd the Siege of Acon, which was ready to yield to the Sarazens, and did many other extraordinary Acts of Valour against the Infidels [he was dangerously wounded in three Places of his Body with a poison'd Knife by a treacherous Assassin, of which Wounds, when no Medicine could cure him, his loving Wife Queen Eleanor extracting the Poison by sucking them, perfectly healed them.] When he had continu'd three Years in the Holy Lands, and underwent many Dangers without any great Effect, saving that he had well maned and fortified Acon; being disappointed of Aids which he expected, he resolv'd upon his return home, and first sailing to Sicily, he was splendidly feasted and entertain'd by Charles the King of that Island. From thence he sail'd to Italy, where in his Passage by Land through that Country he receiv'd all imaginable Expressions of Honour and Respect from the Pope and other Princes of that Nation. At his Entrance into Savoy, at the Foot of the Alps, he was met by many of the Nobility of England, and there challeng'd by the Earl of Chablonn, (a valiant Warrior) to a Tournament; in which, tho' it may seem beneath his Dignity so lightly to hazard his Person, yet the Greatness of his Valour would not suffer him to refuse the Combat, tho' with a Person much beneath him; and thereupon engaging with him, so overmatch'd him both in Skill and Strength, that the Earl was forc'd to yield to him. From hence he came down into France, where he was magnificently receiv'd, and entertain'd by King Philip III. surnam'd The Hardy; to whom he did Homage for all his Territories he held of that Crown*. Leaving France he went into Acquitain, where he spent some time in ordering his Affairs, and then after six Years absence returns into England and receives the Crown, three Years after he was first proclaim'd King, from the hands of Robert Kilwarby, Archbishop of Canterbury, Sept. 1275. and with him his Royal Consort Queen Eleanor, there being present at this Solemnity his Mother Queen Eleanor, Alexander King of Scots, and John Duke of Britain, who had marry'd his two Sisters.

His Personal Skill in Arms, and Courage.

Crown'd.

The many Brave and Princelike Actions which this Prince had signaliz'd himself to the World by, before his Accession to the Crown, viz. His Victory over the Barons at Evesham, and his Prosecution of the disinherited Barons in the Isle of Ely; his great Readiness to expose his Person to all Hazards and Labours; his single Fight with Sir Adam Gurdon, the Outlaw, at Farnham; his Expedition into the East, and his great Experience he had of all Civil Affairs by his Age (being about thirty five Years old before he came to the Crown) gave the Kingdom Hopes of a well-manag'd Government, and flourishing State under so compleat a Master, whose Desert and Reputation were equally unparallel'd. Soon after his Coronation he call'd a Parliament at Westminster, where he made Tryal of his Peoples Patience and Affections towards him, and had a fifteenth of all the Goods both of the Clergy and Laity granted him without any repining; tho' the Clergy had not long before given a Tenth for two Years to his Brother Edmund, for the carrying on of the Holy War. But the Liberality of the Clergy could not divert him from the Design which he had fram'd to himself, of abating the Ecclesiastical Power, which by long and woful

† As he was about this he heard of his Father's Death, which caus'd him to hasten his Return the more.

¶ This Knight being a Person of great Strength of Body and very courageous, was in the Rebellion of the Barons, for which his Estate was seiz'd; and not daring to come in, he liv'd by Theft and Robberies upon the Road, having Associates of like desperate Fortunes. He was outlaw'd, but no Man durst attempt to take him. His Mischiefs were chiefly done to the King's greatest Friends, which incens'd the Prince the more against him, and induc'd him to make an Experiment of his Strength and Courage by a single Combat; in which the Prince so overmatch'd him, that he yielded to him, but got his Pardon and Estate from the Prince's Favour.

Experience

A. D. 1278. Experience of former times, he saw, had been very prejudicial to the Regal Authority, especially when it combined with the Nobility; and therefore, while he was high in the Opinion of his People, he set upon that difficult Work to abate their Privileges. And to that end, in the sixth Year of his Reign, he depriv'd many famous Monasteries of the Nation of their Liberties, and took from the Abbot and Covent of Westminster the Return of Writs granted them by the Charter of King Henry III. his Father. In the Year following he got the Statute of Mortmain to be enacted, to hinder the increase of their Temporal Possessions (which made them so powerful) as being prejudicial to the Kingdom, and Military Affairs. In the second Statute of Westminster he confined the Jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Judges to narrower Limits. Nor did he end here, but lying heavier upon them, he required one half of all their Goods, both Temporal and Spiritual, for one Year; at which, though they were very much disturb'd, yet they were forc'd to yield to his Demand; because, their Discontent being discover'd, one Sir John Haivering stood up among them in their Assembly, in the Monks Hall at Westminster, and said, 'Reverend Fathers, if any of you dares to contradict the King's Demand in this business, let him stand forth into the midst of the Assembly, that his Person may be known, and taken notice of, as a Breaker of the Peace of the Kingdom. At which Speech they all sat silent, and dare not oppose it, as they often did in his Father's Reign.

The Statute of Mortmain enacted.

King Edward subdues Wales.

And now this active Prince being settled in Peace both at home and abroad, could not lie idle; but to satisfy his own Desires of enlarging his Power, as well as to keep his Subjects in Action, whose Ease would corrupt, as he very well knew, resolves upon an Undertaking of Importance to his future Security and Government. Wales, tho' a small Principality, had always been a troublesome Neighbour to the greater part of England and the Kings of it, a Receptacle for all Rebels against the English Kings, and ever ready to combine with Scotland to disturb their Peace and Government, seldom or never having her Borders free from Blood and Mischief; which Edward considering, thought he could never have a better opportunity of curbing them than now. Occasions are easily taken where there is a Design to quarrel. But the Welsh, who were always struggling for their Liberty, seldom fail'd to give some just ones; as there happen'd one at this time. Leoline, a Prince of that Province, who had been a chief Promoter of the Civil Wars of England, (tho' he dearly paid for it at last) was summon'd to the King's Coronation, and afterward to his first Parliament, there to do his Homage and Fealty to him, as holding his Principality of the English Crown, but he refused to come to them both; alledging, 'That he well remember'd how his Father Griffin had broken his Neck in the Tower of London, and therefore he could not endure to appear in that place, but in any other, if he had Hostages given for the Security of his Person; or if the King would send Commissioners to him, he was ready to pay his Homage, as the King desired. The King did not seem to resent this arrogant Answer, very unbecoming an Homager, but resolv'd with himself to seize upon his Country; and to this end the next Year after enters it with a powerful Army, A. D. 1279. laying all waste before him with Fire and Sword, in so fierce a manner, as Leoline, being unable to resist the impetuous Current, sued for Peace, and obtained it; but upon such Conditions, as made the Tenure of his Principality little better than that of a Subject; for he was fined fifty thousand Pound Sterling, and to pay a thousand Pound per Annum Tribute for what he held, which was but for his Life. But yet the King, to gratify him in something which might oblige him more firmly to him, deliver'd to him Eleanor, the Daughter of Simon Monfort, late Earl of Leicester, who being in her Passage with her Brother Almerick from France into Wales, to become Leoline's Wife, was taken by some Bristol-Ships, and deliver'd Captive to the King, who gave her to Leoline, as the greatest tie of Subjection to him. But all would not do, the desire of Liberty, and some little Wrongs received by ill Administration of Justice upon the Marches, broke the Agreement within three Years, and Leoline in Arms surprizes the Castles of Flint and Rutland, with the Person of the Lord Clifford, who was sent a Judge into those parts, and committed many other Acts of Hostility. His Brother David, whom the King had knighted, and marry'd to the Daughter of the Earl of Darby, a rich Widow, and given him the Castle of Denbigh, with a thousand Pound per Annum, great Favours from so Puissant a King, nevertheless joyned with him to deliver his Country, and recover his Liberty. Edward having notice of this Revolt, being then at the Devises in Wiltshire, prepared a great Army to repress them. But before his setting out upon this Expedition, he went privately to visit his Mother Queen Eleanor, living in the Nunnery of Ambresbury in the same County. While he was discoursing with her, there came into the Chamber, where they were, one who feigned himself to have been Blind, and received his Sight at the Tomb of Henry the Third her Husband; when the King saw him, he knew him a notorious Lyar, and therefore desired his Mother not to believe him. His Mother overjoy'd to hear of the Miracle, which tended so much to the Honour of her Husband, fell into a furious Passion, and bid the King be gone out of her Chamber. The King obey'd, and going forth, meets a Clergyman, to whom he tells the Story of the Impostor, and merrily said, He knew his Father to be so just, that he would rather pull out the Eyes of such a Wretch when he could see, than restore him to Sight if he were blind. In the mean time, while these things were doing, John Peckham Archbishop of Canterbury, to whom the Welsh had before sent a List of the Causes of their Revolt, went of his own accord into Wales, to persuade Leoline to a Submission, that he might avoid the Ruine he foresaw would come upon him. But he could not prevail with him, because he had the better of the English in some little Skirmishes, and the People being encouraged by a Prophecy of Merlin's, which foretold, That he should be shortly crown'd with the Diadem of Brutus, so instigated this unhappy Prince, that he would not listen to Peace. Whereupon the Archbishop excommunicated him and his Adherents, and the King entred his Country with a mighty Army: Which, tho' indeed Leoline valiantly opposed, and slew many of great Note in * Mr. Daniell does not speak so much in favour of the Welsh as he might have done. They had other more substantial Reasons for the War, and Leoline and his Brother gave the Archbishop above a dozen Articles of Grievances, most of them very weighty, which provok'd them to take Arms; and King Edward refus'd to treat with them. Dr. Powell's Chron.

A. D. 1283. it, yet was himself slain in the Battel by a common Soldier<sup>a</sup>; and his Head being cut off, was presented to King Edward, who (as if his Death were not sufficient without Reproach) caused it to be crown'd with Ivy, and set upon the Tower of London. And thus died the last Prince of Wales, who was betray'd (as they write) by the Men of Bueltb. Shortly after David his Brother was taken in Wales, and sentenced in England to an ignominious Death, which was this: He was first drawn at an Horse's Tail about the City of Shrewsbury, and then beheaded, his Body quarter'd, and his Heart and Bowels burnt. His Head was sent to be set on the Tower with his Brother's, and his four Quarters to these four Cities, viz. Bristol, Northampton, York, and Winchester. An Execution never before shewed in this Kingdom upon the Son of a Prince, or any other Nobleman, that we read of in any of our Histories. But by this Example it after grew usual in the Nation: Even this King (under whom it began) had the Fate of such a miserable Death entail'd upon his Family, several of his own Brother's Posterity dying on the Scaffold. And just upon this Conquest, his eldest Son Alphonfus, then a Youth of twelve Years old (and a Prince of great hopes) dy'd; and Edward, lately<sup>b</sup> born at Carnarven, is his Heir to the Kingdom, and the first of the English who was entitled 'Prince of Wales; as if it had been an Omen of that Destruction which, as we shall after see, befel him in his Regal Dignity. Thus was Wales (the little Portion of the Isle of Great Britain, which those Natives could reserve to themselves from their first Conquerors the Saxons) united to the Crown of England in the eleventh Year of this King's Reign, Anno Dom. 1283. A thing not to be wonder'd at, that they were at last wholly subdu'd, seeing 'twas next to a Miracle how they held out so long against so powerful a Kingdom, without any foreign Aids and Assistance. Whether the Ground of the Conquest was just, is not for us to examine. It was certainly of great<sup>c</sup> Benefit to the Nation; for the miserable Conteſts and bloody Mischief, which often happen'd to both Nations, were hereby extinguish'd; and they became one People, govern'd by one Law, and under one Prince; as may be seen by the Statute of Rutland, Anno Reg. 12.

King Edward does Homage to Philip the Fair, King of France.

This Work being effected and settled, King Edward having heard of the Death of the King of France, Philip the Hardy, and the Succession of Philip IV. (called the Fair) went over into France to renew and confirm such Conditions as were to be perform'd for the preservation of his Dominions beyond Sea under the new King, and did him Homage for Aquitain, having before quitted his Claim to Normandy for ever. When he had finished his own Business, he accommodated the Differences between the Kings of Sicily and Arragon in Spain, (to whom he was Allied) redeemed Charles, entitled Prince of Achaia, (the Son of Charles King of Sicily) from his Imprisonment in Arragon, paying thirty thousand Pounds for his Ransom. After his being three Years and an half abroad, he returned into England, with his Coffers empty'd by this Voyage, which he must have supply'd again. And for it an opportune Occasion is offer'd. For at his return he meets with many Complaints concerning the ill Administration of Justice in his absence, which he could not but listen to, and punish the chief Ministers for, if they were found guilty. The Parliament met at that time, and the Necessity of reforming so great a Mischief in the Kingdom being propounded, the Judges were had all into Examination, and upon a plain proof of their Extortions, they were fined to pay these following Sums. First, Sir Ralph Hengham, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, seven thousand Marks; Sir John Loveton, Justice of the Common-Pleas, three thousand Marks; Sir William Brompton, Justice, six thousand Marks<sup>e</sup>; Sir Solomon Rochester four thousand Marks, Sir Richard Boyland four thousand, Sir Thomas Sodington two thousand, Sir Walter Hopton two thousand; which four last were Judges Itinerant; Sir William Sabam three thousand Marks; Robert Litbury, Master of the Rolls, one thousand; Roger Leicester, one thousand; Roger Bray, Escheater and Judge for the Jews, one thousand: But Sir Adam Stratton<sup>f</sup>, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, was fined thirty four thousand Marks; and Thomas Wayland<sup>g</sup>, who was found the greatest Delinquent, and of the greatest Substance, had all his Goods and whole Estate confiscated to the King; which, were it but equal to Sir Adam Stratton's Fine, all the Fines together make a hundred thousand Marks, to enrich the King's Treasury; which, according to the Rate of Money now, is above three hundred thousand Marks; a mighty Treasure to be gotten out of the Hands of so few Men, if it were not probable, that the fewness of Lawyers in those Days made their Practice in those less litigious Times more advantageous. Of no less Grievance did this King ease the Nation by the Banishment of the<sup>h</sup> Jews, for which the Parliament willingly granted him a Fifteenth. The Nation indeed had before offer'd him, in the ninth Year of his Reign, a fifth part of all their Goods to have them expell'd; but then the Jews gave more, and so staid till this time; which brought him a greater benefit by confiscating all their Estates, with their Tallies and Obligations, which

<sup>c</sup> The Welsh lov'd this Prince, partly for the Honour he deriv'd from them, and partly for his Nativty among them, so entirely, that in his greatest Misfortunes through his Reign they ever continu'd firm to him; and after his Death bewail'd him in lamentable Songs.

<sup>d</sup> How great a Benefit the Conquest of this little Kingdom of Wales was thought then to England, may be seen by King Edward's own Words in the Preamble to his Law, call'd Statutum Wallia, where he thus speaks, 'The Divine Providence, which disposeth all things rightly, among other Dispensations of his Mercy, by which he hath vouchsafed to adorn us and our Kingdom of England, hath now by his Mercy subjected the Kingdom of Wales, with the Inhabitants thereof, wholly and fully, without any Lett and Hindrance, to our Property and Dominion, having annex'd and united the same to the Crown of our said Realm, as one Member of the self-same Body.'

<sup>f</sup> In the Chronicle of Dunstable, a Manuscript in the Cott. Libr. he is call'd Adam de Stratten, a certain Clerk of the Court.

<sup>g</sup> Sir Thomas Wayland, Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, was also banish'd for ever out of the Kingdom. After this just Punishment of such corrupt Judges, the King caus'd, that all the Judges at their entering upon their Office should swear, That they would take no Gift of any Man, unless it were a Breakfast, or some such small Present.

<sup>h</sup> The Jews came in with the Conqueror, and were sett'd in certain Streets by themselves in London, of which Old-Jury was the chief. They had a Judge appointed over them, to decide all Controversies between themselves, or with the Christians; and had an High-Priest (who was confirm'd in his Office by the King) and Synagogues allow'd them. They were always hated by the People for their Extortions and Usury, and rather tolerated than lov'd by the Kings, because they now and then fleec'd them. But now they were grown intolerable to the Nation, by their Witchcraft, Poisoning, Clipping of Money, Counterfeiting of Hands and Seals, Crucifying of Children privately, and cruel Usury: So that nothing would satisfy the People, but the utter extirpation of them out of the Kingdom; to which Edward did not very unwillingly yield, because they were allow'd to carry nothing away with them, but some small matter to bear their Charges, and so left him a vast Treasure. They went most of them into Italy and Germany.

A. D. 1290. Reg. 17. amounted to an infinite Treasure; which, tho' it was the last advantage the Crown could hope for from them, yet he gained a more valuable Treasure by it, viz. the Good-will of his People, who as they had granted him many Supplies, were obliged by such Provisions always to aid him with their Estates. He came to an empty Treasury at first, and having great occasion for Money, he was driven to all the Shifts possible to fill it. For besides what he had given him by the Parliament and Pope in the first three Years of his Reign before mentioned, in the seventh Year of his Reign the Old Money was called in, and New coined, because it had been much defaced by the Jews, two hundred ninety seven Persons being executed at London at one time for this Crime; and this also brought in great benefit to the King. In his eighth Year he had a design to examine every Man's Title to his Land by a Quo-Warranto; but it was so fiercely opposed by the Earl Warren, who drew out his Sword upon the Writ, saying, That he held his Land by his Sword, and by it he would make his Tenure good. Whereupon the King desisted from that Attempt, and obtained a fifteenth of the Clergy. In the 11th Year he had a thirtieth of the Laity, and a twentieth of the Clergy, for the War against the Welsh; and in the 13th Escuage of forty Shillings every Knight's Fee for the same purpose. In the 14th Year he had a thousand Marks of certain Merchants, who were fined for false Weights. In his 17th he had the Fines of the Judges before mentioned; and in his 18th Year, this Confiscation of the Jews Estates, and a fifteenth of the Englsh. After this, in the 19th Year of his Reign, upon a pretence of a Voyage to the Holy Land, the Clergy granted him an eleventh part of all their Moveables. And shortly after the Pope procured him a tenth for six Years, to be gather'd in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and laid up in Monasteries, till he was entred into Mare Maggior, or the Euxine-Sea. But he made the Collectors pay him the Money gather'd for three Years, without going so far, having occasion to use it at home about the purchase of a new Kingdom.

The Occasion of Edward's Wars with Scotland. For the Crown of Scotland, upon the Death of King Alexander, who dy'd without Heirs, was in Controversie. Six Competitors pretended a Title to it, who were all descended from David Earl of Huntington, the younger Brother of William King of Scots, who was Grandfather to the late King Alexander. Edward pretending a Right of Superiority from his Ancestors over that Kingdom, undertakes to decide the Quarrel; and the Scots, who govern'd the Nation in the Interregnum, to avoid farther Inconveniences, were forced to make him Arbitrator, and the six Competitors to stand to his Award. John Baliol Lord of Galloway, and

Robert Bruce*, both descended of David, Brother of King William, the one of the second, the other of the eldest Daughter, had the plainest and most undisputable Claim. The Controversie was long, and tho' debated by the most Learned in the Law of both Kingdoms, and the Civilians of France, yet, after six Years, remain'd undecided. King Edward therefore, to put an end to this business, but with some advantage to himself, took a Journey into the North with his Queen; but in the Way he lost his greatest Worldly Felicity, Queen Eleanor, who dy'd Novem. 29. at Hardeby in Lincolnshire. This Accident not only caus'd excessive Grief to him, but brought him back again to inter her Body at Westminster; and all along the Road, in the places where it rested, viz. at Stamford, Waltham, Westcheap, Charing, &c. he erected goodly Crosses, engraven with her Image, in Testimony of his great Affection to her, and as Memorials of her Fidelity and Virtues; in which the excell'd all Womankind, as much as she did in Dignity. Her Funeral Solemnities being performed, the King return'd back to his Scottish Business; and that he might settle it to his own Honour and Advantage, he first treats privately with Robert Bruce (who had the weaker Title, but most Friends) and promises, That if he would pay a Fealty and Homage to the Crown of England, he would make him King of Scotland. But Bruce answer'd him, That he was not so desirous of Rule, as to destroy the Liberties of his Country for it. Then he makes the like offer to Baliol, who having indeed the best Title, but least Love and Interest with the People, and being more greedy of a Kingdom than true Honour, yields to it, is crown'd King at Scone, receives Fealty of the chief Nobility, except Bruce, comes to New-Castle upon Tyne, where King Edward then lay, and there, with many of his Nobles, swears Fealty and did Homage to him, as his Sovereign Lord: Which Act, tho' he did it to secure him, was his undoing. For being very little belov'd before, he now became less; and such as stood for Bruce, and other Noblemen, (who were desirous to preserve the Liberties of their Country) were much incensed against him, not only for this Act; but for his Injustice done in the Case of the Earl of Fife, who having been one of the six Governours in the Anarchy, was after slain by the Family of Aberneth*. The Earl's Brother prosecuted the Murderers by Law, and brought the Cause before the King, Baliol, in his Parliament; but not obtaining Justice, the King deciding it for the Aberneths, the wronged Gentleman appeals to the Court of England. King Baliol upon this is summon'd to answer, and appears, sitting with King Edward in his Parliament till his Cause was to be try'd; and then is cited by an Officer to arise, and Queen Eleanor dy'd. 1291.

The King of Scots does Homage to King Edward. 1294.

* The other four were Erick King of Norway, Florence Earl of Holland, John Hastings Lord of Abergavenny, and John Earl of Badenau; there were six Competitors more, Patrick Dunbar Earl of Marche, William de Vesey, William de Ros, Robert de Pinkny, Nicholas de Soules, Roger de Mandeville.

* The Queen did not die in this Journey, but the last Year, when King Edward was going into Scotland, to put his Daughter-in-Law, Wife to Prince Edward, and Daughter to Eric King of Norway, in Possession of the Kingdom of Scotland, that Princess having the best Title to the Crown. She dy'd also before the King reach'd the Borders. And this Year he was call'd back by the Death of Queen Eleanor his Mother.

* This Story is so far from being true, that when the Dispute about the Succession to the Crown of Scotland was first left to King Edward to be decided, all the Competitors were oblig'd to own the King's Superiority over that Kingdom, and Robert Bruce was the first of them that did it, in these words: I do acknowledge the King of England superiour and direct Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, and will before and from him, as my superiour and direct Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, answer and receive Justice. Rot. de Superiouritate Regis Anglia in Scotia; 18 Ed. 1. — In the Tower.

* On the 26th of December, 1273. He did Homage in these words, My Lord, Edward, King of England, superiour Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland: I, John, King of Scotland, become your Liege-Man for the whole Kingdom of Scotland, with its Appurtenances; which Kingdom I claim and hold, and ought of right to hold, for Me and my Heirs, Kings of Scotland, Hereditarily of You and your Heirs, Kings of England, and shall bear Faith to You and your Heirs, Kings of England, of Life and Limb, and terrene Honour, against all Men.

* It appears by the Rolls in the Tower, De Sup. Reg. Ang. in Scot. and Riley's Placita Parliamentaria, that Macduff Earl of Fife, brought a Complaint or Appeal, for certain Lands, against King John; and the Process of this Suit being before King Edward, as superiour Lord of Scotland, occasion'd the Scots League with France in the course of this Affair, and all the Wars that follow'd between the two Kingdoms.

A. D. 1294. stand at the place appointed for Pleading. Baliol unwilling to do it, pleads, That he might answer Reg. 21. by a Procurator, but was deny'd; whereupon he rises himself, descends, and pleads his Cause: But taking it for an Indignity, offer'd him by the King of England, he returns home with an Heart full of Discontent, and meditating Revenge, renews the ancient League with France, and confirms it with the Marriage of his Son Edward to a Daughter of Charles, King Philip's Brother, who was glad to embrace a Quarrel with the King of England, with whom he was offend- ed; and when he had thus done, he bids Defiance to King Edward, and renounces his Allegiance, as unlawfully promised, being not in his Power without the Consent of the State to do any such Act. And now began the Contest between these two Nations, which spilt more Christian Blood, did more Mischief, and continu'd longer than any Wars (that we read of) between any two People of the World; for all the Kings who succeeded for three hundred Years together, even to the Blessed Union of them by King James I. had their Share more or less in this Quarrel. And though England, being much the greater and stronger Nation, had the good Fortune often to overcome; yet it was with so great Expence of Blood, Time, and Treasure, that what she got cost more than 'twas worth, and was so soon lost again, the Scots being never so fully subdu'd, but that they were soon for recovering their Liberties again, and that with Success: So that Providence may seem to decree no Union firm between these two Nations, that was made by Force, but by the milder way of Peace and Succellion.

Edward, who had long before formed to him- self a Design of obtaining the Kingdom of Scot- land by the fairest means he could, and for that end sought to match his Son Edward to Margaret the King of Norway's Daughter, Heir to the last King Alexander, but by her Death was disap- pointed, resolves to do it by Force, upon this Defection of King Baliol. And because he was sensible that he had no contemptible Enemy to deal with, upon the account of his League with the King of France, he counter-leagues with all the Neighbouring Princes that he could either by Gifts or Alliance draw in to strengthen his Party; as first with Guy Earl of Flanders, with whose Daughter he designs to match his Son Edward: Then with Adolphus of Nassau the Emperour, to whom he gave * 15000 l. Sterling to recover certain Territories of France, which he claimed as belonging to the Empire. He had likewise marry'd one of his Daughters to the Duke of Barr, who pretended a Title to Champagne, and another to John Duke of Brabant; all which Princes, with many other, who border'd on France, he sets upon that King. On the other side, the King of France summon'd King Edward, as owing Homage to his Crown, to appear and answer in his Court for certain Spoils committed on the Coasts of Normandy by the English; which he refusing to do, or making any Satisfaction for the Wrongs done, was by an Arrest condemn'd to lose all his Territories in France, and an Army was presently sent under the Command of Charles de Valois, and Arnold de Neal Constable of France, to seize upon them, who took Bourdeaux and many other important

Places, and fortified them. The King of England A. D. hearing this, sends over his Brother Edmund Earl 1296. of Lancaster, the Earls of Lincoln and Richmond, Reg. 22. with twenty eight Banners, seven hundred Men at Arms, and a Navy of three hundred and sixty Sail to recover his Right in France. And in the mean time himself sets upon Baliol (refusing up- on Summons to appear at his Court at Newcastle, and standing upon his Guard) and enters Scotland with an Army big enough to conquer a greater Nation, consisting of four thousand Horse and thirty thousand Foot, besides what the Bishop of Durham brought to his Assistance, which were five hundred Horse and a thousand Foot, intend- ing to make a speedy Conquest of Scotland, that he might afterward pass over into France to assist his Confederates, and be reveng'd on the King of France. He first took Berwicke with the Slaugh- Scotland ter of fifteen thousand Scots, or more<sup>b</sup>, and after seiz'd upon the Castles of Dunbar, Roxborough, Edenborough, Sterling, and S. John's Town, which were either won by Force, or yielded to him. This furious Current of Success brought Baliol to sue for Peace, and submit himself by taking his Oath of Fealty to King Edward, as his Sovereign Lord<sup>c</sup>; and then he call'd a Parliament for Scot- land, which was held at Berwicke, wherein the Nobility did their Homage also to him, confirm- ing the same by a Charter under their Hands and Seals, except William Douglass, who chose rather to endure the Miseries of a Prison, than yield to the Subjection of England. But King Baliol (notwithstanding his Subjection) was sent Prisoner into England, after he had enjoy'd that Dignity four Years; for he had so little Power, that he could hardly be said to reign; and King Edward returned into England again, leaving John Warren, Earl of Surrey and Sussex, Warden of all Scotland; Hugh Cressingham Treasurer, and William Ormesby Chief Justice, giving them a Commission to take the Homages and Fealties of all that held Lands of the Crown in his Name: So that the Conquest of Scotland seem'd almost effected, but was not, as we shall see by the many Wars to maintain it<sup>d</sup>. But these happen'd King Ed- not presently, the King therefore turns his whole ward goes against the Designs against France, and for that end calls a Parliament at S. Edmunds Bury; wherein the Ci- King of tizens and Burgeses of several great Towns of France. 1298. England, granted him the eighth part of their Goods, and others of the People the twelfth. This Strain of State, which was never before used, nor could be foreseen, so amaz'd the Clergy, that the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of Durham, Ely, Salisbury, and Lincoln, yielded to pay a fifth part of all their Goods towards the Maintenance of the King's Wars; and so the King's Wrath was appeased, and they were receiv'd into Favour. But the Archbishop of Canterbury, Robert Winchelsea, who animated all the rest to stand out, had all his Goods seiz'd on, and all the Monasteries within his Diocese, and part of Lincoln, taken into the King's hand, and Officers appointed to collect their Revenues and Rents for the King, allowing them only so much out of them as was necessary for their Sustenance: But at length, the Abbots and Monks, with all Priests, giving the King a fourth part of their Goods, redeem'd themselves and the King's Favour. Thus will Warlike Princes force Supplies from their Subjects in their Necessities, tho' they are very unwilling, and it be burthensome to them*.

A Parliament at Salisbury, in which he is denied by the Nobility to go into France.

During this Contest and Agreement with the Clergy, the King called a Parliament of his Nobility at Salisbury, to which no Churchmen were admitted; and in it he requires some of his great Lords to go over with him into his Wars in Gascony, where he wanted a present Supply of Commanders, because of the Death of his Brother Edmund; who having spent much Time and Money upon the Siege of Bourdeaux in vain, retir'd to Bayon, then in the Possession of the English, and there died: But they all singly made Excuses for themselves; which so anger'd the King, that he told them, 'They should go, or he would give their Lands to them that should. Upon this Threat, Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, High Constable, and Roger Bygod Earl of Norfolk, Marshal of England, declared, 'That if he would go in Person, they would attend him, otherwise not. Which Answer offended the King more, who urged it again; and the Earl Marshal protested, 'That he would willingly go thither with the King, and march before him in the Vanguard, as by Right of Inheritance he ought to do: But the King told him plainly, 'He should go with any other, although he went not himself in Person. But the Earl said, 'I am not so bound, neither will I take that Journey without you. Then the King swore, 'By God, Sir Earl, you shall go or hang. But the Earl reply'd, 'I swear by the same Oath, I will neither go nor hang, and so departed without Leave. This Heat stirr'd up a Revolt, for the two Earls immediately gather'd together many Noblemen, and others their Friends to the Number of thirty Banners: So that they were fifteen hundred armed Men, well accoutred, and stood upon their Guard against him. But he, like a prudent Prince, who knew his times for Business, lets the Matter fall; because both his Business in France, and pressing Necessity of his aiding the Confederates (on which his Honour, and all his Dominions abroad depended) called him over into Flanders, which the King of France had invaded, pretending the same Title to that Province as King Edward did to Scotland. The Occasion was this: The King of France having had Intelligence of the Designs of Guy Earl of Flanders, and the Alliance that he intended with the King of England, sends for him (as if he knew nothing of it) to come with his Wife and Daughter, and make merry with him at Paris: But instead of Feasting he made him his Prisoner, and takes his Daughter from him; because being his Vassal, he design'd to match her with the Son of his Capital Enemy. The Earl excus'd himself, as well as he could, and by much Mediation was releas'd and suffer'd to depart, but without his Daughter; for whom notwithstanding his Complaints to the Pope, and other Princes, who earnestly solicited for him, he could not get a Release; and thereupon this Earl presuming upon the Assistance of the Confederates takes Arms, and defies the King of France, who immediately invaded his Territories with sixty thousand Men. The King of England hearing this, made all the haste he could to relieve this distressed Earl, tho' he left his Business at home in a broken Condition, the Scots revolting, the English in Discontents, for which he made the best Provision he could, by leaving the Administration of the Kingdom to his Son the Prince in his absence, with the Advice of some great Counsellours, as the Bishop of London, the Earl of Warwick, the Lords Reginald Gray and Clifford; and to pacifie the Clergy, he receiv'd the Archbishop of Canterbury into his Favour. Being now ready to take Ship, the Archbishop, Bishops, Earls, Barons, and the Commons, send him a Roll of the general Grievances of his Subjects; 'Concerning his Taxes, Subsidies, and Impositions; his seeking to force their Services by unlawful Courses; his late Imposit of forty Shillings upon every Sack of Wool, which was but a Noble a Sack before, valuing the Wool of England to be a fifth part of all the Substance of it. The King sends them this Answer; 'That he could not answer any thing without the Advice of a Council, which were not now about him; and therefore requir'd them, since they would not attend him, tho' he went in Person in this Expedition, because he went not into France or Scotland, that they would not disturb the Peace of the Kingdom in his absence, and at his return he would set all things in order. And so he set forward in his Journey with five hundred Sail, and eighteen thousand armed Men, but found not Fortune so favourable in Flanders, as usually she had been to him. For contrary to his Expectation he found the People divided into popular Factions; and tho' they were willing to assist their Prince and defend their Liberties, yet so rich and proud, that they would be commanded no otherwise than they list'd; the King of France daily getting ground, having won Lisle, Doway, Courtray, Burges and Dam, and the Emperour Adolph failing in his Personal Assistance contrary to his Engagement and Bargain; all which much perplex'd him, with tedious Delays, and put him to great Trouble and Expences: So that he was forc'd to order his Son to call a Parliament at York, to procure him Supplies of Money and Treasure; and because he would not be disappointed of a liberal Grant, condescended to all Articles that were demanded concerning the great Charter, promising never after to charge his Subjects otherwise than by their own Consents in Parliament, and to pardon those that refuse to attend him in this Journey, for which all the Commons of the Realm granted him the ninth Penny of their Goods; the Archbishop of Canterbury, with the Clergy of his Province, the tenth Penny, and the Archbishop of York and his Province the fifth, and so the King's Wants

A. D. were relieved and Kingdom satisfied; but such 1299. Concessions, which are extorted by Necessity, are Reg. 26. always unsincere, and so never lasting. The King being thus supply'd, he staid all that Winter at Gaunt, where his Soldiers committed so many Outrages, that the Citizens being exasperated thereby took Arms, slew many; and tho' the Earl Guy did all he could by Gifts and fair Words to appease the incens'd Rabble, yet they pursu'd the King and his Forces so hard, that they could hardly get safe out of the Country. Thus the King left Flanders without Success, having made a Truce with the King of France for two Years; and leaving the poor Earl Guy to shift for himself, who shortly after became a Prey to his Enemy, and being made a Prisoner in Paris died with Grief, with his Daughter, and Flanders was made subject to the King of France, though he kept it not long: For after they had received him for their Lord, his Exactions and Oppressions upon them were so great, contrary to their ancient Liberties, that they arm'd all the People against him, being rich and mighty; who gave France the biggest Blow that ever it at once received at the Battel of Courtray, wherein the Earl of Artois, General of the Army, Arnold de Neel Constable of France, and all the Commanders, with twelve thousand Gentlemen, were slain; and tho' he still maintain'd the Quarrel against them for their Country, yet 'twas with his great Damage: For he lost in the eleven Years space the Lives of an hundred thousand Frenchmen (as their own Histories affirm) and by his Impositions of new Taxes of Malletote, and the tenth Denier, i. e. Penny upon every Livre or Pound of all Merchandizes, bred great great Outcries and dangerous Seditions among his Subjects, the lamentable Fruits of such Attempts, which may justly deter Princes from meddling upon such unjust Titles.

1300. King Edward being come home, immediately prepares for an Expedition into Scotland, which in his absence had beaten his Officers and People almost out of the Country, having put Earl Warren to flight, and slain Sir Hugh Cressingham, with six thousand English, recover'd many Castles, and regain'd Berwicke, and all by the Encouragement and Conduct of a poor private Gentleman, tho' descended of a Noble Family, William Wallis; who seeing his Country in miserable Slavery, the Nobility either in Captivity or Subjection, and all Hopes of Recovery from other ways to no purpose expected, gather'd a Company of Men of as poor and desperate Condition as himself, and attempts upon all Advantages he could discover to annoy the English; wherein having good Success, his Company and Courage so increased, that he became the general Guardian of the whole Kingdom, and having given the English several Defeats, was in a great Possibility to have redeem'd his Country from Subjection to England. So much could the Courage of one brave Man contribute to set a whole Nation free, which being all that he aim'd at, and not a Diadem or Crown, made his Vertues more admirable to all Ages, than otherwise they would have been. And now King Edward, that he might the better govern his two Kingdoms, removes his Exchequer and Courts of Justice to York, where they continu'd above six Years; and here he called a Parliament, requiring all his Subjects that A. The Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, notwithstanding their former Contempt, attended him: But tho' he was at the Head of a mighty Army, and surrounded with a great Strength, yet before they would advance one Step, they requir'd that the two Charters and their Pardons might be ratified, which they thought not sufficiently secur'd to them, because they were granted beyond Sea; wherefore the Bishop of Durham, and the Earls of Surrey, Warwick, and Glocester, undertook for the King, that after he had subdu'd his Enemies and was return'd, he should grant their Desires; and so these two Earls, with the Earl of Lincoln, led his Van-guard at the famous Battel of Falkirk, wherein the King of Scotland obtain'd a great Victory at the Expence of two hundred Knights, and above forty thousand Scots' Blood: But Wallis, with some few, escaped to make him more Work. And now again Scotland might seem quite overcome, most of the Estates of the Earls and Barons of Scotland (with their Titles) for this Revolt being given to the English Nobility to make them more resolute and ready to maintain this Conquest, and a Parliament is called at St. Andrews, where all the great Men of the Kingdom (except only Wallis) swore Fealty to the King of England. The Scottish Writers brand King Edward with most cruel Tyranny in this Expedition; 'Because he was not content to carry away captive all that were likely to create any Disturbances in the Nation, but endeavour'd to blot out their Memory for ever, by abolishing their ancient Laws, changing their Ecclesiastical Rites for the Customs of England, taking from them their Histories, Instruments of State, Monuments of Antiquity, either left by the Romans or erected by themselves, carrying all their Books and Learned Men into England; and removing the Marble Chair, on which the Fate of their Kingdom, as they imagin'd, depended; as if he had resolv'd not only to deprive them of their Strength, but their Understandings, that he might establish a perpetual Dominion over them.

This Expedition being over, he call'd another Parliament at Westminster, wherein he promised to confirm the two Charters; and a farther Allowance for Disforesting again what had been once done before, was urg'd, and at length granted, with omission of the Clause, Salvo Jure Coronæ Nostræ, which the King greatly desired should have been inserted, but the People would not endure it; and the Perambulation of the Forests of England is committed to three Bishops, three Earls, and three Barons. In this little time of Peace at home, a final Concord was made between the English and French, by the Mediation of Pope Boniface, and the King of England takes Margaret the French King's Sister to Wife in the sixty <sup>c</sup> He did not stay to hold a Parliament. The Scots having wasted their Country, he was forc'd to return for want of Provisions, and in Sept. 1298. held a great Council at Durham. The Calumny of King Edward's destroying the Scottish Records, was invented by Boetius, a very Fabulous Author, and has been often confuted.

A. D. 1301. second Year of his Age, and his Daughter is affianced to the Prince, and Restitution made of what the King of France had taken in Gascoigne. Reg. 28. Burdeaux returns to the Obedience of the King of England, (to the Merchants of which City he paid a hundred and fifty thousand Pound for the Expences of his Brother Edmund in the late Wars) and so all is well on that side. The same Pope also obtained a Permission of Edward, that John Baliol, the Captive King of the Scots, should go and live upon certain Lands he had in France, and undertook for his Observation of the Peace, and his Confinement; but he shortly after dy'd, having had little Joy in a Crown, and scarce leisure to know he was a King. About this time the crying-down and calling-in of a certain base Money, call'd Crocard and Pollard, and stamping them again, brought some advantage to the King's Treasury. But he had soon an occasion to spend it in a third Expedition into Scotland (from which he had not been return'd above eighteen Months) wherein he did little more than recover Sterling-Castle, defended three Months against all his Forces by William Oliver, and at last surrender'd to him upon Conditions. The rest of the Scots, who had revolted, flying into the Mountains and strong Holds of the Country, where the King's Army was more distressed, than the Enemy.

Upon the Conclusion of the Peace with France, the Scots being left out, and having none to relieve them, send their lamentable Complaints to Pope Boniface, representing to him 'the afflicted State of their Country, the Usurpation of the King of England upon them, and his most Tyrannical Proceedings with them, contrary to all Right and Equity; protesting, That they never knew of any Sovereignty he had over them, but that they were a free Kingdom of themselves; and so at first he dealt with them upon the Death of their last King Alexander, both in the Treaty of Marriage for his Son Edward with Margaret the Heir of Scotland, and also after her Death for the decision of the Title of their Crown, wherein he sought by their Consents to be made Arbitrator, as he was: And tho' since they have yielded much more to him, yet it was done by force, because they were not able to resist. The Pope having received this Remonstrance, writes powerful Letters to the King of England, commanding him 'to forbear farther proceedings against them, claiming withal the Sovereign Authority over that Kingdom, as belonging to the Church. The King answers the Pope's Letters at large, 'proving from all Antiquity, that the Dominion of Scotland had ever appertained to the English Crown, even from Brutus to his own Time. And at the same time all the Nobility wrote to the Pope, 'owning and claiming the same Right; and peremptorily conclude, That the King, their Lord, should in no wise undergo his Holiness's Judgment therein, nor send his Procurators (as was required) about that business, as tho' their King's Title were dubious, to the prejudice of the Crown, the Royal Dignity, Liberties, Customs, and Laws of England, which by their Oath and Duty they were bound to observe, and would defend with their Lives; nor could they permit, if the King would, any such unlawful proceedings. And therefore besought his Holiness not to concern himself farther in this matter. These Letters were subscribed with all their Names (set down particularly in Speed, p. 541.) and dated at Lincoln, where the Parliament was then holden, Anno A. D. Dom. 1301. The Pope upon this Answer, tho' not very grateful to him, yet stirr'd no more in the Scots Cause, because he had his Hands full of other Matters. For the King of France, whom he had Excommunicated, and given away his Kingdom to Albert of Austria, then Emperor, shortly after so wrought as his Spirituality was surpriz'd at Anagni, a City of Abruzzo, whither he was retir'd from the Troubles of Rome, and so violently treated by Sciarra Colonne, a Baudetto of Rome, and Nogoret an Albigioye, both whom he had persecuted as in extream Rage and Anguish, within few Days after he ends his turbulent Life.

The King of England, not yet enjoying a peaceable Possession of Scotland, was forced to make a fourth Expedition thither, to allay fresh Com-motions there; and to furnish himself out for this Action, he call'd a Parliament at Lincoln, where he confirm'd the two Charters again, and received of the People, as a grateful Acknowledgment of his Kindness to them, a fifteenth of all their Goods. Being thus supply'd with Money, he invades Scotland again, and had Homage and Fealty sworn to him a fourth time, as a Conqueror of it; which, accounting a sufficient confirmation of his Sovereignty over it, he return'd in a Triumphant manner, and in his way removes his Exchequer from York, feasts his Nobility at Lincoln magnificently, and so comes to London, where he gave solemn Thanks to God and S. Edward for the Victory; which Act of Piety may seem to have been the Cause of his obtaining a more compleat Victory, by bringing into his power his greatest Enemy (that renowned Guardian of his Country) William Wallis, who being betray'd by his Companion, was taken by Sir John Menteth, and sent up to the King to London, where he was try'd for his many Treasons committed against the King (tho' at his Arraignment he would not acknowledge him to be his King) and was condemned, according to the Laws of England, to be drawn, hang'd and quarter'd; and accordingly suffer'd the Sentence. Thus dy'd that worthy Man, for the defence of the Liberties of his own Country, in a strange one, and remains among the best Examples of Piety and Courage in that kind. And now the King being (as he supposed) secure from all Disturbances abroad and at home, being an universal Lord of the whole Isle, and having strong Alliances abroad, began to look nearly into his Government, and to raise himself Advantages from those Disorders which the Wars had caused. And the first Example of his Power (which he would have equal to his Will) was in the Case of Sir Nicholas Segrave, one of the greatest Knights of the Kingdom, who being accused of Treason by Sir John Cromwell, offer'd to justify himself by Duel; which, because the King refused to grant, in respect to the present War, he leaves the Camp, and went over the Sea to fight his Enemy. The King being angry at his Contempt of his Prohibition, accuses him of exposing his Royal Person to the Rage of his Enemies, and orders Justice to proceed against him. The Judges consulted three Days on his Case, and at last adjudged him guilty of Death, and all his Moveables and Immoveables to be forfeited to the King; but added, 'That he went out of the Nation, not in contempt of the King, but to be reveng'd of his Enemy, and therefore it was in the King's power to shew him Mercy. The King in anger replied, 'Have you been all this while consulting for this? I know it is in

But let this your Judgment be recorded, and ever held as a Law. And so Sir Nicholas, for Example and Terror to others, was put into Prison; tho' afterward, by the Intercession of many Noblemen of the Kingdom, and thirty of his Equals, being bound Body for Body, and Goods for Goods, for his Appearance whenever he should be call'd, the King restor'd him to his Estate. Shortly after the King likewise sends out a new Writ of Inquisition, call'd Trail-Baston<sup>a</sup>, to search out, and enquire after Intruders on other Men's Lands, who, to keep out the right Owner of them, would make over their Land to great Men; as also after Batterers, who were hired to beat Men; Breakers of the Peace, Ravishers, Incendiaries, Murtherers, Fighters, false Jurors, and other such Malefactors; which Inquisition was so strictly executed, and so great Fines imposed upon such as were guilty of any the said Crimes, that the King's Treasure was much increased by it. And so did likewise another Commission, sent out at the same time, to examine into the Behaviour of all Officers, and Ministers of Justice; whereby many were found Delinquents, and paid dearly for it. By this means Informers grew in great Request, and were encouraged, as the King's Friends, and his chief Agents for his Treasury. But besides these ways of Enriching himself, the King made some profit of certain Silver Mines in Devonshire, (as Holinshed relates) but it seems they were not sought after in following times, because the Charge was greater than the Profit.

1306. K. Edward his desiring with his rebellious Barons. And now the King being become a Terror to his Subjects, began to shew his Resentment of the stubborn Behaviour of his Nobles to him in times past, and so terrified Roger Bigod<sup>b</sup> Earl Marshal, that to recover his Favour, he made him Heir of all his Lands, (tho' he had a Brother living) and only reserved to himself an Annuity of a thousand Pound per Annum for his Life. Of others of them also he got great Sums for the same Offence. But the Archbishop of Canterbury, whom he accused of having disturbed the Peace in his absence, he sent over to Pope Clement V. who succeeded Boniface, to be crush'd by a double power. For this Pope was a Native of Burdeaux, and so as more regardful of the King, once his Sovereign, so also more favourable to the King's Desires; which to cherish and increase, the King sent him a compleat set of Furniture for his Chamber of clean Gold, which had such an influence upon the Pope, that he let lose the Lion upon his Subjects again, by absolving him from his Oaths and Obligations concerning the Charters, which he had confirmed by his three last Acts of Parliament; an Act of as little Piety in the Pope, as Conscience in the King. But it was not long before he found the Error of this Action, and saw just Cause to reform it, having as much need of their Love, as they of his Justice, which was by the unexpected News of a King made and crown'd in Scotland, done after this manner. Robert Bruce Earl of Carricke, the Son of that Robert who was Competitor with Baliol for the Kingdom, escaping out of England, becomes Head of the confuted Body of that People, was crowned King<sup>c</sup>, and pieced them up into such an Union presently, that he had Hands enough to support him before any Rumour of it could come to the Ears of King Edward, altho' John Comyn, his Cofin-German, a Man of great Interest and Alliance in Scotland, had written to the King of England to discover his Design; of which Bruce being either aware or suspicious, found out ways to intercept his Letters; and finding him at Dunfrays, set upon him, and murther'd him in the Church. This Foundation, which was laid in Blood, (the Place, Person, and Manner of it making it odious) much blemish'd his beginning, and was so far from gaining him a greater Security, as he imagin'd, that it got him more Enemies, and raised a mighty Party against him. King Edward (tho' late acquainted with his design, yet hasten'd the faster to overtake him) and therefore sends Amier de Valence Earl of Pembroke, the Lords Clifford and Piercy, with a strong Power to relieve his Wardens of Scotland, (who upon the Revolt of Bruce were all retreated to Berwick) whilst he himself prepared an Army to follow. And to effect this, and be more nobly attended, he put forth his Proclamation, commanding, 'That all, who by Paternal Succession, or any other ways, ought him Service, should repair to Westminster at Whitsuntide to him, to receive Order of Knighthood, and a Military Ornament out of the King's Wardrobe. Upon which Summons, three hundred young Gentlemen, all of them Sons of Earls, Barons and Knights assembled, and accordingly received Purples, Silks, Sindons, and Scarfs, wrought with Gold and Silver, according to every Man's degree; the Prince, who was by the King himself knighted, and girt with a Military Belt, girding the three hundred, whom the King had knighted, in the same manner as he had himself been before; and after, keeping their Vigil together in the New Temple, which being performed with all the Magnificence and Solemnity possible, the King made a Vow, That alive or dead he would avenge the Death of Comyn upon Bruce, and the perjur'd Scots, adjuring his Son, and all his Nobles upon their Fealty, that if he dy'd in the Journey they would carry his Corps about with them in Scotland, till they had subdu'd the Country, and conquer'd the Usurper. Which Desire, tho' it were more Martial than Christian, yet the Prince and all the Nobles promised upon their Faith to the utmost of their power to perform. And then having gotten the thirtieth Penny of the Clergy and Laity, and twentieth of all Merchants, he set forward immediately after Whitsuntide on his Expedition, in the 34th Year of his Reign. The Earl of Pembroke, who was sent before, being assisted with a strong Party of the Friends of Comyn, who were desirous to revenge his Death, had before the King's arrival defeated the whole Army of the new King at a Battel near St. John's Town, and had almost taken his Person; but he escaping in disguise recover'd an obscure shelter<sup>d</sup>, being reserved for more and greater Battels, while his Brother Nigel Bruce, with Thomas, and Alexander a Priest, were executed as Traitors at Berwick. So that King Edward at his coming had not so much to do as he expected, but went up and down the Country to shew his Power, and terrifie his

Before his Coronation there was a Parliament held at Northampton, wherein it was enacted, That the Monies coined by his Father, notwithstanding they were accounted base Metal, should be Current; and he obtain'd a fifteenth of the Clergy, and twentieth of the Laity. After which, having performed the Funeral Rites of his Father at Westminster, he took a Voyage into France to be marry'd to the Lady Isabel, the Daughter of Philip the Fair, King of France; where their Nuptials were celebrated with great Magnificence and Solemnity, there being present at them the King of France, and King of Navarr his Son, the King of Almain, the King of Sicily, and three Queens besides the Bride, with an extraordinary Concourse of Princes and great Men. Gavestone was also at this Feast, and is said to have exceeded all the Company in Richness and Bravery of Attire, with which afterwards he infected the Court of England, and by that the whole Nation: A Mischief great enough to undo a Kingdom alone, with the Expence to maintain it. Yet this was not all the Mischief he did, for he filled the Court with Parasites, Buffoons, Fiddlers, Stage-players, and all kind of dissolute Persons, to entertain and fill the King with carnal Delights and Pleasures, in which he was so deeply engag'd, that he lov'd no other Company, but spent all his Time in Wantonness, neglecting the Affairs of State, and the Counsel of his Nobles. These things so much distast'd the great Men, that when he was to be crown'd with his Queen at Westminster in the second Year of his Reign, they met together, and requir'd of him, That Gaveston might be removed out of his Court and Kingdom, otherwise they intended to hinder his Coronation at that time. The King, to avoid so great Disgrace, promised to grant whatever they desired in the next Parliament; and so the Coronation was permitted to be solemnized, yet it was done with that haste and precipitancy, as took off the Reverence and Grace of it. In it the King gave Gavestone S. Edward's Crown to carry before him, which greatly incensed the Lords against him, and added much to their former Offence and Hatred of him.

His Coronation. 1309.

The Knights Templars imprison'd.

Shortly after his Coronation, all the Knights-Templars throughout England were at once arrested, and committed to Prison, according to the Example which had been given him by the King of France, and most other Princes of Christendom. They were an Order of Knights first instituted by Baldwin IV. King of Jerusalem, about two hundred Years before this time, and were appointed for the Defence of that City, and the safe Convoy of all such as went thither. Afterwards by the pious Bounty of Princes, they were dispersed into all parts of Christendom, and richly endow'd with large Possessions, which made them degenerate much from their first Institution, and become execrably Vicious; for which Reason the Christian Princes combined together to apprehend them, and turn them out of their Order and Estates, the King of France being foremost in the design, because he intended to make one of his Sons King of Jerusalem, and get their Revenues for him. 1309. Their Accusation was brought to the Council at Reg. 3. Vienna, and they were condemn'd (more by Fame than Proof) as is evident from the condemnatory Sentence in the Bull of Pope Clement III. wherein are these words, Quoniam de Jure non possumus, tamen ad plenitudinem Potestatis, dictum Ordinem reprobamus; and then their Estates were given to the Hospitallers. This Affair being over, the Lords prosecuted their Design against Gavestone, who presuming upon the King's Favour, insolently scorn'd them, as much as they hated him, terming the chiefest of his Enemies by reproachful Names, as he pleas'd, viz. Thomas Earl of Lancaster he call'd the Stage-player; Aymer de Valence Earl of Pembroke, Joseph the Jew; and Guy Earl of Warwick, the Black-Dog of Arden; which Scoffs so heighten'd their desires of Revenge, that in the next Parliament, the whole Assembly, as if they had engaged in the Quarrel, humbly besought the King to advise and treat with his Nobles concerning the State of the Kingdom, that by their Counsel he might avoid the great Mischiefs which would fall upon him through neglect of Government; and urg'd it so far, that the King not only consented, but promised with an Oath to ratifie all such Articles as should be concluded upon by them to be necessary for the Welfare of the Kingdom. Upon this certain choice Men, both of the Clergy, Nobility and Commons, were selected to frame these Articles; and when they were finished, the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was lately recall'd from Banishment, with the rest of his Suffragans, at the Reading of them publicly before the Lords and Commons, in the presence of the King, solemnly pronounced the Sentence of Excommunication against all that shall dare to oppose them. Some of the Articles were: 1310. 'That the King should observe, and put in Execution Magna Charta, with all other Laws necessary for the preservation of the Church and Kingdom; That as the late King had done, so he should banish all Strangers out of his Court and Kingdom, and remove all his bad Counsellors from his Person; That the King shall not begin any War, or go any where out of the Kingdom, without the consent of the Parliament. These Articles seem'd very harsh to the King, but to avoid farther trouble, he granted them, and especially consented to the Banishment of his Favourite Gavestone, whom he sent immediately into Ireland, tho' not as an Exile, but in Quality of his Lieutenant there; as if that piece of Self-denial would have excus'd him from all the rest. But he could not be long without his Company, and therefore within a few Months he recall'd him; and to secure him the better against his Enemies, he marries him to his Neice (the Daughter of Joanna de Acres) Sister of Gilbert Earl of Gloucester, a Man much belov'd and esteem'd among the Nobility, for whose sake, and by whose means he hop'd Gavestone would find more favour with the Nobility. But all this would not do. Either his Behaviour or their Malice was such, that they would not endure him about the King, who, by making him great, lessen'd them; and by enriching him, not only impoverish'd himself (for 'tis said he gave him the Jewels of the Crown, and so much of his Treasure, that the Queen com-

These Actions provoked the Barons, that they send him plain Word, 'That unless he did put from him Pierce Gavestone, and observe the Articles, which he had promis'd by Oath to keep, they would all with one Consent rise up in Arms against him, as a perjur'd Prince. The King, who was easily terrified with such Messages of his Nobles, as they found, not only yields again to the Banishment of his Favourite, but granted them farther, 'That if he were ever after found in the Kingdom, he should be condemn'd to Death, as an Enemy of the State. Peirce having left England, could find no safe Place of retreat: Ireland could not any more protect him, France was very unsafe for him, because wait was laid for him there to apprehend him. In Flanders he lurk'd a-while, but in great Danger; wherefore seeing he could be secure no where, he resolves to adventure again into England, and commit himself to the King's Protection, a Sanctuary that would not be violated. The King received him with great Joy, and that he might be out of the envious Eye of his Nobility, he carry'd him into the North Parts of England, but he was soon after discover'd by the Lords; who, withal hearing that he was, tho' privately, in as great Favour as ever, presently combine together and take Arms, electing Thomas Earl of Lancaster, the Son of Edmund Earl of Lancaster, Brother to Henry III. for their Leader, a Man very popular and powerful, and Earl likewise of Leicester, Ferrers and Lincoln. With him joyn'd Humphrey Bobun Earl of Hereford, Aymur de Valence Earl of Pembroke, Guy de Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Arundel, with many other Barons: But Gilbert Earl of Glocester, the King's Nephew, being desirous neither to offend the King, nor be wanting to his Peers, stood Mediator between both Parties for the Liberties and Peace of the Kingdom. The Earl Warren was doubtful, and favour'd the King's Party rather, till the Archbishop of Canterbury brought him to joyn with the Lords; who being well prepar'd against all Encounters, send to the King in behalf of the whole Commonalty of England, 'Beseeching him to deliver up Peirce Gavestone to them, or send him with all his Train out of England. The King neglecting an Answer to their Petition, they set forward with some Forces toward the North. The King and Gavestone withdraw to Newcastle, and there having a full Account of the Strength of the Lords, they took Ship together (leaving the Queen, then with Child, in great Grief behind) and land at Scarborough Castle, into which the King puts Gavestone, with the best Forces he could get for his Defence, and leaving him departed into Warwickshire. The Earls of Pembroke and Warren, who were sent by the Earl of Lancaster, lay Siege to the Castle, and Gavestone surrender'd himself into their hands; but intreats, That he might have Liberty to speak once more to the King, and then they should do as they pleas'd with him. The Earl of Pembroke undertakes 'that he should upon his Honour, but as his Servants were carrying him, the Earl of Warwick met them, and took him by force from them, and commits him to his Castle of Warwick; where, after some Consultation among the Lords (tho' A. D. the King earnestly solicited for his Life) they 1310. condemn'd him without Tryal to the Block, and Reg. 4. cut off his Head. And this was the end of Peirce Gavestone <sup>Stone's personal Con- rage and Worth.</sup>: He was a Native of Gascoigne, and Gave- for the great Service his Father had done to this Crown, was educated by King Edward the First with his Son the Prince, by which means he gain'd so great an Interest in his Favour. He was a goodly Person, of undaunted Courage, and a skilful Man at Arms, as he shew'd himself at a Tournament at Wallingford; wherein he challeng'd the best of our Nobility, and is said to have foil'd them all, which inflam'd their Malice against him. In Ireland, during the short time he was Lieutenant there in his Banishment, he conquer'd the Rebels in the Mountains of Dublin, built Newcastle in the Kerns Country, repair'd Kevni-Castle, and afterward passed up into Munster and Thomond, doing great Service to his Master with much Valour and Bravery. He seems to have been a Person, that could not fawn or stoop to those he loved not, nor disguise his Nature so far, as to temporize with his Enemies: But presuming upon his Fortune, grew in the end to be arrogant and proud, and was so intolerable as nothing but his Ruin, which it produced, could ease the Subjects of that heavy Burthen.

The Lords having gotten their Desire upon Gavestone, and thereby finding the King's Weakness (for he should never have fall'n into their hands, if the King had had Power enough to have kept him out) assume to themselves greater Authority; and as if all things were under their Command, peremptorily require the Confirmation and immediate Execution of all the Articles formerly granted, threatening the King, That unless he perform'd the same, as they desir'd, they would force him to it; and for this end, with their Swords drawn, assembling at Dunstable make towards London, where the King lay. The great Bishops, and Earl of Glocester, seeing the Tempest gathering, labour to appease them; and with two Cardinals * (which at that time were sent by the Pope to reform the Disorders of the Kingdom) repairing to St. Albans, desire Conference with the Lords, who receive them very peaceably, but rejected the Pope's Letters written to them; saying, 'They were Sword- 1313. men, and minded not Letters; That there were many wise and learned Men in the Kingdom, whose Counsels they would use, and not Strangers, who knew not the Cause of their rising, and therefore would not permit Foreigners to concern themselves in their Actions, or the Affairs of the Kingdom, with which Answer the Cardinals return to London. But the English Bishops so prevail'd by their Persuasions with the Lords, as that they were willing to restore to the King such Horses, Treasure and Jewels, as they had taken from Pierce Gaveston at Newcastle, if the King would grant their Petitions; and so John Sandal, Treasurer of the Kingdom, and Ingelard Warle, Keeper of the Wardrobe, were sent to St. Albans to receive them of them. About this time Queen Isabel was deliver'd of a Son <sup>Edward the Third born.</sup> at Windsor, whom Lewis her Brother, and the great Men and Ladies of France, would have baptiz'd by the Name of her Father Philip, but

Pierce Gavestone is taken by the Lords and executed.

The Bishops persuade the Lords to submit to the King.

* And that she was depriv'd of the King's Love, because Peirce engag'd the King in Whoredom and Adulteries.
 † The Bishops were very zealous Confederates in this Action; inasmuch, that the Archbishop excommunicated Walter Bishop of Creventry, because out of a Loyal Principle he refus'd to joyn with them.
 ‡ Dr. Brady, in his Appendix to his Comp. Hist. affirms, That Edward was not the Earl of Pembroke, but the Lord Henry Regent, that Gaveston surrender'd himself; which he proves from a Record in the Tower, there mention'd.

A. D. 1313. Reg. 7. A Parliament at London. the Nobility of England had him nam'd Edward. Here the King kept his Christmas, feasting the French with great Magnificence, by whom he was suspected by his Barons to have had ill Advice given him. Shortly after a Parliament is called at London, wherein the King complains, 'That his Barons had contemn'd him, rais'd War in his Realm against him, and murder'd Peirce Gavestone. But they unanimously answer'd him, 'That they had not offended in so doing, but had merited his Love and Favour; having taken Arms not in Contempt to his his Royal Person, but to destroy the publick Enemy of the Kingdom, who as such had been banish'd before by two Kings; a Man by whom his Reputation and Honour was blemish'd, his Revenue wasted, and a dangerous Contest rais'd between him and his Subjects, of which there could otherwise be no end with all their Labour. Adding farther, That they would not be longer deluded with vain Promises or Delays, concerning their requir'd Articles, as they had been. The Queen and Bishops seeing their Resolution, endeavour'd by their Persuasions to allay their Heat, and prevail'd at length so far, that to appease the King's Wrath, they and their Confederates submitted to beg the King's Pardon in open Parliament, which they obtain'd; and the King having receiv'd them into his Favour as his Loyal Subjects, granted them their Articles, and particularly pardons by his Charter all such as had been concern'd in the Death of Gavestone, and then the State in Consideration of his great Wants, granted him a fifteenth. Guy de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, was here also appointed to be one of the King's Council; who being a Person much env'y'd by those that had the King's Favour chiefly, dy'd shortly in that Station, not without Suspicion of Poison.

The Lords submit and are pardon'd.

1314. The Scots united disturb England. While England labour'd under these Distractions and Divisions, through the Weakness of its King, Scotland grew unanimous almost under a provident one, who in this time did not only subdue the Scottish Faction, and recover most of his Country, but began to spoil England, laying waite all Northumberland in such manner, as that the People were forced to make their Application to the King for Recovery of their Country out of their hands. King Edward awaken'd with the Importunities of the People, and thinking it would be a great Dishonour to the Kingdom to sit still, rais'd an Army for the Redress of their Losses, and enter'd Scotland with the most powerful Host that ever went thither, consisting (as the Scottish Writers relate) of an hundred thousand Men, of several Nations, viz. Flemmings, Gascoigns, Welsh and Irish; who confiding in their Numbers, devour'd the Country in their Imagination before they came thither, and thought not of fighting; but dividing the Prey. Besides, most of the Nobility of England attended the King, except the Earls of Lancaster, Warwick, Warren and Arundel; who refused to go with him, because the King delay'd the Execution of the former Articles. The Castle of Sterling was the first thing the King intended to relieve, which had held out a long time against the Scots, by the valiant Conduct of Philip Mowbray, a courageous Knight. Near this Place, upon the River Berwicke, did Bruce with thirty thousand Scots, encounter this mighty Army of the English; which tho' much too great a Match for them, yet the Scots had been so harden'd to Wars, and receiv'd them with so much Preparation, and at such an Advantage, having inaccessible Rocks behind them to defend them, and a Moorish uncertain Ground before them, wherein they had dug Trenches, and cover'd them with Hurdles, that the Horse could not pass, that they easily became Conquerours, and gave England the greatest Overthrow that ever it receiv'd: For there perish'd in this Battel (call'd the Battel of Bannock's Burn) Gilbert de Clare, the last Earl of Gloucester, a great Supporter of the English State, Robert Lord Clifford, the noblest of our Lords, with the Lords Tiptoft, Marshal, Giles de Argenton, Edmund de Maul, and seven hundred Knights, Esquires, and Gentlemen of Note; and of common Soldiers the Scottish Historians say fifty thousand, but ours ten thousand. Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, Ralph de Mortelmere, (who marry'd Joanna de Acres, Countess Dowager of Gloucester) with many others, were taken Prisoners; the King, and those that were preserved, escap'd by Flight. This Victory put Scotland into Heart and Wealth together; so that they held their own the better for a long time after, and discourag'd the People of this Nation for many Years so much, that tho' Edward desir'd several times to recover this Dishonour, yet his People chose rather to sink in their Losses, than run any farther Hazards; and the poor Borderers, who had the worst of it, were so dejected, that Walsingham says, an hundred of them would flie before three Scots. So weak do the lower parts become, when the Head is impaired.

The English conquer'd at the Battel of Bannock's Burn.

This great Misfortune was not single, but in the next Year many great Calamities follow'd it, viz. such Inundations as brought forth Dearth, and Dearth produced Famine, and Famine Pestilence, all which exceeded any that had ever been in England before; insomuch, that a Parliament was call'd at London to abate and settle the Prizes of Victuals, which then grew excessive dear. And therefore it was ordain'd, That an Ox fatt'd with Grass should be sold for 16 s. fatt'd with Corn for 20 s. the best Cow for 12 s. a fat Hog of two Years old for 3 s. 4 s. a fat Sheep shorn 14 d. with the Fleece 20 d. a fat Goose 2 d. a fat Capon 2 d. a fat Hen 1 d. four Pigeons 1 d. and whosoever sold for more, shall forfeit their Goods to the King. Here seems then to have been no Calves, Lambs, Gollins, Chickens, or young Pigs to be sold, such Dainties were not yet in use. After the Settlement of these Rates, all kind of Provision grew more scarce; for there happen'd such a Murrain to Cattel, and such a Destruction of all sorts of Fruits by the excessive and unseasonable Rains, that Victuals could not be gotten for the King's House, nor Means for other great Men to maintain their Tables; insomuch, that they were forced to put away their Servants in great Numbers, which produced another Mischief: For these Men being brought up in Laziness and

King Edward, tho' in manifest Danger, was so much troubl'd at this Defeat, that he cou'd hardly be persuaded to fly. This Victory is remark'd by our Historians as a Divine Punishment of the Lewdness and Excesses of the English Army, who spent the Night before the Fight in Drunkenness and Intemperance, but a Reward of the Piety of the Scots; who enter'd upon it with solemn Confessions, and receiving the Sacrament: Wherefore God gave them such a miraculous Victory, as so few hands without a special Assistance of God could not have effected.

* The Battel was fought on the 25th of June, 1314.

* The Rates of Corn seem not to be sett'd, because there was scarce any to be gotten; for soon after there was an Order put out, that no Corn shou'd be malted or brew'd with, that Barley might be preserv'd for Bread.

Plenty,

A. D. Plenty, and not able to work, fell to Robbery and Spoil, so that nothing was safe from danger. 1317.

Reg. 11. Three Years this Affliction held, and was attended with such a general Sickness and Mortality of the common sort, caused by their 'unwholesome Food, that the Living were scarce enough to bury the Dead. But all these Miseries, which befel the Nation, could not allay the Discontents and Hatred between the King and his Nobles, but they were daily seeking opportunity to increase it. The King employs one Richard St. Martin, a deform'd Dwarf, to take the Wife of Thomas Earl of Lancaster out of his House at Canford in Dorsetshire, claiming her for his Wife, and declaring, He had lain with her before she marry'd the Earl; which the Lady, to her eternal Disgrace, owned. By her this mean Person<sup>b</sup> claim'd the Earldoms of Lincoln and Salisbury, of which she was Heir, and rais'd not only a desire of Revenge in the Earl against himself, but the King, who was look'd upon to be the chief Agent in it. This and other of the King's Actions became so observable to his People, that a Knight setting a Woman in a fatalistical Dress upon an Horse, sent a Letter by her into Westminster-Hall to the King as he sat at Dinner upon the Feast of Pentecost, wherein he was blamed for neglecting such as had done him and his Father good Services, and advancing Men of mean Parts, and no Deserts, &c. At which, tho' the King was angry at first, yet when the Knight owned he did it for his Honour, he was satisfied, and did nothing to him.

The Scots infest the Borders of England, and invade Ireland.

While these Afflictions lay upon the Nation within, the Scots infest them in the North parts, with which the English, who undertook to defend them, so far joyn'd, that what they kept the Scots from taking away and spoiling, they took themselves. So that the miserable People were utterly undone by being plunder'd on all sides; and Bruce, who was now absolute King of the Scots, sent his Brother with a mighty Army into Ireland, where he got a part, and reigned under the Title of a King three Years<sup>d</sup>. Thus all things, both at home and abroad, went ill with England. But yet they were a means of producing some good, for they were an occasion of that Reconciliation which was shortly after made between the King and Earl of Lancaster, by the mediation of two Cardinals, upon such Conditions as were soon after broken unjustly by the King. For a Knight was taken passing by Pomfret, with Letters, sealed with the King's Seal, directed to the King of Scots, about murdering the Earl. The Messenger was executed, and his Head set upon the top of the Castle, and his Letters reserved to witness the intended Plot. This Action, whether true or false, cast a foul Aspersions upon the King, and made many take the Earl's part. After this, upon an Invasion of the Scots, who foraged as far as Tork, a Parliament is call'd at London, in which the King, by the Intercession of the Cardinals and Clergy of England, yields faithfully to observe all the former required Articles. Whereupon an Army is agreed to be rais'd, at the Expence of the People, to go against the Scots; London sends two hundred, Canterbury forty, St. Albans ten, and so all other Cities and Boroughs according to their proportion; by which means a considerable Army was levy'd; but being come as far as Tork, through Mutiny and Discontents was dissolved, and so turn'd back, and nothing was effected. The next Year after, upon the Surrender of Berwick to the Scots, by the Treason of Peter Spalding, who had the keeping of it, the King rais'd an Army and besieged it. The Scots, to divert his Forces, entred England in other places, and had almost surprized the Queen's Person lying at Tork; but the Siege, notwithstanding this, continued, and the King was in great possibility to have gained the Town, had not the Earl of Lancaster and his Followers withdrawn themselves upon a Discontent, hearing the King say, That he would give the keeping of it to the Lord Hugh Spencer the younger, who now was the King's Favourite, and therefore hated by the Earl. Again, The Inhabitants of Tork, and the adjoining Counties, having received inestimable Damages by the Scots, gather an Army of ten thousand Men, and encounter them at Milton on the Swale; but being not well conducted nor experienced, they were beaten with the loss of three thousand Men<sup>e</sup>. This being related to the King, he seeing all things succeed ill with him, concludes a Truce with the Scots for two Years, and so leaves those parts dishonourably.

A Parliament at London, by which an Army was rais'd against the Scots.

In the time of this Peace, a great Flame arose from a small Spark, which was kindled by this occasion. A Baron, whose Name was William Brewes, having by his Prodigality and Vice wasted his Estate, offer'd to sell a part of it, called Powes, to several Men; Humphry Bobun Earl of Hereford, because the Lands adjoyned to his Estate, begs leave of the King to buy it, and bargains for it. The two Mortimer's, Uncle and Nephew, great Men in those parts, not knowing of the former Bargain, made a Contract also for it with Sir William Brewes. Hugh Spencer the younger hearing also that those Lands were to be sold, and lay near his Estate, obtains a more particular Grant of the King, being his Chamberlain, and buys it out of all their hands. The Earl of Hereford being thus defeated of his Bargain, complains to the Earl of Lancaster (the Refuge of all discontented Men) of this Injustice, and induced him to enter into a Confederacy with divers other Barons there assembled, obliging themselves by an Oath to live and die one with another, in maintaining the Rights of the Kingdom, and procuring the Banishment of the two Spencers, the Father and Son, whom they stiled The Seducers of the King, and Oppressors of the State, disposing all things at Court as they please, and suffering nothing to be obtain'd but by their means; which the State accounted an intolerable Mischief. Under these pretences they take up Arms, and contrary to all Justice and Right seiz'd upon and destroy'd the Lands and Goods of those Persons, which they pretended to prosecute, and of all those that had any Affinity or Friendship with them, killing their Servants, and disposing of their Castles at their pleasure. Which done, they marched to St. Albans, and from thence send <sup>a</sup> The meaner sort are Dogs and Horses; and, as our Historians add, Children and Men were stoll'n for Food, yet it appears by the Parl. Rolls, 1 Edw. 2. N<sup>o</sup> 35, 36. that the Price of Corn and Victuals was settled. Mr. Daniell places this Act two Years too forward, it pass'd Anno 1315.

<sup>b</sup> He was a Knight; Thomas Walsingham calls him Sir Richard of St. Martin, a Retainer to the Earl of Surrey.

<sup>c</sup> The two Chiefs of these Banditti were Gilbert de Middleton, and Walter de Selby; the former was surpriz'd in his Castle and hang'd, what became of the other we do not read in the Histories of this Reign.

<sup>d</sup> He went over to Ireland in the Year 1317. and was kill'd in Battel by the Lord Birmingham, on the 14th of October, 1318. His Body was quarter'd, and his Head sent to England.

A. D. 1321. to the King, who then resided at London, and was in Consultation with the Bishops of London, Salisbury, Hereford, and Chichester, about settling the Peace. The Bishops seeing this, desired him, as he tender'd the Peace and Happiness of his Realm, to banish from his Court those Traitors, the Spencers, who were condemned in many Articles of High Treason by the Commons of the Nation; and withal to grant a Pardon and Indemnity unto the Barons, and all their Adherents, that they should not hereafter suffer for any Crime, past or present. The King answer'd, That Hugh Spencer the Father was beyond Seas employ'd in the Business of the Nation, and the Son was guarding the Cinque-ports according to his Duty; and that it was both against Law, and the Custom of the Realm, that they should be banished without being heard; That their Petition was against Justice and Reason, because the Spencers were always ready to answer all Complaints made against them according to Law; and if the Lords could prove, that they had offended against any Statute of the Realm, they would submit to a Tryal. Farther swearing, That he would never break his Coronation-Oath, by granting a Pardon to such notorious Offenders, as contemned his Person, disturbed his Government, and violated his Majesty. This Answer so exasperated the Lords, that they presently drew near to London, and lodged in the Suburbs, till they could obtain leave to enter into the City; which being granted, they came to the King, and boldly urge their Demands; which at length the King, by the mediation of the Queen and chief Bishops, condescended to; and by his Edict, published in Westminster-Hall by the Earl of Hereford, are the Spencers banished the Kingdom for their Lives. Hugh the Father keeps beyond the Seas, but the Son staid privately in England, expecting a Turn of Affairs*. The Lords (being satisfied, and pardoned) return home, yet not to live so secure as to give over all provision for their own Defence. Yet all their Care could not prevent their Destruction, which soon after follow'd, upon this Occasion: The Queen, who had always been a principal Instrument of Peace and Concord between the King and his Barons, going on a Progress to Canterbury, was disposed to lodge in the Castle of Leeds, which belonged to the Lord Bedlesmere, who was lately the King's Steward, but then took part with the Barons; and to that end sent her Marshal before to make things ready for her and her Attendants. But the Keeper plainly told him, That neither the Queen, nor any Body else should be admitted without Letters from his Lord; which Answer he also gave to the Queen her self coming in Person, so that she was forced to take up such Lodging that Night as they could get for her. This Indignity the Queen at her return complain'd of to the King, who took it so ill, that he presently went down with a Body of armed Men out of London, and laying siege to the Castle, took it, hang'd the Keeper Thomas Culpeper, sends the Wife and Children of the Lord Bedlesmere to the Tower, and seizes upon all his Goods and Treasure. And now A. D. 1322. having this power about him, and embolden'd by Success, and the Instigation of the Queen, he went on to Cicester, where he kept his Christmas, and there provides an Army against the Barons. Some of the Lords seeing the King's Power to increase, left their Associates, and yielded themselves to the King's Mercy; among whom were the two Mortimer's, Men of great Estates and Interests, the Lords Hugh Audley and Maurice Barklay, and others, who notwithstanding, contrary to their Expectation, were sent to divers Prisons. The Earls of Lancaster and Hereford seeing this sudden change, withdrew themselves and their Company from Gloucester, towards the North-parts. The King, with whom were the Earls of Arbol and Angus, followed them with his Army, and engaging them at Burton upon Trent, subdued their Forces, and put them all to flight. Whereupon they retired farther North, and at Borough-Brigs were engaged by Sir Simon Ward Sheriff of York, and Sir Andrew Harkley Constable of Carlisle, who slew the Earl of Hereford in striving to pass the Bridge, and took the Earl of Lancaster, and divers other Lords, Prisoners. The King being at Pomfret, the Captive Lords were carry'd thither to him; and on the third Day after their coming, the King sitting himself in Judgment, with Edmund Earl of Kent his Brother, the Earls of Pembroke and Warren, Hugh Spencer, lately created Earl of Winchester, and others, gave Sentence of Death against Thomas Earl of Lancaster, by drawing, hanging, and beheading as a Traitor, but the two first being pardoned, because he was of the Royal Blood, he was beheaded the same Day without the Town of Pomfret, before his own Castle. And by the like Judgment were condemned and executed at York the Lords Roger Clifford, Warren, Lisle, William Tutchet, Thomas Mauditt, Henry Bradburn, William Fitz-Williams, William Lord Cheyney, Thomas Lord Moubray, and Jocelin Lord Danyll. Shortly after the Lord Henry Teyes was taken, drawn, hang'd and quarter'd at London; the Lord Aldenham at Windsor, the Lords Badlesmere and Afburnham at Canterbury, the Lord Gifford at Gloucester, principal Men in principal Places, to spread the Terror of their Actions over the Kingdom, all their Estates and Inheritances being confiscated, and new Men put into them. And this was the first Blood of the Nobility, which was shed after this manner since the Conquest; which being so profusely spilt, procured sharp Revenge soon after.

The King, exalted with this Success against his Barons, thought Fortune would now continually attend him; and therefore, as well to compleat his Conquests, as to keep the Minds and Hands of his People busied, he marches from York with a mighty Host into Scotland. He was but badly provided of Victuals for so great a Multitude; which the Scots having notice of, convey'd themselves and all Succours out of the way; and thereby forced him to endure so great Wants, that he was constrained to return with Dishonour, having conquer'd his Armies without Blows. In his Passage * Adam Murymuthe, in his History of this King, in Magd. Coll. Lib. in Oxon, writes, That the younger Spencer turn'd Pyrate, and robb'd all the Merchant-Ships he could meet with.

† Sir Roger Mortimer, and some others of the imprison'd Lords, escap'd out of Prison, and fled into France.

‡ The King is said to have us'd so much Severity against these Lords, by the Advice and Instigation of the Spencers, who thought, by thus removing their Enemies, to remain in the King's Favour without disturbance.

§ This Earl of Lancaster was reckon'd a Saint by the common People, who loving him for his love of his Country, after he was dead went in Pilgrimage to his Tomb; the Spencers, enrag'd at the Respect paid to his Memory, got the King to order a Guard to hinder the People's coming to the Monastery of Pontefraith, where he was bury'd; yet they did it privately. And in the next Reign a Church was built over his Tomb, and Queen Isabel her self wrote to the Pope to justify the Miracles done there, and to desire his Canonization, which indeed he deserv'd much more than any of his Countrymen, who had acquir'd that Honour since the Conquest. For if the Love of his Country may be call'd Piety, he was truly and unalterably a pious Man, and was afterwards Canoniz'd, Anno 1389.

¶ The Spencers got the greatest share of them.

homeward,

A. D. 1323. homeward, when he had advanc'd a pretty way into his own Country, the Scots fall upon his Army unawares, took the Earl of Richmond, the King himself hardly escaping; and having spoil'd the Country as far as the Walls of York, return'd loaden with great Spoils. This was the Success of this unfortunate King (who was not born for Triumphs) in his third Expedition into Scotland. After this, the King being at leisure, and in a calmer Humour it seems, began to reflect upon the Execution of the Earl of Lancaster, which he discover'd upon this Occasion. Some of his Courtiers making an earnest Petition to him to pardon one of the Earl's Followers (a Man of low Degree) and pressing him much to it, he bursts out into a Passion, and exclaims against them as unjust and wicked Counsellors, who can urge him so much to save the Life of a notorious Villain, but would not speak one Word for his near Kinsman the Earl of Lancaster, who, said he, had he lived, might have been serviceable to me and the whole Kingdom; but this Fellow, the longer he lives the more Mischief he'll do, and therefore by the Soul of God, he shall die the Death he hath deserv'd. Sir Andrew Harkley, who took the Earl of Lancaster Prisoner at Borough-Brigs, and for that Service was advanced to the Earldom of Carlisle, enjoy'd his Honour but a little while; for the next Year, either through the Malice of the Spencers, who envy'd his Preferment, or else for joining with the Scots in hopes of a great Match (as was proved upon him) he was degraded of all his Honours, drawn, hang'd, and quarter'd at London for Treason<sup>b</sup>, and is a remarkable Example of the Instability of Honour and Greatness under fickle and ill governing Princes.

A Parliament call'd.

The Bishop of Hereford accused of Treason, but refuses to answer before Lay Judges.

The important Business of the Nation at this time, and especially the Summons sent by the new King of France, Charles the Fair, who succeeded his Brother Philip the Long, to King Edward to come and do his Homage for his Province of Gascoigne, made it necessary for the Parliament to be called, and accordingly met. In it it was decreed by the common Consent of all the Assembly, That the King should not go in Person into France at that time, but send some Principal Men to excuse or defer his Appearance. In this Parliament the King requir'd a Subsidy both of the Clergy and Laity, for the Redemption of John Brittain Earl of Richmond, who was lately taken Prisoner by the Scots. But it was deny'd and alledg'd, 'That no Contribution ought of right to be made for the Redemption of any Person but King, Queen or Prince, and so nothing was gotten but more Anger kindled. At this Session also the Bishop of Hereford was arrested, and accused of High Treason before the King and his Council, for aiding the King's Enemies in their late Rebellion; but he refused to answer (being a consecrated Bishop) without leave of the Archbishop of Canterbury, whose Suffragan he was, and who was his only proper Judge next under the Pope, or without the Consent of his Fellow Bishops, who thereupon arose and begged the King's Clemency to him: But finding him implacable, they took the Bishop from the Bar, and deliver'd him to the Custody of the Archbishop of Canterbury, till the King should appoint another time for his Answer to what he was charg'd with. Shortly after he was again taken and convented as before, which the Clergy understanding, the Archbishops of Canterbury, York and Dublin, with ten other Bishops, went to the Place of Judgment with their Crosses erected, and took him away with them, commanding all Men upon pain of Excommunication, to forbear to lay violent hands upon him. This audacious Act much displeased the King, who commanded, that Inquiry should be made concerning the Objections brought against the Bishop, Ex Officio Judicis; and being found guilty tho' absent, all his Goods and Possessions were seiz'd into the King's hands. This Act of the King's lost him the Clergy, and added much to the discontented Party of the Nation, which was now grown to be almost universal, except the Spencers, and their Followers; who being enrich'd with the Spoils of the Barons, govern'd all things as they pleas'd, selling the King's Favours, and suffering none to see him, but whom they list; and at length becoming so arbitrary in their Disposals, that they presum'd to abridge the Queen<sup>d</sup> of her Maintenance, and lessen her Household Train, which was the fatal Act that proved their undoing.

While these things were done in England, Ho-<sup>The King's</sup>mage was neglected in France; whereupon the King of France proceeded so far, that all King Edward's Territories there were adjudged to be forfeited, and many Places of Importance seiz'd upon by the French. The King sent over his Brother Edmund into Gascoigne to secure his Dominions, and recover what was lately fall'n into the French hands, but to little purpose; the King of France was before him, and had gotten the People over to him, being the stronger side: So that nothing could be done, unless either the King would go over in Person, or send the Queen to her Brother to mediate a Peace, otherwise all was in danger to be lost. As for the King's going in Person, the Spencers held it unsafe both for him and them, if he should leave his Kingdom in so great and general Discontents, as then it was; wherefore the Queen, with a small Train, is sent over to accommodate the Business, which she negotiated so well, that it was agreed, That all Quarrels should end upon Condition, that the King of England would give to his Son Edward the Duchy of Aquitaine, with the Earl-<sup>The Prince made Duke of Aquitaine, and sent to do Homage</sup>dom of Pontbieu, and send him over to do Homage for the same; which, after many Consultations, the King was persuaded to yield unto. The Prince therefore is sent with the Bishop of Exeter, and others, to the Court of the King of France, where he was most welcome to his Mother, who herein got her Aims; and being wholly bent upon Revenge (of which Women are usually most eager) found there, as well as in England, enough to nourish that Humour in her; of whom the chief was Roger Mortimer, Lord of Wigmore, a gallant Gentleman, whom she much favour'd, who had lately escap'd into France out of the Tower of London. The Bishop of Exeter perceiving some Plots in hand, by their Consultations, which they manag'd closely without him, withdraws secretly, and discovers to the King what he observed of their Actions. The King therefore sends presently for the Queen and the Prince, and solicits the King of France

<sup>b</sup> He was degraded of his Honour before Execution, and is the first Instance of that kind in English History.

<sup>d</sup> This was done by the Spencers Means, because she dislike'd the King's Rigour to the Lords, tho' they pretended it was because the King of France, her Brother, had invaded the King's Territories on that side.

A. D. 1326. Reg. 19. to hasten their return: But when he saw it was neglected and delay'd, he caused them openly to be proclaim'd Enemies to the Kingdom, and banish'd them and all their Adherents, causing all the Ports to be strongly kept, and sending three Admirals, who should wait on several Coats to oppose their landing. On the other side, as the King hath a faithful Subject, so had the Queen officious Persons; who to enflame her against the King, and widen the Breach, inform'd her, That there was a Design in hand to murder her and the Prince: Whereupon she having before found her Brother backward to countenance and assist her against her Husband, mistrusted, that such a Design would be entertain'd by the French Courtiers easily, through the Advantage of the Spencers Gold, and so withdrew to the Earl of Henault, being then a rich and potent Prince, and Earl of Holland, to whose Daughter Philippa she contracted her Son the Prince, and gets both sufficient Aid and Money of him to transport her safely into England. Arriving at Harwich, with the Prince, Earl of Kent, the King's Brother (whom she brought with her from the Court of France) the Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Roger Mortimer, and John the Earl of Henault's Brother, with 2500 Henowayes and Flemings: She was received with great Joy, and a general Concourse of all the discontented Nobility, and others of the Nation, and especially the Bishops of Hereford and Lincoln, who having lost the King's Favour, fought by this means to recover their Loss by assisting the Queen. The King having notice of the sudden and safe Arrival of the Queen, demands assistance of the City of London; who returns answer, 'That they would with all Duty honour the King, Queen, and Prince; but would shut their Gates against all Foreigners and Traitors to the Realm, and with all their power withstand them'. The King and his Council, not daring to rely upon such an Answer, resolved to leave them; and having first put out a Proclamation, that none upon pain of Death should assist the Queen, but destroy all her Adherents, only her own Person, the Prince, and his Brother the Earl of Kent, excepted; and promising, That whosoever should bring the Head of Roger Mortimer should have a thousand Pound. And committing the keeping of the Tower to Sir John Weston, with the preservation of his younger Son John of Eltham, and his Neice the Countess of Glocester (who was first the Wife of Peirce Gavestone, and now of Hugh Spencer the younger, a Lady always unfortunate by the overgreat Favour of her Husband) departed towards the West, hoping to find as great assistance now as he had done before against the Barons; but he found the Case alter'd, and no Man regarded him, nor would be hired to fight for him. The Queen having an account of the King's Course and Design, marches after him (growing every Day stronger as she went on) and comes to Oxford, where the Bishop of Hereford preach'd before her, and the whole Assembly and University, taking for his Text, (2 Kings 4. 19.) My Head aketh, my Head aketh; from which he took occasion to deliver the Causes of the Queen's proceedings against her Husband, and concluded at last, most unlike a good Divine, That an aking and sick Head of a Kingdom is of necessity to be taken off, and not otherwise to be cured. A most execrable Doctrine, as repugnant to that sacred Word, which in all corrupted Times is produced by wicked Temporalists, to abuse Men's Credulities, and justify the Impieties of ambitious and ill Men. And to countenance the Queen's proceedings the more, it was noised abroad, That two Cardinals were seen in her Camp, sent by the Pope to excommunicate all such as took up Arms against her, who fought nothing by appearing in Arms, but to deliver the King and Kingdom from the Spencers, who were the Misleaders of the King, and Destroyers of the Kingdom, and their Adherents, the Lord Chancellors and others; all other of the King's Subjects to be safe. And that she might satisfy all Persons, she put out a Proclamation, 'That nothing should be taken from any Subject without paying ready Money, and a severe Penalty imposed upon any one that should dare to do the contrary; as, for the value of Three-pence to lose a Finger; of Six-pence, an Hand; of a Shilling, the Head; and whosoever brought to the Queen the younger Spencer's Head should have two thousand Pound. Thus was a bad Cause cover'd with a shew of Justice, and the unnatural Opposition of a Wife against an Husband, and a Son against his Father, made plausible and seemingly just by Power; which, tho' in factious Times it passed well enough, hath left an indelible Mark of Ignominy and Disgrace upon her Memory for ever.

The miserable King having his Reputation (which is the main support of Majesty) lamentably torn in pieces by his Pursuers, found few or no Hands to assist him; so that after he had put Hugh Spencer the Father into the Castle of Bristol, with such Forces as he was able to provide for the defence of it, he leaves the Nation to his Trust, and commits himself to the Sea, with a design either to conceal himself awhile in the Isle of Lundy, or pass over into Ireland; but being opposed by contrary Winds, and deserted by those few Attendants he had with him, viz. Sir Thomas Blunt, his Steward, and others, he was driven a-shoar in Wales in Glamorganshire, where, tho' he found not Protection, he met with Love, and was hidden in the Abby of Nerb. The Queen in the mean time goes with her Army from Oxford to Glocester, where the Lords Peirce and Wake met her with Aids from the North; and from thence she marched to Bristol, assaults and wins the Castle, and puts to Death the Defender, Hugh Spencer, without Form or Tryal of Law, causing him to be drawn and hang'd on the common Gallows in his Coat-Armour, cut up before he was dead, headed and quarter'd. This done, she passes to Hereford, and the King being not to be found, a Proclamation was put out, 'That if he would come and govern the Nation, as he ought to do, he should again be accepted as King with a general Consent. But the King, either not daring to trust himself to them, or not having sufficient Information, still concealed himself; and thereupon they took the advantage to dispose of the Government, and the Prince, who was now under their Care and Management, was made Guardian of the Kingdom, hath Fealty sworn to him, and a new Chancellor and Treasurer are appointed. But the King was too great to be concealed long; and being discover'd, was by Henry Earl of Lancaster, Brother to the late Thomas, William Lord Zouch, and Ries ap Howell, taken

A. D. 1326. and convey'd to the Castle of Kenelworth. The younger Spencer, with Baldocke the Chancellor, Reg. 19. and Simon Reading, who were apprehended with him, were sent to the Queen to Hereford. Spencer, who was at this time Earl of Glocester, is drawn and hang'd on a Gallows fifty Foot high, in his Coat-Armour, on which it was written, Quid gloriaris in Militia, Pl. 52. Simon Reading was hang'd ten Foot lower than he. But Baldocke, because he was a Priest, had the Favour to be pined to Death in Newgate<sup>a</sup>. And here likewise a little before was the Earl of Arundell, with two Barons, John Dymyll and Thomas Micheldene<sup>c</sup> executed as Traitors<sup>d</sup>, by the procurement of Roger Mortimer, for adhering to the King's Party. And that the Mob may not fail to act its part in every Rebellion, the Commons of London rise, and force their Mayor, who held his Loyalty, to joyn with them to let out all Prisoners, possess themselves of the Tower, put to Death the Constable of it Sir John Weston, and murder'd the Bishop of Exeter, whom they hated, because when he was the King's Treasurer he caused the Justices Itinerant to sit in London, who laid heavy Fines upon them. And thus all things were in Confusion.

1327. After a Month's stay at Hereford, the Queen return'd with the Prince, and kept her Christmas at Wallingford, and her Candlemas at London, where the Parliament being assembled, agreed to depose the King as unfit to govern, objecting many Articles against him, and to elect his eldest Son Edward, which they did in the great Hall at Westminster, with the universal Consent of the People there present; and the Archbishop of Canterbury made a Sermon upon this Text, Vox Populi, Vox Dei<sup>e</sup>, exhorting the People to pray to the King of Kings for him that they had chosen. The Queen seeing what was done, began now seriously to reflect upon her self, and her own Actions, which were the cause of it; and either out of remorse of Conscience, or trouble for the loss of her own Dignity, shewed great discontent at this Election, insomuch that her Son to comfort her was forced to swear, That he would not accept of the Crown without the consent of his Father. This Resolution of the Prince produced a common Decree in Parliament, 'That three Bishops, two Earls, two Abbots, four Barons, three Knights of every Shire, with a certain number of Burgeses of every City and Borough, and especially of the Cinque-ports, should be sent to the King at Kenelworth, to declare unto him the Election of his Son, and to require of him the Renunciation of his Crown and Royal Dignity; whereunto, if he refused to consent, the State were resolved to proceed as they thought fit, and renouncing his Children, choose whom they pleased. The King being first privately acquainted with the Message, which was one of the most ungrateful that could be sent to any Prince, was after by two, whom he chiefly hated, the Bishops of Hereford and Lincoln, brought before the Assembly. When they had deliver'd their Message<sup>h</sup> he said to them (as soon as his Passion would give him leave) 'He confessed that he had been misguided (the common Excuse of a poor Spirit) and done many things, of which he now repented; and which, if he were to govern again, he would amend; and was very sorry to have so much offended the State, as they utterly should reject him: But yet thanked them, that they were so favourable to him as to choose his eldest Son for King. Having said this, they proceeded to the Ceremony of his Resignation, which consisted chiefly in the surrendering his Crown, and other Ensigns of Majesty, to the Use of his Son. The Form was perfectly new, because it was the first that ever was known in England, and therefore could have no Precedent. But William Trussell, a Judge, put it into the Stile of the Law, to render it more Authentical, and pronounced the same in this manner: 'I William Trussell, in the Name of the Men of the Land of England, and of all the Parliament, Procurator, resign to thee Edward the Homage that was made to thee some time since; and from this time forward now following, I desie thee, and prive thee of all thy Royal Power; and I shall never be tendant on thee, as King, from this time. Thus was the last Act, and first Example of a deposed King, no less dishonourable to the Nation, than unto him. He was a Prince more weak than Evil. His Faults in Government were many, but not so many as those of his People to him, in dealing so roughly and uncivilly with him. He is reported by some to have been Learned (which perhaps might make him the softer) and written Verses when he was in Prison. He is said to have been the Founder of Oriel-College and S. Mary-Hall in Oxford.

He had by his Wife Isabel two Sons; Edward, His Issue, born at Windsor, who succeeded; and John, surnam'd of Eltham, who was created Earl of Cornwall, 1315. and dy'd in the Flower of his Age in Scotland: And two Daughters, Joanna marry'd to David Prince of Scotland, and Eleanor to the Duke of Gelders.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Edward II.

SOME time before Christmas, in the 9th Year of his Reign, a Blazing-Star or Comet appear'd in the North, was seen for a Month together, and was the Forerunner of a Famine and a Mortality. The Dearth was occasion'd by prodigious Rains in the Summer, which hinder'd the People's getting in their Corn; and what was got in yielded very little. Wheat was sold for forty Shillings a Quarter, as much as eight Pound now; and a Murrain destroy'd the Cattel.

<sup>b</sup> Thomas of Walsingham in his Chronicle relates, That Baldocke the King's Chancellor was committed first to the Bishop of London's Prison, from whence he was pull'd out by the common People of London to be carry'd to Newgate; but they beat him so cruelly by the way, that he dy'd of his Bruises in great Torment.

<sup>g</sup> John de Stratford Bishop of Winchester, Adam de Orleton Bishop of Hereford, and Henry Burwash: The Bishop of Winchester favour'd the King's Right; but the other two were his bitter Enemies, yet they were sent first to the King, partly to persuade, and partly to terrifie him. Sir Thomas de la More in his History writes, That the Bishop of Winchester and the Bishop of Lincoln were the two Bishops that were sent before to the King, to bring him to it.

<sup>h</sup> He fell into a Swoon, and had fall'n to the Ground, had he not been supported by the Earl of Lancaster, and the Bishop of Winchester.

The next Year the Famine continuing, the Poor were forced to eat Horse-flesh, Dogs and Cats; and there was not sufficient, even of that vile Food, to keep them alive. Wheat was sold for near 3*l.* a Quarter, and the Mortality rag'd as violently as in the Year preceding. Holinshed.

In his 12th Year on the 14th of November, the greatest Earthquake happen'd that had been known in England, to the unspeakable Terrour of Men, Women and Children.

In his 20th Year the Bishop of Exeter, Walter de Stapleton, Founder of Exeter College and Hart Hall in Oxford, was kill'd in an Insurrection of the People at London. He was a Minister of State in Edward II's Reign, and sided with the Courtiers.

The Barons of greatest Fame in his Reign were

Thomas Plantagenet Earl of Lancaster, Humphry de Bobun, Earl of Hereford and Essex, the Lords Audley, Mowbray, Clifford and Teis, who all dy'd in defence of the Liberties of the People; Roger Mortimer, and Edmund Earl of Kent, the King's Uncle, great Captains.

In his Time flourish'd several Men of Letters, as

John Duns, surnam'd Scotus, the Schoolman, Nicholas de Lyra an English Convert Jew, who wrote several Treatises against the Rabbins; William Ockham, who wrote against John Duns and against the Pope, in behalf of the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria; Robert Perscrutator a Yorkshire Man, suppos'd to be a Magician. Robert Bafton a Carmelite Fryar of Scarborough, whom King Edward took with him into Scotland to write his History of that War, but the Success of it fav'd Bafton the Trouble; Ralph Baldock Bishop of London, Sir Thomas de la More, and Thomas Haselwood, a Canon of Leeds in Kent, who wrote Chronicon Compendiarium, Historians. Robert Walsingham a Carmelite Fryar, John Wilton an Augustine Fryar, Walter Winterborne, Ralph Locksly, Nic. Stanford, William Whitby, Thomas Joice, Walter Joice, William Gainsborough, John Horringer of Suffolk, Robert Blitton a Carmelite Fryar of Lincolnshire, John of Bromham a Carmelite Fryar, Dr. Thomas Chabham a Canon of Salisbury, Robert of Plympton a regular Canon in Devonshire, Thomas Castleford a Monk of Pomfret, William Mansfield, John Canon, Robert Grime, William Askettle of Beverly, Jeffrey of Cornwall, John Gattfden, Theobald Anglicus, Steph. Eiton, John Goldston, John Winchelsey, Ralph Aston a notable Divine, John Dumbleton a Logician, Thomas Langford of Malden the same, Osbert Pickenham a Carmelite Fryar of Linne in Norfolk, Richard Wallingford, Robert Carew, Richard Belgrave a Carmelite Fryar, and Fryar Brinkly.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF EDWARD III.

Edward the third King of England, by his Father's Resignation crowned.

EDWARD III. being thus made King by the Resignation of his Father Edward II. the late King, began his Reign Jan. 20. 1327. being about fourteen Years of Age, and immediately sends out his Proclamations for the Preservation of the Peace into all Counties, in this Form; 'Edward by the Grace of God, King of England, Lord of Ireland, and Duke of Aquitain, To N. N. our Sheriff of S. greeting. Whereas the Lord Edward, the late King of England, our Father, by the Common Council and Assent of the Prelates, Earls, Barons, and other chief Men, with the whole Commonalty of this Realm, did voluntarily amove himself from the Government thereof, willing and granting that we his Eldest Son and Heir should assume the Government of the same, &c. A Preamble intended to palliate the Wrong done to his Father, but indeed making it more apparent. Five days after he was crown'd at Westminster, by Walter Archbishop of Canterbury; but the Queen seem'd much troubled and grieved at it, till she was pacified soon after by a great Enlargement of her Joynture, the King settling upon her three parts of his Revenue. The Management of the Kingdom was the next thing to be consider'd, which was put into the hands of twelve of the most able, and grave Statesmen during the King's Minority, till he should be of Age to govern it himself; which were the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Bishops of Hereford, Winchester, and Worcester, Thomas Brotherton Earl Marshal, Edmund Earl of Kent, John Earl Warren, Thomas Lord Wake, Henry Lord Peirce, Oliver Lord Ingham, and John Lord Rosse. But the Queen and Mortimer usurped their Charge, and left them nothing but a Name of Governours. And the first thing that was acted by this new King by their Advice, was an Expedition into

A. D. 1327. Scotland, undertaken not only to recover the Honour of the Nation, but to keep Mens Minds busy at present, and uphold the Change; and hither not only a considerable Body of English are sent, but all the Strangers which were brought over with the Queen under the Conduct of the Lord John Beaumont, the Earl of Henault's Brother, and at York the whole Army met, where the English (being not all of a Party) quarrel with the foreign Aids, and so great a Contest rose between them, that some Blood was spilt, and it was very hardly appeased. At Stanbope Park the English came to an Engagement with the Scots, and tho' the English were treble the number, and might easily have conquer'd them; yet through the Treason of some great Men (as it was reported) they all escap'd, and nothing remarkable was done, and so the young King, who was born for Victories, was deprived of the Honour of this his first Action; which being undertaken by others Advice, was not so dishonourable unto him as it was to others. However, upon his return, all the Henoways and Stipendiary Soldiers were sent home.

The deposed King kept Prisoner under severe Keepers.

During this Expedition, the deposed King remained a Prisoner at Kenelworth, under an Allowance of an hundred Marks a Month for his Expences, and depriv'd of all the Comforts the World should yield him. His Wife, whom he loved greatly (tho' now the Author of all his Misery) sends him fine Cloaths, and kind Letters, but deny'd him her Presence (tho' it was often desir'd by the King by Letters) upon a Pretence, that she was not allow'd to come to him by the State. But after the King's return, he was removed, because he was not thought safe enough, nor look'd so strictly to as he ought, being in Custody of his Uncle<sup>a</sup> the Earl of Lancaster, and<sup>b</sup> was committed to more faithful Keepers, two Men of the most rough Natures that could be found, the Lord Matrevers<sup>c</sup> and Sir Thomas Gourney the Elder; who immediately remov'd him from thence, and put him into the Castle of Barkley in Glocestershire, where he stay'd not long, but he was removed to Corfe Castle, and from thence from one place to another to disappoint his Friends; who, they fear'd, were laying of Plots to<sup>d</sup> restore him, till at last they brought him in a Disguise, having thorn his Head with cold Water<sup>e</sup> in the open Fields, while he sat upon a Mole-hill, to Barkley Castle again; where shortly after, Gourney and

The deposed King murder'd.

Matrevers caused him to be murder'd in a most barbarous manner, by thrusting up an hot Iron into his Bowels through an hollow Instrument put up into his Fundament, by which means no outward Sign appear'd to discover his Death; for his Body being afterwards laid forth to be viewed by many substantial Citizens of Glocester<sup>f</sup> (who were summon'd for that purpose) they could find no sign either of Wound or Poison; so that A. D. they concluded that he dy'd of Grief, as was reported. Thus dy'd Edward II. within eight Months after he was deposed, and was buried in the Abby Church of the Benedictines at Glocester. The Actors of this cruel Deed, Gourney and Matrevers, tho' they had a Commission from the Queen to do as they did; yet she being asham'd to own it, they dare not undergo the Tryal, but presently fled their Country. Gourney three Years after was taken at Marseilles, but was murder'd in his Passage into England, that he might not discover who set him a-work, and Matrevers lurk'd a long time in Germany. But this Deed cost more Trouble and Blood afterwards; for the Judgments of God fell heavily, not only upon the Contrivers of this Wickedness, but upon the whole Kingdom in general, and the King's Posterity and Nobilities and Children in particular; as the many bloody Scaffolds, infinite Slaughters, and civil Wars of the Nation in after Ages, will plainly prove, tho' for the present the Authors of it, the Queen and Mortimer lately created Earl of March, prosper'd and govern'd all to the no small Dissatisfaction of the Nation, which brought forth new Factions, according to the Nature of those turbulent Times.

God's Judgments upon the Murderers and Contrivers of his Death.

The King's Marriage with Philippa of Henault was now solemniz'd; and a Parliament is held at Northampton, at which a dishonourable Peace is concluded with the Scots, and confirm'd by a Match between David Bruce Prince of Scotland, Son of Robert Bruce, the present King, and Joanna Sister to the King of England; which Match, by reason of the tender Age of the Prince, could promise but little good to the Nation. Besides, by the secret Contrivance of the Queen Mother, Roger Mortimer<sup>g</sup>, lately made Earl of March, and Sir James Douglass,<sup>h</sup> The King surrenders by his Charter his Title and Sovereignty to the Kingdom of Scotland, restores many Deeds and other Instruments of their former Homage and Fealty, with the famous Evidence call'd the Ragman Roll, and many ancient Jewels and Monuments; among which, was one of great Value, call'd the Black Cross of Scotland, &c. and besides, all Englishmen were not permitted to hold any Lands in Scotland, unless they would dwell there. In Consideration of which Grants, King Bruce was to pay the King thirty thousand Marks. Shortly after a Parliament was held at Winchester, where Edmund Earl of Kent, Brother to the late deposed King, is accus'd and condemn'd by his own Confession, for endeavouring to restore his Brother, and conferring with divers great Men concerning the same, without any Matter of Fact<sup>i</sup>. This miserable Earl stood on the Scaffold from one till five a Clock in the Afternoon, and no Man would execute him; but at length, a silly Wretch of the King, Edmund Earl of Kent beheaded for endeavouring to restore his Brother the deposed King.

<sup>a</sup> He was not his Uncle, but his Cousin being Brother of Thomas and Son of Edmund Earl of Lancaster, who was his Uncle.

<sup>d</sup> King Edward had many Friends, who wish'd at least, if they did not endeavour, to restore him to his Crown. The whole Order of the Friars-Precursors zealously maintain'd his Right, and are said to have contriv'd his Restoration; which to avoid, the Queen and Mortimer are reported to have sent private Orders to his barbarous Keepers to dispatch him: But tho' they spared no other ill Usage, yet they were a little startled at this, and sent to the Bishop of Hereford, a fir Casuist, who was, it's thought, the Adviser of it, to know whether it were lawful. The Bishop willing to further it, but not to seem so, sent them this Answer. To kill King Edward you need not to fear it is good; which Answer, by putting a Comma in different Places, is a Plea for himself, and Encouragement to them, but the latter is most obvious, and no doubt he design'd it.

<sup>f</sup> The Prior of Bristol and Abbot of Glocester were summon'd to view the Body.

<sup>g</sup> He was made Earl of March in the Parliament held at Salisbury in August 1328. and that at Northampton, where the shameful Peace was concluded with the Scots, was holden in the March before.

<sup>h</sup> The Ragman-Roll was a Security and Memorial of the Fealty and Homage, which the Scots ought to pay to the Kings of England.

<sup>k</sup> This Earl's Son Edmund petition'd the King in the next Parliament, That the Judgment against his Father might be revers'd, for that his Father had been falsly accus'd by Roger Mortimer, Sir John Matrevers, and their Accomplishers, and made to believe that King Edward was alive after he was murder'd. It is said, that accordingly the Earl caus'd a Plea for his Delivery out of Corfe Castle, where the Traytors who had deceiv'd him pretended he was still confin'd.

A. D. 1328. Marhalsea cut off his Head*. But these Courses in a new Alteration could not last long without producing another. Wherefore a Parliament being call'd at Nottingham, the Queen and Mortimer, who had long bore the blame of every thing done amiss in the Government, were stripped of all their Power and Glory; the Queen hath her great Joynture taken from her, and is put to a Pension of a thousand Pound a Year. Mortimer is accused 'to have procured the late King's Death, 'to have been a means of the Scots escape at Stanhope-Park, for which he had a Bribe of twenty thousand Pound; to have procured the late Marriage and Peace with Scotland, which was so dishonourable to the King and Kingdom; to have consumed the King's Treasure, besides all that was taken from the Spencers; to have been too familiar with the Queen, &c. And for these heinous Offences he is condemned of High-Treason, sent up to London, drawn and hang'd at the common Gallows at the Elms, now called Tyburn; there his Body remained two Days a Spectacle of Disgrace to all Beholders. And thus was the Cruelty and Ambition of Mortimer justly rewarded, and an Example of Terror given to the other Ministers about the King, who being now come to Age, wanted nothing but faithful Ministers to direct him in such Courses as might be most honourable for himself and the Kingdom, being of a Spirit able and bold enough to go thro' with any brave Actions, of which he had variety that offer'd themselves.

Mortimer hang'd at Tyburn.

And first a new King of France lately crown'd upon the Death of Charles the Fair, lately deceased without Issue-male, requires his Homage for the Duchy of Guien, and other Lands, held of the Crown of France, according to the Custom; to which, tho' King Edward was supposed to have the better Right, yet because Philip de Valois was now in Possession of the same, and himself young, and his own Kingdom factious, turbulent and unsettled, he was not able to debate his Title otherwise than by Law (which seldom gets a Crown) and therefore willing to yield to Necessity, he went over in person into France to perform this Ceremony, which did much prejudice his Claim afterwards, and took from the Justice of his Cause; because by this Act he seem'd to acknowledge the Right of his Competitor. The Case of these Princes stood thus: Philip the Fair, the Father of Isabel King Edward's Mother, had three Sons; Lewis, Philip, and Charles, who were all successively Kings of France, and dy'd without Male-issue; for tho' Lewis the eldest Son had a Daughter, whom Endes Earl of Bologne would have brought to the Crown, yet because it was judged to be contrary to the Salick Law for a Woman to succeed, Philip the next Brother was received for King, who also leaving only four Daughters, Charles succeeded by the same Law without any opposition. Charles dying, left his Wife new with Child, and so the Kingdom to be under a Regency till it could be known whether it were a Son. Philip de Valois, the first Prince of the Blood, Son of Charles de Valois, the Brother of Philip the Fair, claimed the Regency as belonging to him; but Edward King of England put in for it as his Right, being a nearer Relation to the deceased Kings; but the Regency was entrusted to Philip, because he descended from a Brother more capable of the Crown than a Daughter, of which Edward was descended.

King Edward's Title to the Crown of France.

And thus things remained till the Queen was deliver'd, which happen'd to be a Daughter; and Philip was received and crowned King of France by the Salick Law, maintain'd to be inviolable. Robert de Artois, a Peer of great Power, was a principal means of his Preferment, and the Exclusion of Edward. Shortly after this Settlement of the French Crown, Edward was summon'd to pay his Homage, and accordingly met King Philip at Amiens, where two Points were chiefly debated by the Council of both Kings. 1. Concerning the Quality of the Homage pretended to be due by the Council of King Philip, but deny'd by King Edward's. 2. About the Lands in Guien, which the last King Charles had detained from Edward, of which his Council required Restitution, as belonging to his Duchy. The Resolution of this last Point was easie, because of the Treaty made between the said King Charles and Edward the Second the last of May, 1325. wherein their Rights were secured by mutual Protestations, and Homage received, and paid to the said King Charles by the said Edward before he was King; which Protestations were repeated, and agreed to be followed in this, with a Covenant, That if King Edward would pursue his Right in Parliament, he should have Justice done him for the things in Controversie. But as for the Point concerning the Quality of his Homage, it was agreed in general, That it should be done and received according to the usual manner of the former Kings; and a sufficient time was granted to King Edward, to enquire of it, and make Declaration of it; which being done, King Edward upon the 6th of June, 1329. in a Crimson Velvet Gown, embroider'd with Leopards, with his Crown on his Head, his Sword by his Side, and Golden Spurs on his Heels, presents himself in the body of the Cathedral Church at Amiens before King Philip, sitting in a Chair of State in a Velvet Gown of Violet-Colour embroider'd with Flower-de-luces of Gold, his Crown on his Head, and his Scepter in his Hand, with all his Princes and Peers about him. Then the Viscount Melun Chamberlain of France first orders King Edward to put off his Crown, his Sword, and his Spurs, and kneel down, which he did on a Crimson Velvet Cushion before King Philip; and then the Viscount putting both his Hands together between the Hands of the King of France, pronounced the Words of the Homage, which were these: 'You shall become Liegeman to the King my Master here present, as Duke of Guien and Peer of France, and you promise to bear Faith and Loyalty to him. Say Tes; and King Edward said Tes, and kissed the King of France, as Lord of the Fee, on the Mouth. The like Homage he did for the Earldom of Ponthieu. This Act of Submission, tho' condescended to by the King at that Juncture, yet he took himself wronged by Philip in exacting it so punctually of him, and was thereby so highly provoked and angred, that he resolv'd upon a Revenge, which he so severely performed afterward, as not only Philip himself, but all Christendom wished the Ceremony had been spared.

The Ceremony of paying Homage.

At King Edward's return home, he met with a Diversion from his Designs upon France by an occasion of the Alteration of Affairs in Scotland. The late Peace concluded with them was held so dishonourable by the King, that it was no ways convenient to keep it: However, that he

The French King invited the Kings of Bohemia and Navarre to be present at this Solemnity.

A. D. 1331. might not seem to break it<sup>a</sup> he took the opportunity of their Differences to set it aside after Reg. 5. this manner: The Minority of the present King (which is the misery of Kingdoms) being attended with the Emulations and Factions of the great Men, encouraged Edward Baliol, Son of John Baliol, (some time King of Scotland) thirty two Years after his Father's Deposition, to attempt the Recovery of that Crown; and accordingly by the Solicitation of his Friends he comes out of France, where he had all that while remained, into England, where he was permitted underhand to get Aid; which all those Scots and English, which were of a Faction contrary to Bruce readily offer'd him, and with them he suddenly assaults the Governours of the Kingdom in the Nonage of the young King David (who was at that time with the King of France) and overcame them in a Battel, wherein many Noblemen, and thousands of the Common-people were slain, and thereupon was immediately crown'd King of Scotland at Scone. But his Party not being so strong as to maintain what he had gotten, or defend him in the Possession of it against those that oppos'd him, he was forced, notwithstanding his first Victory, to return again into England to get more assistance of King Edward, who now shews himself in the Quarrel, joyns with Baliol against his Brother-in-law King David, and goes in Person with a strong Army to recover Berwick, which after three Months Siege, being valiantly defended by the Lord Seton, was again taken, and the whole Army of Scots, which came to relieve it at Hallidown-Hill, utterly defeated and routed, with the slaughter of seven Earls, nine hundred Knights and Baronets, four hundred Squires, and about thirty two thousand common Soldiers, as our Writers report, but theirs say but fourteen thousand<sup>b</sup>; and thus was Baliol brought through a torrent of Blood to the Crown of Scotland again. In the Siege of Berwick one memorable Action of the Lord Seton is not to be pass'd over, related by the Scotch Writers, which is this: When the Lord Seton saw that the Relief he expected failed, and the Assaults of the Enemies were very violent, so that he could not hold out, he conditioned with King Edward, That if he had not Relief by such a time<sup>c</sup> he would surrender the Town to him, and for the assurance of this Promise delivers him two of his Sons. King Edward soon after having notice of the approach of the Scotch Army, that it was greater, and came with more speed than was expected, and would be there before the Day, summons the Lord Seton to render the Town presently, otherwise he would execute his two Sons before his Face; and withal a Gallows is prepared within sight of the Town, and the young Gentlemen brought forth and put under the Executioner's Hands. The Lord seeing this, was doubtful what to do, being distracted between Love and Duty, till his Wife, the Mother of those Sons, and a Lady of masculine Courage, comes to him and exhorts him 'to remember his Allegiance sworn to the King, the Reg. 5. Love he owes to his Country, and the Dignity of his noble Family; that they had other Children left, if these were destroy'd, and themselves not so old, but that they might have more; That if they should be preserved from Death now, they might perish otherwise soon upon a worse occasion; That it would be an eternal Blemish upon his Name to yield up a Place committed to his Charge, and yet it is uncertain whether he could preserve his Children's Lives by it; for how could he trust that King who had broken his Promise already, and therefore besought him not to prefer an uncertain and momentary Advantage before a certain and perpetual Ignominy. And so having recover'd his Resolution to hold it out, she withdrew him from the Walls of the Town, that he might not see the Sufferings of his innocent Children.

The next Year after this Battel at Hallidown-Hill Edmund Baliol King of Scots did Homage to the King of England<sup>1332.</sup>, as his superiour Lord, at New-Castle, and took his Oath of Fealty, binding himself and his Heirs to hold that Kingdom of him and his Successors for ever, with the Inheritance of five Countries next adjoining to the Borders. So large a part of his Kingdom was he willing to part with, rather than be in danger of losing the whole; which yet was so far from securing his peaceable Enjoyment of it, that it rather embroiled the whole, by reason of the Discontent which most of the Nobility of Scotland took at this Act of Alienation of their Country; so that it created both Princes much Trouble, and cost a great Expence of Treasure to keep what they had gotten. The King of England had a fifteenth of their Laity, a twelfth of the Cities and Boroughs, and a tenth of the Clergy, in a Parliament held at London, granted to him for these Wars; and three Years together he went in Person with his Army into those parts, and never returned without so great Destruction and Bloodshed, that it is admirable how such a small Country could find so many Men to maintain their Quarrel, and fight for such barren Deserts. But Edward prosecuted the Business of Scotland, not meerly to be Master of it, but so to settle it as that it might not be an hindrance to his greater Designs upon France, which he chiefly intended, and was the sooner put upon by the Instigation of Robert de Artoys, who being driven out of the Kingdom by King Philip his Brother-in-law, came over into England, and was here entertain'd with great Honour. This Robert was a Prince of the Blood Royal of France, being descended of Robert the Son of Lewis VIII. Brother of S. Lewis. He had long Contention with Maud his Aunt, Countess of Burgogne, about the Earldom of Artois, and <sup>a</sup> King Edward also requir'd Homage of the young King David, but was refus'd; which gave him a just ground for this Expedition, when fit occasion offer'd, as it did in Baliol's Cause.

<sup>b</sup> This Battel, according to Henry de Knighton, was fought on the 19th of July, 1333. and all the Scotch Historians place it under the same Year.

<sup>c</sup> This Story is taken out of Hector Boethius, a Scotch Historian, but a Writer of no very good Credit, and seems design'd not so much to honour the Name of the Lord Seton, as to blacken the Memory of this great Prince Edward III. for which Reasons 'tis rejected as a Calumny against the King by our English Writers of Judgment.

<sup>d</sup> By two Manuscripts the Chronicle of Lanercost in the Cotton Library, and Scala Chronicon a French Manuscript in Bennet- College Library in Cambridge, it appears, that after the fifteen Days Truce made with Alexander Seton was expir'd, the King summon'd the Town; Seton answer'd, He did not yet doubt of Relief, and did not think himself oblig'd to surrender it. The King reply'd, That no Relief being come, he expelled the performance of the Treaty. The Governour prevaricating with him, he order'd one of his Sons, and not both to be hang'd (by the Advice of his Council) and upon this the Garrison and Townsmen came to new terms, to have the Truce prolong'd for eight Days; in which time, if they were not reliev'd, they would yield up the Town. Which accordingly they did; and the Scotch Historians own, that Seton himself was compell'd to side with King Edward; which 'tis not probable he would have done by any Compulsion, had he us'd him so barbarously, and contrary to Articles. But those Authors are not very famous for Veracity, especially where the Cause of their own Country is concern'd.

A. D. 1336. Reg. 10. presuming upon his own Power, his Alliance with King Philip, who marry'd his Sister, and the Service he had done in advancing him to the Crown, counterfeited a Deed to overthrow his Aunt's Right; which being discover'd, made his Cause the worse, and moved the French King to give Judgment for her; and so the County of Artois was by Arrest of Parliament confirmed to her. This so offended Robert, that in his Passion he said openly, That he would unmake the King by the same Power he made him; which rash and bold Threat, spoken before many Witnesses, so incensed the French King, that he laid wait to apprehend him; but failing in that, he proclaimed him Traitor, confiscated his Estate, forbid all his Subjects, both within and without his Kingdom, to receive, comfort, or aid him, upon pain of Confiscation of all their Goods; and charged them all to seize his Person, and send him Prisoner to him. Whereupon this Prince finding no place in France safe for his abode, comes over into England, where he is joyfully entertain'd by King Edward, made one of his Council, and invested in the Earldom of Richmond; which Favours, that he might recompence, he set on foot a War with France, which lasted above an hundred Years, discovers the Councils of France, by which Philip had been advanced to the Crown, disapproves his Title, and prefers Edward's as most just. Upon which a Declaration was published, and sent to the Pope, and all the neighbouring Princes, shewing the Usurpation of Philip de Valois upon the Crown of France. King Edward, who ever since his return from Amiens had been making Preparations against the King of France, and by the assistance of his Father-in-law, William Earl of Henault, had drawn into a Confederacy with him the Dukes of Brabant and Geldres, the Earl of Juliers, Archbishop of Cologne, and Valeran his Brother, John of Henault, and other Princes of Germany, doth now strengthen his Interests farther, and by Gifts obtain'd of Lewis of Bavaria, the present Emperor, to be Vicar General of the Empire, by which Office he might require all the Princes that confined upon France to serve him. And this the Emperor did the more readily, because Edward had stood for him against Frederick of Austria, who was a Competitor with him for the Empire, and had marry'd his Wife's Sister. Then, by the means of one Jaques de Artois, a Citizen of Gaunt, who was a great Man, and a Leader of the Flemings in all their Tumults, he gained all the People of those Cities in Flanders, who maintain'd a kind of Liberty among themselves, and who were the more easily won, because their Wealth chiefly proceeded from the Wools of this Kingdom, which by a Parliament holden at London, in the 9th Year of the King's Reign, were forbidden to be transported unwrought, but Clothes should be made here; and to that end, liberty was allow'd to all such Artificers as would come over and make Cloaths here; no Man being allow'd to wear any thing but English Cloth, except the King, Queen, and their Children; nor any Man to wear any Facings of Silks or Furs, but such as could expend an hundred Pound per Annum. For by this Alliance they had not only a free admittance into the Kingdom; but had liberty of transporting Wools to uphold their former Trades; so that they advanced their own Interests, as well as the King's Strength. Edward having thus gotten a strong Party abroad, next seeks all ways to raise Money at home to carry on this Chargeable Expedition. The tenth Penny is granted of Towns and Boroughs, a fiftieth of others, and a tenth of the Clergy, is granted in a Parliament of Northampton. All the Treasure which had been committed to Churches throughout England for carrying on the Holy War, was taken out for the King's use. The next Year all the Goods of three Orders of Monks, viz. Lombards, Cluniacks, and Cistercians, were likewise seized into the King's Hands, and another Subsidy as before granted at Northampton. He likewise bestow'd many Honours upon Noblemen, to encourage them for this intended Action. Henry of Lancaster the younger was created Earl of Derby, William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, Hugh Audley Earl of Gloucester, William Clinton Earl of Huntingdon, William Bohun Earl of Northampton, Robert Ufford Earl of Suffolk, and Prince Edward Earl of Chester and Duke of Cornwall. In the twelfth Year of his Reign, at a Parliament at Northampton, (as some write in the absence of the King) he had granted him by the Laity one half of their Wools, and of the Clergy the whole was exacted, and they were forced to pay nine Marks for every Sack of fine Wool. The next Year after, a fifteenth was likewise paid in Wool by the Commonalty. And now for the better management of his Work abroad (having settled his Affairs in Scotland) he goes over into Flanders, takes with him his Queen and Children, and lies at Antwerp; where, by the Persuasion of the Flemings, he took upon him the Style, Title and Arms of the King of France, because they held they might the better justify their Actions in joyning with him, and dispence with their Oath made to the French King, never to bear Arms against him; and thereupon the League was made between them and King Edward.

The French King being sensible of Edward's Actions was not behind him in his Preparations and Confederacies, having engaged on his part the King of Bohemia, the Count Palatine of the Rhine*, (who had agreed to serve him against King Edward and his Adherents with three hundred Horse for fifty six thousand Florins.) The Bishop of Metz, Albert and Otto Dukes of Austria, Theodore Marquis of Montferat, Ame Earl of Geneva; besides many Princes of States, and divers great Captains of Germany, French Counts, Savoy, Dauphin, Spain, and other Countries. So that all the chief Kingdoms of the Christian World were either actually in Arms, or assisting in this Quarrel between these two mighty Kings. Long were they preparing before they came to engage, and much was endeavour'd by the Pope and King of Sicily, who being a great Astrologer foretold an ill Event of this Quarrel to the King of France, to have composed the Difference, but to no pur-

* The English had now plenty of Wool, but no Skill to employ it. Wherefore as by this Act encouragement was given to such as had Skill, but no Stocks, to come out of Flanders and settle here; so accordingly many, glad of this opportunity to advance their Fortunes, came into England, and sett'd in great Farmers Houses at first, and after remov'd into Towns; from whence several sort of Woollen Manufactures were made among us; as, at Sadbury, Bays; at Colchester, Says and Serges; in Kent, Broad-Cloths; in Devonshire, Kerfies; in Wales, Frizes; in Westmorland, Kendal-Cloth, &c.

* The Prince was born at Woodstock in the third Year of the King's Reign; he was call'd the Black Prince, not from his Colour, but Fierceness in Battle. In his ninth Year he was made Earl of Chester, and Duke of Cornwall.

* He also agreed with David King of Scots to send him a sufficient Aid to recover his Right; and accordingly sent him several Troops to defend his Garrisons, and annoy England, engaging him to make no Peace with the King of England without his consent.

A. D. 1340. pose. The War began on the Borders of each other's Dominions; King Edward sets upon Cambray, defended by the French; and Philip seizes on the Dutchy of Guien, sending Count Du Conestable of France, with the Earls of Foix and Arminiack, who surprized many strong places of it; besides he had a great Navy at Sea, which committed a much Spoil on the Coast of England. King Edward entred France by the way of Vermandois and Thierache, and approaches near to King Philip. Both Armies were encamped between Viron Fosse and La Flamenguerie, and the Day for the Fight was appointed on the Friday after; the Armies on both sides made ready, but the French had the advantage by Numbers. Both sides were well furnished with brave Men, but yet departed without a Battel: The French esteeming it no Discretion to put the Person and State of their King to the hazard of a Fight within his own Kingdom; and the English, consisting of less Numbers, thought not fit to assail them. And so they passed the Day in facing one another, and nothing was done. Only this Accident fell out, which proved a matter of Sport afterward: An Hare starting before the Head of the French Army, a great Shout was suddenly made, which they who were behind supposing to have been at the Onset of the Battel, disposed themselves to fight, and some Esquires for their more Encouragement were, according to the Custom, presently Knighted, which were ever after call'd The Knights of the Hare. The next Morning early both Kings decamped, and the French retired to Paris, and the King of England to Brabant.

K. Edward returns into England.

A Parliament at London.

King Edward having staid a little time at Brabant to settle his Confederates, and order his Affairs, leaves the Queen, and returns into England about Candlemas, after a Year's absence from thence, and lands at the Tower about Midnight, which finding unguarded, he was much displeased, and sends for the Mayor of London, whom he commanded to bring before him the Chancellor and Treasurer, with John S. Paul, Michael Watb, Philip Thorp, and Henry Stratford, Clerks, (who were Officers for his Receipts) and John Sconer Justice of the Bench; all which, except the Chancellor, were arrested and committed to Prison, as were also divers other Ministers of Justice and Accountants, upon Enquiry made into their unjust proceedings. Then he call'd a Parliament in London in Lent, which granted unto him for the Custom of every Sack of Wool 40 s. for every three hundred Wool-fells 40 s. for every Last of Leather 40 s. and so for other Merchandizes proportionably; which Imposition was to endure from that Easter to the Whitsuntide twelve-month after. Besides there was granted of Citizens and Burgeses a ninth part of their Goods, a fifteenth of foreign Merchants and others; and the ninth Sheaf, Fleece, and Lamb for two Years. Also another tenth of the Clergy. And for his present Supply he had Loans of divers wealthy Persons, and the City of London lent him twenty thousand Marks. In Consideration of which Grants and Contributions, the King (besides his Pardons to divers kinds of Offenders) remitted all Amercements for all Transgressions in his Forests, Reliefs and Scutage, unto the first time of his going into Flanders. Besides all Aids for the Marriages of his Sons and Daughters during his Reign, pardoning and remitting all ancient Debts and Arrerages, both of his Farmers and others, any ways due either in the time of his Ancestors or his own, till the tenth Year of his Reign, (excepting such as were compounded for, and order'd to be paid into his Exchequer) and now likewise he confirmed the Great Charter.

During King Edward's stay in England, William Montague Earl of Salisbury, and William Ufford Earl of Suffolk, who were left in Flanders to oppose the proceedings of the French, having performed several great Exploits with happy Success, and presuming upon their Fortune, were in an Encounter about Lisle so overmatch'd with Numbers, that they were both taken and sent Prisoners to Paris, to the great Joy of the French King, who now, to hinder the King of England's return, had prepared a mighty Navy in the Haven of Sluce, consisting of two hundred Sail of Ships (besides many Gallies) and two thousand arm'd Men in the Port, ready to encounter him upon his landing. King Edward being inform'd of it, provided a like Number of Ships well manned, and puts out to Sea upon Midsummer-Eve, being met the next Day with a Navy from the North-parts, under the Conduct of Sir Robert Morley. With these Forces he encounter'd the Enemy, which lay in the way to intercept him, with such Courage and Strength, and so great advantage of Wind and Weather, that he defeated their whole Navy, took and sunk all their Ships, slew thirty thousand Men, and landed with as great a Glory as such a Victory would yield, which being the first that the English ever got by Sea, was the more honourable to him. Most of the French, rather than endure the Arrows and sharp Swords of the English, leaped into the Sea. This Loss was so great, that the French dare not tell the King of it, and therefore set his Jester on work to discover it to him, who going into his Presence in a seeming Passion, cry'd out often, Cowardly Englishmen, Dastardly Englishmen, Faint-hearted Englishmen. The King at length asked him, Why he called them so? The Jester answer'd, Because they durst not leap out of their Ships into the Sea, as our brave Frenchmen did. By which the King apprehended the Overthrow of his Fleet, which the French attribute to one Nicholas Buchett, one of their Commanders, who had manned his Ships with Soldiers of the baser sort, who would serve for small pay, and refused Gentlemen, and sufficient Soldiers, in regard they required greater Wages, as it hath often happen'd, that the Avarice of Commanders hath been the Cause of great Defeats. But notwithstanding this Loss of the French by Sea, their King, in those Martial Times, was soon supply'd with Power sufficient out of his own and Confederates Dominions to make a strong Opposition against the victorious and mighty King of England, who suddenly sets down before Tourney with all his own and his Adherent's Forces. And from Chyn (a place near it, where he lodg'd) sends his Cartel, July 17. to Philip de Valois, lodging at S. Andrews Les Air, with his mighty Army, declaring, 'That he with the Strength of his own Kingdom, and Assistance of the Flemmings, was come to recover his Right in the Kingdom of France, unjustly detained from him, contrary to the Laws of God and Man; and since no other means could prevail, he was forced to fly to the Sword. But because the Controversie was between them two, he offer'd, that the shedding of Christian Blood, and Destruction of the Country might be spar'd, to try their Right by Combat in close Camp, Body to Body, or each of them accompany'd with a hundred choice Persons; which, if the said Philip refused, then to joyn Battel within ten Days after, before the City of Tournay.

A. D. 1340. Reg. 14. K. Edward challenge the French King to a single Combat.

Philip de Valois return'd an Answer to this Challenge, the last of July, in this manner: 'Philip by the Grace of God King of France, to Edward King of England. We have perused your Letters sent to the Court of Philip de Valois, containing certain Requests to the said Philip; but because it appears, that those Letters and Requests were not written or made unto us, we will in no sort answer you. But seeing by the said Letters, and otherwise, we understand, that you, guided by your own Will, without all Reason, have entred our Kingdom of France with an Army, and have done no small damage to our People and Country, contrary to the Duty of a Liege-man, who have lately sworn Homage to us, acknowledging us, as by Right, King of France, and hath promised that Obedience that is due from the Vassal to his Liege-lord; as is manifest by your Letters-Patents under your Great Seal, which we have with us, and you ought to have with you: Therefore our Intention is, as becomes our Honour, to chase you out of our Kingdom, as we firmly hope in Christ (from whom we have our Power) to do. Because by this War, which you have most wickedly begun, our intended Journey into the East is hinder'd, great numbers of Christians there murder'd, that Holy Service neglected, and the Church dishonoured. And whereas you say, You are assisted by the Flemmings; we assure our selves, that they will not so far forget their Honour and Fidelity to our Cousin their Earl, and us, their supreme Lord, as to act so much against the common Good. The French Historians write, that King Philip sent word to King Edward, by the Messengers of this Letter, 'That by his Cartel he ventur'd nothing of his own, but only expos'd another's Dominions, which was unreasonable; That if he would hazard the Kingdom of England (tho' it were less) against the Kingdom of France, King Philip would enter the Combat in close Camp with him, upon Condition, that the Conqueror should enjoy both Kingdoms: To which, they say, Edward would not consent. The single Combat being thus rejected by both sides, Edward went on with the Siege of Tournay, which held out three Months, so that nothing was effected but the Destruction of the Country. All Christendom impatiently expected the Event, and both Kingdoms were in doubt of the Consequences of it, till Jane de Valois, Sister of King Philip, and Widow of William Duke of Henault, the Father of Philippa the Wife of King Edward, undertook to negotiate a Peace between her Brother and Son; and leaving her Nunnery at Fontenelles, with indefatigable Industry travell'd so long from one to the other, till at last by her Advice and Treaty she obtained a Parley, which produced a Truce for a Year; so that these enraged Princes dismissed their Armies, and the French King return'd home, and Edward with his Queen into England, having remained three Years in those parts; in which time his Queen brought him two Sons, Lionel, afterwards

Duke of Clarence, and John born at Gaunt, first A. D. Earl of Richmond, and after Duke of Lancaster. 1341. But King Edward's Condescension to this sudden Reg. 15. Truce had really no other motive, but his want of Treasure; which, notwithstanding the great Impositions laid upon his Subjects, came short, and must be supply'd, as indeed it was, yet after some Delays, which thus happen'd: The King at his last being in England had removed his Chancellor, and imprison'd his Treasurer, with other Officers, who were most of them Clergymen, and still kept them under Confinement; which Severity, tho' just, yet so angered John Stratford, Archbishop of Canterbury, (on whom the King laid the Blame of his Wants) that he wrote a bold and sharp Letter to the King to this effect: 'That it was for the Safety and Happiness of Kings and their Kingdoms, to use wise and grave Counsellors favourably and kindly, alledging many Examples out of holy Scriptures to prove the flourishing Condition of such as took that course, and the Miseries of those that did the contrary. Then he advises him to call to mind, how his Father, being guided by evil Counsel, vexed the Nation, putting many of the Nobility to Death contrary to Law, and to consider what were the ill Consequences of such Actions; and that he himself at first, through the ill Conduct of such as managed his Affairs, had almost lost the Love of his People; but afterward, by the great Care and wise Management of his Nobles and Bishops, his Affairs were again brought in to such Order, as that he recover'd his Honour; and now remains in so great Credit with his People, that all, both Clergy and Laity, have yielded their assistance to him, more than any of his Royal Ancestors; by which means he hath triumphed over the French and Scots, and is reputed the noblest Prince in Christendom. But now, through the wicked advice of such as affect their own Advantage more than his Honour, or the Welfare of his People, he hath caused several Clergymen and others to be arrested, and kept in Prison by undue Proceedings, contrary to the Laws of England, which he was by his Coronation-Oath bound strictly to observe, and against Magna Charta, which whosoever shall presume to break, are to be excommunicated by all the Bishops, according to the Bull of Innocent IV. So that by these Actions he had brought no small Danger upon his Soul, and Damage to his State and Honour. Then he tells him, That if he went on in this manner, he would certainly lose the Hearts of his People, and their Help, so that he would not be able to carry on the War in hand, but expose himself to his Enemies, to the great hazard of his Person and Kingdom. And therefore advises him to call an Assembly of the Nobility, and prudentest Men of the Land, and consult with them (without whose Assistance and Counsel he could not govern the Kingdom well, nor go through with his present Designs) concerning what is amiss. And whereas, said he, some Persons about you, by their Flattery and Cunning, betray and deceive you, we do hereby pronounce them Excommunicate, and beseech you, as your Spiritual Father, to esteem and deal with them as such. Besides, he urges, that whereas through the Negligence and Falseness of some of his Ministers, the City of Tournay was not taken; the Matter might be examined in Parliament, and a diligent Enquiry made, into whose Hands, ever since the beginning of the War, the Wools and Monies raised Archbishop Stratford's Letter to the King.

A. D. 1341. have come, and how they have been bestow'd, and by whose fault it was that the City of Tower was not taken, but left in that manner it was; and that as a just Prince he would punish such as were found guilty, and not condemn or misuse his Subjects without a legal Tryal. This Letter bore Date January 1.

The Archbishop's Letter to the Chancellor R. Boufer; and a second Letter to the King and his Council.

Another Letter he wrote to Robert Boufer (or Bourchier) Chancellor of England, relating what Contributions the Clergy had given the King by their free consent, and that nothing more was to be exacted of them, requiring him 'to do nothing contrary to the Law of Magna Charta; and that if any Writ, Commillion or Precept, had gone out of the Chancery, contrary to it, or to the Privileges and Liberties of the Church and Kingdom, he should within ten Days after the Receipt of these his Letters (as he said the Chancellor was bound to do) recall, and make void the same. This Letter was dated January 28. After this he wrote a third Letter to the King and his whole Council, declaring, 'That whereas, contrary to the Liberties and Privileges of the Church and Kingdom, contained in Magna Charta, John de S. Paul, Michael de Wath, Robert Chickwill, John Thorp, and Henry Stratford, were arrested, committed to Prison, and there detained, without being indicted or convicted of any notorious Crime; and that whosoever by their Counsel had put the King upon such proceedings, had incurr'd the Sentence inflicted in the Canon, which he had caused to be published both in his own Dioceses, and those of his Suffragans. And therefore besought the King and his whole Council without delay to release the said Prisoners, otherwise he threatens, that according to his Pastoral Charge, he would proceed to the Execution of the Sentence; concluding, That it was not in his Intention in the least to include in it the King, Queen, or their Children, as far they could be excused. And for this end he sends to the Bishop of London, and all his other Suffragan Bishops, and having complained of the great Wrongs done to the Church by Laymen, charges him and them not only to publish in their Churches, but fix up in all eminent Places, the Sentence of Excommunication against all Offenders that should break those Articles of Magna Charta, which he annexed to his Letter, that (as he said) no Man may pretend Ignorance of their fault.

The King sends an Answer of the Archbishop's Letter to the Bishop of London.

The King being thus roused by the Archbishop's Letters, sends his Apology immediately to the Bishop of London, in a Letter to him; wherein, having declared first how much he had honoured and trusted the Archbishop, he accuses him of unjust and deceitful Dealing in his Trust, and says, 'That it was by his Counsel and Advice he undertook this Action against the French, and was assur'd by him, that he should not want sufficient Treasure to go through with it: So that he need do no more than provide Men to execute the Design; That notwithstanding this Promise, through the Negligence or Malice of the Archbishop and his Officials, those Supplies which were granted by his Subjects in Parliament, were so badly collected, and sent over so slowly, that he was forced (to his great Grief and Shame) to accept of the last Truce, and through his extreme Want to come into the hands of Usurers. These Actions gave him just cause to look into the management of his Officers, of whom he found some so guilty of Male-administration of Justice, and such Corruptions and Oppressions of his Subjects, that he removed the greatest of them from their Places; and the lesser, who were in the same

Crimes, he committed to Prison, and there detained them, that by strict Examination he might find out their unlawful Proceedings, of which none could give him so good Information as the Archbishop, to whom he had for a long time committed the whole Administration of the Kingdom. And therefore being desirous to confer with him at London about these public Affairs, he had sent a Messenger on purpose to him, his trusty Servant Nicolas de Cantelupe, to summon him thither. But the Archbishop had refused to come to him, alledging, That he stood in fear of some Persons about the King, and would not run the hazard of departing from his Church. That after this he sent Richard Stafford, with the Steward of his House, with a promise of safe Passage under his Seal; but then was answered, That he would have no Conference with the King but in open Parliament, which he knew could not at that time be conveniently called. Then he aggravates the Archbishop's undutiful Behaviour and false Dealings towards him; declaring, That tho' by God's Providence and an Hereditary Right he was advanced to the Throne of England, yet he abhorred all Abuses of his Regal Authority, and desired nothing more in this World than to govern his Subjects with such Mildness and Justice, as that he might more deserve their Love than Fear. That notwithstanding this his Care to govern well, the Archbishop had wrongfully (by his Letters published in divers parts of his Kingdom) injur'd his Innocency, and slander'd his most faithful Counsellors and Officers, who administered Justice, giving out, that the People were oppress'd, the Clergy ruin'd, and the Nation burthen'd with heavy Taxes; and many Exactions, which the King argues could be done with no other design, but to raise Sedition among his People, and to alienate the Hearts of his Subjects from him. Lastly, To shew the Archbishop's Failings, he declares, That he himself, while he was under Age, had by his Advice made so many prodigal Donations, unlawful Alienations, and excessive Gifts, that his Treasury was now utterly exhausted, and his Crown-Revenues mightily diminished; and that the Archbishop, being corrupted with Bribes, had remitted without any reasonable cause great Sums which were due to him, applying to his own use, or of others not well deserving of them, many Advantages and Revenues, which should have been preserved for his necessary support. And therefore concluded, That unless he desisted from his rebellious Obstinacy, he intended in due time and place to proceed against him; injoyning him to publish all and singular these his wicked Actions, and to cause others to do the like, for the more clear manifestation of his pious and princely Intention in relieving his own and his Subjects Wrongs. This Letter was said to be penned by Adam Bishop of Winchester, and bare Date the 12th of February, Anno Reg. 15. Thus the Difference between the King and his Officers, whose Actions must not be too sharply look'd into, was ended, and the grand Imputation rests upon the Archbishop, who is charg'd with the Receipt of great Sums, and vehemently urg'd by the King's Creditors to pay them. Shortly after this a Parliament was held at London, in which the King was hard put to it to satisfy their Demands; for he was earnestly petition'd by the whole Assembly of the three States, That the Great Charter of their Liberties, and the Charter of Forests might be duly observed, and that whosoever of the King's Officers did break the same should lose their

A. D. 1341. Reg. 15. their place; That the high Officers of the Kingdom should be elected, as they were in former times, by Parliament; but the King stood strongly upon his own Election and Prerogative, but yielded (that he might gain his Designs, as he confessed) that those Officers should take an Oath in Parliament to do Justice to all Men in their Offices; and a Statute was made for that purpose, and confirmed with the King's Seal, to secure that and many other Grants to his Subjects, which notwithstanding were for the most part soon after revoked.

The Truce of Tournay expired.

The Truce agreed upon at Tournay, and concluded at Arras, for one Year, by the Commissioners of both Kings, and two Cardinals from the Pope, yielded a Cessation of Arms, but not of Plots against each other. Lewis of Bavaria the Emperor being won over to the King of France's side, became his sworn Confederate, and revoked the Vicarship of the Empire, which he had lately confirmed to the King of England, giving this as the Reason in his Letter<sup>b</sup> to King Edward, That he had made the Truce at Tournay without his consent; which Edward fully and discreetly answer'd<sup>c</sup>. But instead of this remote and inconstant Confederate, Providence brought him another, more near and more serviceable to his design, within that Kingdom, after this manner: The Inheritance of the Dutchy of Britain happen'd to be in Controversie between Charles de Blois, Nephew to King Philip, and John de Monfort, upon this Title. Arthur Duke of Britain had by Beatrix his first Wife two Sons, John and Guy; and by Yoland Countess of Monfort his second Wife, John de Monfort. John Arthur's eldest Son having no Issue, left his Neice Jane, his Brother Guy's Daughter (her Father dying before him) to succeed him in his Dutchy. This Jane Charles de Blois marries on Condition, that his Issue by her should inherit the same; and after Marriage he is invested in it, and had Homage done to him during the Life of John their Uncle. But after his Death John de Monfort claims the Dutchy, and goes to Paris to do Homage for the same to the French King; but Charles de Blois in Right of his Wife opposing him, the Controversie was referred to the Parliament, who gave Sentence for Charles. Monfort being enraged, immediately repairs to the King of England, and doth Homage to him for the Dutchy, by whom he was received with great applause, and his Title (tho' bad in France) was made good in England. Wherefore he returns again into Britain with Comfort and Abilities to oppose his Competitor; but after some Encounters, was taken and committed close Prisoner to the Louvre in Paris. His Wife the Countess of Monfort, Sister to Lewis Earl of Flanders, being a Lady of a Masculine Courage, prosecutes her Husband's Quarrel, puts on Armour, leads and encourages her People, surprises and defends many places of Importance in Britain; but at length, being overpower'd by the Forces of Charles de Blois, she begs assistance of the King of England, and obtains it, and hath it sent thither under the Conduct of the Lord Walter de Manny, which relieved her for the present, but not long, her Enemies being too powerful to be subdued with small Forces. Wherefore Edward, who was not sparing of Aids for his own designs, being solicited again by the Countess, who came over in Person to treat with the King about farther Supplies, and make an Alliance by tendering a Match between her Son and one of the King's Daughters, sent over greater Forces with her, under the Command of the Earls of Salisbury, Pembroke, and Suffolk, the Lords Stafford, Spencer, and Bourchier, with Robert de Artois Earl of Richmond. Many were the Rencontres between the English and French, many Castles were surprized, and recovered; in which Robert de Artois, at the Siege of Vannes, received his last Wound, but was brought over into England to die, leaving behind him, tho' many Marks of Valour, yet the dishonourable Name of a Rebel to his own Country, against which he had not only instigated Edward, but served him six Years. Shortly after these Supplies were sent into Britain, King Edward followed in Person with more, and lying before Vannes, which was lately recovered by the French, John Duke of Normandy, eldest Son to the French King, sent to aid Charles de Blois with an Army of forty thousand, came to give him Battel; and being ready to engage, two Cardinals, sent for that purpose by Pope Clement VI. undertook to mediate a Peace, and after much Solicitation procured a Truce for three Years, upon Condition, that the Pope and Court of Rome should hear and examine the Differences between the two Kingdoms, but not determine them without the Consent of both Kings. This Cessation of Arms gave space to both sides to provide for greater Quarrels, tho' in Britain small Skirmishes continued.

A. D. 1341. Reg. 15.

The Death of Robert de Artois.

King Edward being returned home after the Conclusion of the Truce, made an Expedition into Scotland against King David, and drove him into the Islands. At this time the Isle of Man was conquer'd by William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, whom the King made Governour of it, under the Title of King. At the King's return from Scotland, solemn Turnaments were held at Dunstable, where two hundred and thirty Knights met him to exercise themselves at that Pastime (the only one then in Request) as they did afterwards at Smithfield, Windsor, and other places. A Society also of Knights of the Round Table, in imitation of King Arthur, was now instituted, and a large Chamber of two hundred Foot round erected for the same at Windsor, many Strangers out of foreign parts being drawn to joyn in it. The King of France also erects the like Martial Society in France.<sup>d</sup> About this time also began the Order the Garter, being appointed at a solemn Feast at Windsor, which was held there many Days, not from the Countess of Salisbury's Garter, which the King is said to have taken up in Dancing with her, but only<sup>e</sup> as an Emblem of the close Combination in Honour and Loyalty which ought to be among those that are admitted into that Order. For it would be a Dishonour to that Noble Institution, which is perform'd with so much Religious Ceremony to imagine it should arise from an Act of Lightness. But besides the Exercises of Arms, which the King promoted at this time, he took also special Care of the Government; and that the Abuses of it might be re-

Knights of the Round Table, and Order of the Garter instituted.

King Edward assists John de Monfort in obtaining Britain.

<sup>a</sup> During this Truce, the Scots, by the Instigation of the King of France, infested England; and the King of England, to justify his own intended Proceedings against them, complain'd of the Breach of the Peace to the Pope.

<sup>b</sup> He offer'd in the same Letter to be the Mediator of a Peace between them.

<sup>c</sup> By a Letter, which is set down at large in Mr. Speed, and Fox, p. 351, 352. with the Emperor's Letter to him.

<sup>d</sup> Mr. Ashmole in his History of the Garter, p. 185. fixes the Institution of the Order of the Garter to the 23d of April, 1349. five Years afterwards.

<sup>e</sup> The Original Book says, It was deduc'd from an Action of King Richard I. at Acon, who commanded a Garter to be ty'd about the Legs of some of his Chief Captains, to stir up their Valour, by wearing such a Badge as brought them always under his Observation in the Fight. They are twenty six, and their Badge is a blew Garter.

A. D. 1343. formed, he called a Parliament at Westminster to consider upon, and administer a speedy and suitable Remedy for them. And the first thing they endeavoured to cure, was the Collation of Ecclesiastical Benefices upon Strangers, of which the Earls, Barons, <sup>a</sup>Knights and Burgeses grievously complained. This they try'd to effect, by sending a Letter to the Pope, Clement VI. the Cause of it, in humble manner representing to him, 'How inconvenient it was, and derogatory to the State of the Kingdom of England, that such Reservations, <sup>b</sup>Provisions, and Collations of Benefices, as had been formerly used, should be continued, because the Churches of England had anciently been endow'd by noble and pious Persons, that the People might be instructed by their own Countrymen in their Mother-Tongue. But by the Usurpation of some of his Predecessors, Strangers and others, sometimes Enemies to the Realm, were preferred to many of them; by which means the Profits of them were sent out of the Nation, the Cures neglected, Alms and Hospitality refused, the Houses ruined, the Charity and Devotion of the People much lessened, and many other Disorders (contrary to the Intention of the Founders) occasioned, which they could not suffer any longer; and therefore besought his Holiness to revoke all such Reservations, Provisions and Collations, that fit Men of the Natives might supply the Cures, and without delay to signify his Intention in this matter, otherwise they would take speedy methods themselves for a Redress. These Letters were dated in full Parliament, May 28. 1343. and with them the King sent his Letters to the same effect, by Sir John Shordich, a grave Person, and of great Understanding in the Law; but at this time so unwelcome to the Court of Rome upon the account of his Message, that he departed without Leave or Answer; which, tho' the Pope sent afterward, yet the King and Parliament proceeded in their design of Redressing this Grievance, and made the Statute of Provisions, prohibiting all such Provisions and Collations within this Realm, upon pain of Imprisonment, or Death to any such Person as shall for the time to come present or admit any Person or Persons, who was so preferred by the Pope, to the prejudice of the King's Royal Prerogative; and to this end were Writs directed to all Archbishops, Bishops, and others who were concern'd, strictly forbidding them to act any thing contrary to this Statute. In this Parliament Archbishop Stratford was upon his submission, but with much difficulty, accepted to the King's Favour. There was also a long Debate concerning Wools, how they should be assised in several parts of the Realm, and what they should pay for Customs, when they were exported; and three Marks and a half upon every Sack was mentioned, but nothing was at this Session concluded. The Prince Edward also being then about thirteen Years old, was created Prince of Wales, and Commissioners were appointed to be sent to the Pope to mediate a Peace between the two Kings of England and France, according to the Articles propounded in the Truce, which were John Bishop of Exeter, Henry de Lancaster Earl of Darby, Hugh le Dis- pencier Lord of Glamorgan, the King's Cousins, A. D. Ralph Lord Stafford, with others.

The next Year after another Parliament, or rather the same prorogued, was held at London, in which, after many Contests, a tenth was granted the King by the Clergy, and a fifteenth by the Laity, for one Year; and a certain Gold-Coin, called the Floren, of base Alloy, which had been coined for the French Wars, cryed down, and Nobles of finer Metal coined, to the great Content of his Subjects; for whose Conveniency there were appointed places at London, Canterbury and Tork, to exchange their Monies in. Shortly after this the King caused General Musters to be made throughout the Kingdom, and a Certificate returned to him of all sufficient and expert Bowmen, and other Persons able to bear Arms. A Commission also was sent into every Country, to enquire into every Man's Abilities; and all Persons, that had from five to ten Pounds a Year in Lay-fee, were appointed to find an Archer on Horseback; they that had twenty five Pound, a Demilance; and so proportionably above. The King having thus gather'd an Army, goes over in Person into Flanders to make the People there firm to him; and at Sluce, Jaques van Arteville, with other Commissioners from the chief Towns, came to him, where a Motion was made, That either Lewis their Earl should do Homage to the King of England, or be disinherited, and Edward Prince of Wales received for their Lord. Upon which King Edward promises to erect their Country into a Dukedom. Arteville was forward to entertain the Motion, but the other Commissioners desired leave to acquaint their Towns with it, which were willing to have the Protection of the King of England, but did not care to purchase it by disinheriting their Natural Lord. Arteville notwithstanding undertakes to induce them to it, and for that end goes to Gaunt with five hundred Welshmen for his Guard, as he pretended, against one Gerhard Dennis Provost of the Weavers, who sought to destroy him. But the People, who had been so often led by him into Mutinies, now rose up unanimously against him, and a Clobber with an Ax struck out his Brains. King Edward having thus lost his principal Agent, was very angry. But the Towns sending a Message to excuse themselves of this Accident, which the People of Gaunt were only to be blamed for, and promising him to persuade their Prince (whom they could not consent to disinherit) to become his Homager, and to do him all faithful Service themselves; they so pacified the King, that he renewed the League between them: And so he went on to prosecute his other Designs. And now the Wars in Guien began to grow hot: The Earl of Darby, General of the Army, assaulted and took in Villa-Franche, Aginois, Angolesme, Rions, S. Basil, with many other Cities and Castles. The French King sent his eldest Son, John Duke of Normandy, to encounter him, who recover'd the Cities of Angolesme and Ville-Franche. These Skirmishes happen'd before the Truce was expired. The King of France blamed Edward for this breach of the Peace, and Edward accused him for the first Cause, in that he had instigated the Scots to invade his Realm, and entertain'd King David,

<sup>a</sup> The Commons were at first earnest to have the Pope's Power quite ejected out of the Realm, for his intolerable Encroachments upon the King's Subject's Rights, but at last were brought to gentler methods of dealing with him by Letters.

<sup>b</sup> The Pope's Provisions were thus made: When any Bishoprick, Abbacy, or good Benefice was likely to be void, the Pope having notice of it by some of his Agents here, would by an Act of Provision predispose of such Places to such Foreigners as he pleas'd, whereby Patrons were defeated of their Presentations, and Englishmen of their Preferments, unless they would buy off the Provisions.

<sup>c</sup> Notwithstanding this Act, Pope Clement sent two Cardinals the next Year with certain Provisions for Benefices next vacant, to the value of two thousand Marks; but the King and Nobles sent them back with Letters, purporting a full Resolution to withstand them.

A. D. 1346. when he fled from him. Thus both being prepared for a Quarrel, the Peace was quite laid aside, and the War began.

Reg. 20. This mighty and active Prince King Edward had now begun the 20th Year of his Reign, and being full of Courage and Youth was very eager upon his Expedition into France, for which he prepared the greatest Fleet that ever yet cross'd the Seas for France; and over he pass'd into Normandy in July, leaving for the Wardens of England in his absence the Lords Percy and Nevill, and taking the young Prince with him, who was about fifteen Years old, to give him a Specimen of the Labours and Achievements of Princes to attain Glory. His Army consist'd of four thousand Men at Arms, and ten thousand Archers, besides Welsh and Irish, which follow'd him on foot. He had with him the Earls of Hereford, Northampton, Arundel, Huntington, Warwick, Suffolk, and Oxford; the Lords Mortimer (afterward made Earl of March) John, Lewis, and Roger Beauchamp, Cobham, Lucy, Bassett, Barkley, Willoughby, and divers others both Knights and gallant Captains. He had also of late entertain'd Godfrey de Harcourt, a great Favourite of the French King's; but upon some discontent, or because he was suspected of favouring the English Party in Britain, for which the King of France had a little before executed Oliver de Clisson, Bacon, Piercy, and Geoffrey de Maestroi, Men of Note, was forced to fly, and came to King Edward, with whom tho' he staid not long before he made his Peace with his Master, yet he did his Country and King much mischief. For upon King Edward's landing with his mighty Army in the Isle of Constantine in Normandy, by his Conduct he was made one of the King's Marshals, and the Earl of Warwick the other, the Earl of Arundel being appointed Constable. The King being landed, divided his Army into three parts, the one to march on his left hand along the Sea-Coasts, and the other on the right, conducted by the two Marshals, and himself in the midst with the main Body of his Army. The Earl of Huntington, Admiral of his Fleet, was order'd to take all the Ships he could find on the Sea-Coasts. The three Armies by Land lodg'd every Night in one Field. And first he sacked Charanton, burnt and destroyed the City, and slew all the Inhabitants, as well unarm'd as arm'd, saying, 'That he made them Sacrifices to Bacon, Peirce, and others, (whose Heads he saw fixed upon the principal Gates) unjustly put to Death by Philip. Thence he marched forward, and took St. Loo, a rich Town for Merchandise, and plunder'd it. Then he marched to Caen, and after some Skirmishes became Master of it, and put all the Country into so great a terror, that Falaise, Lyseaux, and Honfleur, strong wall'd Towns, came and render'd themselves to him. This done, he marches into the Isle of France, to provoke the King of France to Battel, giving out, that he would wrestle with him for his Kingdom in the Eye of all France, on the great Theatre before his Capital City of Paris.

King Philip in the mean time was not idle in making all possible Preparations for his own Defence, and had gather'd one of the finest Armies (as the French Historians relate) that ever was seen in France, made up of French, Lorainers, Germans, and Genoeses, which he led towards Meulan, where it was said King Edward waited for him; but upon the News of his coming retreated, or as it was reported fled for fear, tho' the Event shew'd, 'twas rather out of Policy. King Philip follows him, and overtakes him at a Village call'd Arenes, which signifying Sand, might have told Philip on how weak a Foundation he built his hopes of Victory, when he accounted all his own, because he was at home. King Edward retired, to gain the River of Some at Elanquetaque, where it is fordable at Low-water, but the Passage was to be disputed with the Sword, King Philip having sent Gondemar de Fay with a thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot to guard it. King Edward notwithstanding resolves to pass or perish, and plunges foremost into the River, crying out, Let them that love me, follow me. At which words the whole Army boldly crowded forward, striving who should follow his brave Example the closest, and presently gained the Shoar. Gondemar astonished with this sudden and unexpected adventure, so affrighted his People with his fearful Looks, that after a short and disorderly Encounter, they all fled before the English; but the Shame was greater than the Loss, because they had a safe retreat at Abbeville and S. Requeir, which were hard-by. King Philip enraged with this dishonourable Victory, resolved to revenge it, and presently to provoke King Edward to Battel. His Council advis'd the contrary, that he should suffer his Troops to rest a few Days, and recover their Spirits, and King Edward to spend his. But their King had not Patience to stay above one Day in Abbeville, but being elevated with hopes of Victory, marches into the Field to bid Edward Battel. King Edward more cool and wary, managed his Business with admirable Discretion; having very strongly encamped himself at Cracy, and on all sides by Trenches and other means secured his Army, which consist'd but of thirty thousand Men, but in Order and Courage double the number. The Van-guard he gave to the Prince, and for his Guides the Earl of Warwick, Godfrey de Harcourt, the Lords Stafford, Delaware, Bouchier, Clifford, Cobham, Holland, Sir John Chandois, Sir Bartholomew Burwash, Sir Robert Nevill, with eight hundred Men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and a thousand Welshmen. The second Battel was committed to the Earls of Arundel and Northampton, the Lords Ross, Willoughby, Bassett, S. Albin, Multon, and others, which consist'd of eight hundred Men at Arms, and twelve hundred Archers. The third Battel, or Rereguard, was led by the King himself, having seven hundred Men at Arms, and two thousand Archers. The Army being thus rang'd, the King on a white Hobby rode from Rank to Rank to view them all, the one Marshal on his right Hand, and the other on his left, encouraging every Man to stand for his Right and their Honour. The French King's Army was greater both in shew and strength, being above sixty thousand fighting Men well arm'd: Of which the Chief Commanders were, Charles Earl of Alanzon the King's Brother, John de Luxemburge King of Bohemia, Charles de Blois the King's Nephew, Ralph Duke of Lorrain, the Earl of Flanders, Nevers, Sancerre, and the Dolphin of Viennois. On the Night before the Battel came Anne Earl of Savoy, with a thousand Men at Arms more to assist their King, which gave him such an assurance of Victory, that he long'd for an Encounter. The Vanguard he committed to Count d'Alanzon, the King's Brother, the Rear to the Earl of Savoy, and led the main Battel himself.

His

A. D. 1346. His Heat would hardly permit him to hear any Counsel of what was fit to be done. The old King of Bohemia advised, that the Army should first take some repast, and that the Infantry, consisting of about fifteen hundred Genoefes, with Cross-Bows, and sure Men, should make the Front, and the Cavalry to follow, which were both agreed to and done. But the Count de Alanzon took it so ill, that the Genoefes were put in the first Rank, that in his Fury, contrary to Order, he caused them to change their Place with Disorder, and so much to the Anger and Provocation of the Soldiers, that they were more furiously bent against the Captain than the Enemy. While this was doing there fell a piercing Shower of Rain, which dissolved the Bowmen's Strings, and made them unuseful; and then soon breaking up, the Sun shone full in the Face of the French, as if Heaven had joyned with the English in this Victory. King Edward, who had posted himself on the top of a Windmill-Hill, beholding from thence the present posture of the Enemy in changing their Places, and through the accident of the Rain resolves to take the advantage of both, and instantly sends a Party to charge them, without giving them leave to settle themselves. The discouraged Genoefes immediately give Ground, which when the Count de Alanzon perceived, he comes up in great Rage with his Horse, crying out, On, on, let us make way upon the Bellies of these Genoefes, who do but hinder us; and so forced his way through the midst of them, attended with the Earls of Lorraine and Savoy, and the Dolphin of Viennois, and held on his course till he came up to the English Battel, where he found the Prince better settled, attended on all hands with Troops of Archers, whose Strings having not felt the Rain, poured such Showers of Steel upon them, as cooled their Fury, and disorder'd them. The French King seeing his Brother in great danger, makes up to disengage him; whereupon the Fight grew so hot and doubtful, that the Commanders about the Prince sent to the King to come up with all his Power to assist them. The King demands of the Messenger, Whether his Son were slain or hurt? Who answer'd, Neither, but likely to be overpower'd. Well then, said the King, Go back and tell them that sent you, That so long as my Son is alive I will hearken to nothing, whatever happens; for I would have him carry away the Honour of this Victory. And thus being left to defend themselves, they bore up with such Courage, as that they recover'd the advantage by having killed the French King's Horse under him, so that he had almost been trodden to Death, had not he been saved by the Lord John Beaumont his new Pensioner. But this Accident so encouraged the English, and disheartned the French, that the English soon gained the greatest Victory that ever the French lost, having slain upon the Place, and in the Pursuit, thirty thousand; of whom the Chief were Charles d'Alanzon, John Duke of Bourbon, Ralph Earl of Lorraine, Lewis Earl of Flanders, Jaques Dauphin of Viennois, Son to Imbert, who after gave Dauphin to the Crown of France; the Earls of Sancerre, Harcourt (Brother

tel of Cref-

to Godfrey) and many other Earls, Barons, and Gentlemen, to the number of fifteen hundred. The French King himself with a small Company got to Bray in the Night, where he was received with the Tears and Lamentations of his People, whom yet he sought to comfort all he could. Some few Troops, that held together, sav'd themselves by retiring to Places adjoining. This memorable Victory happen'd upon the Saturday after S. Bartholomew's-day, being Aug. 24. 1346.

King Edward managed this Victory with as great Moderation as he won it; and first having embraced his Son, and commended the Valour he shewed that Day, he rendered Thanks to God, whose Aid he had before begged at the beginning of the Battel; and early the next Morning, being Sunday, he sent out three hundred Lances, and two thousand Archers, to discover what became of the Enemy, who met great Troops of Soldiers coming from Abbeville, S. Requier, Roan and Beauvais, (ignorant of what had happen'd) conducted by the Archbishop of Roan, and Prior of France, whom they likewise defeated, and slew seven thousand more. Our Writers also report, That so great Numbers of Stragglers, which fled from the Battel, and lost their Way in the Fog the next Morning, were slain, as equall'd the kill'd in the Field. So great a Loss did France sustain by this one fatal Battel.

But this was not all the Victories that fell to King Edward this Year, there was another of greater Importance gotten in England by the Queen and his People over the Scots, who being set on by the French to divert the War there, entred the Kingdom with sixty thousand Men, (as our Writers report) assuring themselves of Victory, because, as they supposed, the main Strength of it was in France. But they found the contrary. For the Lords of the North, as Gilbert de Hunfrivile Earl of Angos, Henry Percy, Ralph Nevill, William Daincourt, with the Archbishop of York, Bishop of Durham, and others of the Clergy, gather'd so strong an Army, and so well order'd them by the encouragement of the Queen (who was with them in Person) as that they utterly routed this great Army, took King David Prisoner, with the Earls of Fife, Menteith, Murrey, and Sutherland, the Lord Douglas, the Archbishop of S. Andrews, and others, and slew 15000 Scots. This Victory happen'd likewise on a Saturday, and six Weeks after that of Crecy. And as if Providence had design'd to make this Year in all places Triumphant, the Aids sent to the Countess of Monfort in Britain, under the Command of Sir Thomas Dagworth, overthrew and took Prisoner Charles de Blois, the Pretender to that Dutchy, and with him Monsieur La Val, the Lords Rockford, Beaumanoyr, Loyacque, with many other Barons, Knights and Esquires, and there were slain in the Encounter the Lord De La Val, (Father of him which was taken) Viscount Roban, Monsieur De Casteau, Brian de Malestroict, De Quintin, De Direval, great Lords, besides many other worthy Warriours, Knights and Esquires, to the number of seven hundred. Thus all places fell before the Sword of England.

* In Gi. Villani's Italian History 'tis mention'd, That the old King of Bohemia was kill'd in the Battel of Cressy. His Arms were three Ostrich Feathers, and being taken by the Prince, he afterwards us'd the same Devise, which has ever since been born by the Princes of Wales, his Successors. According to this Author, James King of Majorca was also kill'd in this Battel.

* He said to him, Dear Son, God give you Grace to go on as you have begun; you are my best Son, you have acquitted your self nobly, and truly deserve the Crown for which we fought. The Prince made no Reply, but bow'd down almost to the Ground.

* Seven thousand Men of the Inhabitants of Abbeville, S. Requier and Roan were slain the next Day; and besides these, the Archbishop of Roan and the Grand Prior's Troops were defeated, their Leaders and most of their Men being kill'd on the Spot.

* This successful Battel was fought at Nevills-Croft near Durham.

* One John Copland of Northumberland took him and the King as a Reward of his Courage, gave him 500 l. a Year, to him and his Heirs for ever, and made him a Knight Bannoret.

* The Earl of Darby also obtain'd a Victory over John the Dauphin in Normandy.

A. D. 1346. King Edward pursuing his Victory in France, marches on directly forward, and without meddling with the great Cities of Amiens and Abbeville, which were near, sets down before Calais*, a Town of more Importance than any for England, and the Gate for all the rest, which John de Vienne Marshal of France, and the Lord d'Andregben, a great Man in his time, commanded. All that Winter King Edward having shelter'd his People as in another Town built of Sheds, and Coverts to dwell in, furnished with all Provisions, lay without any Molestation of the French King, who was now likewise besieged with the Miseries of his own Estate, which was not only his real Misfortune, but thought his Fault. The King of France was in great Necessity, which must be supplied from a People who groaned under the Burthen of Poverty, and were very discontented for the ill management of the Treasure, the fallshood of the Financiers, the crying down of the Money, want of Trade, greatness of Taxes, &c. No way could be found to set all things to rights, but by an Assembly of the States, wherein all the Financiers, Receivers and Managers of Monies, are called to an account, and the Treasure is committed to the disposal of the Clergy and Nobility, to take away all suspicion of ill Dealings. Pierre de Essars Treasurer of France was committed to Prison, and obliged to pay a great Fine to the King, and the other Officers and Accomptants forced to restore at once what they had been gathering many Years. The Bankiers, Lombards, and other Usurers are put to the Press for their unlawful Exactions, their Interests being proved to exceed the Principal, which was confiscated to the King, and the Interests given to the Debtors. Thus was the poor oppressed People a little satisfied, and the King's Necessities supplied, by which he was enabled with the ready Service of his Nobles and ablest Subjects to get another Army into the Field the next Spring to relieve Calis, but approaching it could find no way open to attempt it, the King of England being Master both of the Haven, and possessed of all other ways that were passible; and having the Flemmings his Friends, who with an huge Army had besieged Ayre, and did much mischief on the Confines of France, which to oppose while the King called John Duke of Normandy, the Prince out of Guien, Henry of Lancaster Earl of Darby, having an Army of twelve hundred Men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and three thousand Foot, English and Gascoignes, took in most of the Towns of Zantonge and Poitou, besieged and sacked Poitiers; and so returns to Burdeaux with more Plunder than they could well carry. Thus the French suffered every where, and their King was not able to relieve them. But at length, to shew his Will more than Ability, he sends to the King of England, to solicit him to appoint some place of Battel, and he would encounter him. King Edward returned him an answer, 'If he could make his own way to come thither to him, there he should find him; but he would not leave the Place, now he was ready to take it, having lain so long at it with great Labour and Charge. Then two Cardinals were sent by the Pope to mediate for a Peace, but nothing could be effected. So that the French King was forced to break up, and retire to Paris, leaving Calis to the Mercy of the Besieger; which, when they understood, they sent to desire a Parley, had it granted, and therein received this final Sentence, 'That six of their chief Burgeesses should be sent to the King bareheaded and barefooted, in their Shirts, with Halters about their Necks, the Keys of the Town and Castle in their Hands, and submit themselves to the King's Will, and the rest he would pardon. This Sentence being related to the miserable Townsmen, they were in great Lamentation about the choice of this Sacrifice, who of them it should be that must die for the rest, till one among them stands up, and spake boldly to this effect: 'Fellow-Citizens, I have so often exposed my Life in this long Siege for my Country, (and have been every Day so ready to die) that I am now most willing to sacrifice my Life, as my last Oblation for it, and will cheerfully carry my Head to the victorious King of England, not desiring to survive the Destruction of my miserable Country. This free and resolute Speech so wrought upon the amazed People, that now they strived who should be one of the six, and cried out, Let us go, let us go unto Death; it is our last Duty to our Native Soil. So that six are presently chosen, and sent according to the King's demand, presenting themselves on their Knees to the King, and beseeching him to shew Mercy unto them. The King commands them instantly to be carry'd to their Execution, and would not in regard of his Oath be persuaded to spare them by all the Intreaties and earnest Petition of his Council, till the Queen, great with Child, fell on her Knees before him, and with Tears obtained their Pardon, and had them given her. Which done, she caused them to be cloathed, gave them their Dinner, and six Nobles a Man, appointing them to be conveyed safely through the Army, and set at liberty. An Act of Mercy worthy of so great a Queen. The King, tho' in this he was severe, yet was he more sparing of Blood than his Grandfather Edward I. and had more of Compassion, as he shewed by one Act in this Siege. When Victuals within the Town began to fail, and all unuseful Persons, as old Men, Women and Children<sup>d</sup> were put out of the Gates, he forced them not back again, as he might have done, to consume their Store, but suffered them to pass through his Army, gave them Victuals, and two Pence a-piece to every one. And thus was the strong Tower of Calis gotten, Aug. 3. 1347. after almost a Year's Siege, with infinite Cost and Labour. All the Inhabitants were turn'd out of it, being forced to seek new Dwellings, and a Colony of English placed in it; and so it remained in the possession of the Crown of England two hundred and ten Years. And now this Triumphant King having made a Truce for some few Months, and taken care to secure what he had gotten, goes over with his Queen, Prince, and many of his People into England, to spend some time in Feasts and Triumphs, carrying over such abundance of Spoils, that every House almost had some part, and the English Wives are grown extremely fine with French Ornaments. And to add to this Glory, the Princes Electors of Germany send in the midst of this Jollity to the King, to signify that they had chosen him King of the Romans<sup>e</sup>; but he refuses the Office, tho' it was of great Dignity, because it was out of his way, and would be burthensome to him to

1347. land's Mirth was turn'd into bitter Mourning, by
Reg. 21. the invisible Sword of Heaven. A contagious Pestilence, which first beginning in the East and South parts of the World, spread into all parts of The Plague Christendom, and raged so violently in England, in England. that it is said to have destroyed more than half of its Inhabitants, so that the Church-Yards were not large enough to bury the Dead, but they were 1348. forced to purchase new Ground for that purpose.
In London there died in six Months 57374 Persons, and other Cities and Towns suffered as deeply, according to their proportion. This Plague was attended with as mortal a Famine, Murrain of Cat-tel, and Barrenness of the Ground, caused through the Contagion of the Air, and want of Husbandry.

The King
goes over to Calis.

But all the former Calamities did only cause a short Cessation of Arms between the two Princes, not deter them from prosecuting their Quarrel; Edward's Kingdom was not so emptied, but he made a shift to keep his Fields and Troops full.
The first Action after it was his Passage over to Calis, upon an Information of a Plot contrived by the French to surprize the Town after this manner: Monsieur de Charny<sup>b</sup> Governour of St. Omers had treated with Americ de Pavie, whom King Edward had left Governour of the Castle of Calis, and promised him twenty thousand Crowns to be admitted into the Castle. Americ accepts the Offer, and appoints a Night for the Business;
in which Night King Edward, being inform'd by Americ, arrives with three hundred Men at Arms, and six hundred Archers. Monsieur Charny sets out likewise the same Night from St. Omers with his Forces, and sent a hundred Men armed before with the Crowns to Americ to possess themselves of the Castle. The Men accordingly were let in at the Postern-Gate, the Crowns received, and themselves put in hold; which done, the Gates of the Town are opened, and the King marches out first to encounter Monsieur de Charny, coming on with his Forces, who perceived himself betray'd, and therefore put his People into the best posture of defence he could. The King of England, because he would not be known to be there in Person, put himself and the Prince under the Colours of the Lord Walter Manny, and then fell to a sharp Engagement with them, in which he was twice beaten down on his Knees by Mongeur de Riboumont, a strong and valiant Knight (with whom he fought hand to hand) but recovered himself, and in the end took Riboumont Prisoner. Charny was also taken, and all his Forces defeated. King Edward the Night after (which was New-Years-Night) feasted with the Prisoners, and gave Riboumont in honour of his Valour a rich Chaplet of Pearl 1349. (which he wore himself) for a New-Years-Gift, forgave him his Ransom, and set him at liberty.
The rest paid dearly for what they got not, and were warned how they deal again in the same kind. Yet the English not long after had better success by the same Arts, and got the Castle of Guines (a place of great Importance near Calis) for a Sum of Money given to one Beauconroy a Frenchman; of which Castle, when the French King demanded Restitution, in Consideration of the Truce, King Edward returns answer, That for things bought and sold between their People, there was no Exception in the Truce; and so held it.

Shortly after this, the French King, in whose Fate it was not to see better Fortunes, dy'd, and left his distressed Kingdom to his Son John, who endured far worse Calamities. For in his and the two following Reigns, the English became such powerful Masters of France, that they turned all into Blood and Confusion, and might have been absolute Masters of it, had not their Civil Dis-sentions among themselves given France time and leave to recover its Liberty and Strength. King Edward the next Year went again in Person with his Fleet to Sea, to encounter certain Spanish Ships passing from Flanders, laden with Cloth and other Commodities, which after a sharp Fight, and much Blood shed on both sides, he took, with their Cargo of rich Goods. And this he did, because the Spaniards the Year before had entred
the River Gironne, and taken certain English Ships laden with Wines, and slew all the English. In the mean time, the King's Forces in Guien were not idle, but there were many Conflicts between the French and them. In Britain also the War continu'd, and was hotly maintain'd between the two Ladies, the Widow of Monfort, and the Wife of Charles de Blois (who was a Prisoner in England.) Divers Propositions of Peace had been made by the Pope's Legates, and Commissioners had often met, to the great Expence of both Kings, but nothing was concluded; and so temporary Truces were set on foot to gain time.
These Delays not only consumed our Men, but Treasure, for the War was not able to maintain it self, tho' invasive. The Money was here alter'd, and abated in Weight, and yet made to pass according to the former Value. And whereas before there were no other pieces of Money, but Nobles, and half Nobles, with small pieces of Silver called Sterlings; the King caused Groats and Two-pences of equal Value with the Sterling-money to be coined, which raised the Prices of Commodities, that usually rise or fall, according to the plenty or scarcity of Money, made Servants and Labourers to raise their Wages. Whereupon a Statute was made in the Parliament now held at Westminster, to reduce the same to the usual Rates given before the late great Mortality.
This caused much discontent among them, especially against William Edington Bishop of Winchester, the King's Treasurer, who was thought the Adviser of the Abatement of the Coin. In this Parliament also were several Orders made for the governing and ordering the Staple, because the King being displeased with the People of Flanders for disappointing him of the Match

A. D. 1351. Reg. 25. dred the Passages of Lighters, Boats, and other Vessels up and down the Country, should be removed. An Act very advantageous to the Kingdom, but through Bribing and Corruptions of great Men, it took no effect. So that that Age had only the Honour of making so good an Ordinance. It is said also, that another Act was made this Parliament at the earnest Request of the Londoners, that no common Whore should wear any Hood, except striped with divers Colours or Furs, and their Garments reversed, the wrong side outward; a good design to make so foul a Sin become infamous, and at length odious.

After this Parliament, Henry Earl of Darby is created Duke of Lancaster<sup>a</sup>, and Ralph Lord Stafford Earl of Stafford, and Charles de Blois, who had been a Prisoner long in England, was released for forty thousand Florins, and permitted to return into Britain to provide the same. Great Mediation was made by the Pope to reconcile the two Kings, and Commissioners met to conclude a Peace. Articles were propounded, of which the Chief was, viz. 'That the King of England should hold all the Lands of the Duchy of Aquitain without Homage, and quit his Title to the rest of France, but the French would not yield to it, (tho' after they were forced to accept of the same Article at the Treaty of Brignny.) Whereupon the King of England being incensed, would not hear of any farther Prorogation of the Truce, tho' much urged to it by two Cardinals sent on purpose from Avignon by Pope Clement VI. and prepares a-fresh for the War. And first the Prince of Wales grown now a Man, is appointed by Parliament to go into Gascoigne, with a thousand Men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and a great number of Welshmen; and in June following sets out with three hundred Sail of Ships, attended with the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, and Oxford, the Lords Chandos, and James Audley, Sir Robert Knolles, Sir Frank de Hall, and many others. 1353. About Michaelmas following the King himself went over to Callis with another Army, taking with him his two Sons, Lionel of Antwerp, now Earl of Ulster, in right of his Wife Elizabeth, Daughter and Heir to William Burgh, and John of Gaunt Earl of Richmond. There met him at Callis a thousand Men at Arms out of Germany, Flanders and Brabant, which he had hired, so that his Army consisted of three thousand Men at Arms, and two thousand Archers on Horseback, besides Archers a-foot. The City of London sent him three hundred Men at Arms, and five hundred Archers, all in one Livery, at their own Charge. But with all this great Force he could effect nothing, because the French King would not be drawn to engage him, in regard he was too powerful, and his People under discontent; but he so removed all Provisions out of his way, that the King of England was forced to return. The Disturbances of France arose at this time from Charles King of Navarr, who had marry'd Jane the French King's Daughter, a Prince of an active Spirit, subtil and proud, by reason of his great Estate and high Blood, being the Son of Lewis Count D'Eureux, and Jane Daughter to King Lewis Huttin, who was disinherited of the Crown of France by Philip the Long her Uncle, by the Salick Law, but preferred by him to be Queen of Navarr, in whose Right this Charles her Son had the Title of that Kingdom, and other great Inheritances with it. 1353. But he not being content with them, coveted also the Countries of Champagne and Bry, which belong'd to his Mother by the same Right as the Kingdom of Navarr did; and taking himself wrong'd, enter'd into violent Courses; but not daring to complain directly of the King, he falls upon the Constable of France, as the Chief of his Council, and one of whom he was most jealous, in regard of the King's Favour to him, and in the end caused him to be murther'd in his Bed at L'Aigle in Normandy, rushing himself up into his Chamber, with his Brother Philip of Navarr, two of the Harcourts, and divers others of his Retinue; and then flying to his City of Eureux, justifies the Act to be lawful. The French King, tho' much displeased at the cruel Fact, yet was forced not to resent it, and promises the King of Navarr, if he would come and crave his Pardon, he should have it. Upon this he appears at Paris before the Council to give a Reason of the Fact, is condemned as guilty of Treason, (notwithstanding the King's Promise) and committed to Prison, and could be hardly released at the Request of three Queens, viz. his Mother, Sister and Wife. Being dismissed, he goes presently in his Passion and offers his Service to the King of England (who knew well enough how to make use of such a powerful Member) and withal surprizes several pieces in Normandy, endeavouring all he could to draw the Affections of the People from their King, when he had most need. These Injuries the French King for a while dissembles, till he could find some advantage against him, which at length fell out thus. Charles his eldest Son being lately invested in the Duchy of Normandy, was visited by all the great Men of the Country, among whom came the King of Navarr, and is Royally feasted at Roan. The French King having notice of it at Paris, sets out with a Body of Men, takes him at Dinner with his Son, and without any process of Law causes four of the Chief that massacred the Constable to be presently executed, of which the two Harcourts were part, and sends the King of Navarr under a strong Guard to Arras, and his chief Servants to other Prisons. This sudden Execution enraged the Friends of Navarr, and especially Philip his Brother, who with Jeffrey Harcourt the Uncle of the executed Brethren, posted over into England, exclaiming against this barbarous Murther, begging aid of King Edward in revenging so notorious an Injustice, and offering him their Hearts, Goods, Towns and Havens to let him into Normandy, which the King was not backward to accept and entertain.

And first the King sends over the Duke of Lancaster with four thousand Men at Arms, who by the help of so great Forces, wins many strong Towns; and in the mean while himself, that he might be well furnished for so great an Action, obtains of his Parliament, which he called for that purpose, a Tax of fifty Shillings of every Sack of Wool for six Years next ensuing; by which Imposition it was thought (say our Historians) that our King was able to expend a thousand Marks Sterling a Day; so great a Vent was there at that time for Wools. Soon after this Parliament broke up, the King, as hardy as courageous, went with his Army to recover Berwick, tho' it was then Winter, which had been of late

So that all the neighbouring Nations were in great Troubles, but England, which flourished with Victories and Triumphs.

1356. While the King was busied at home, the Prince of Wales enters Guien, passes over Languebec to Tholouse, Narbonne and Burges, without any opposition, destroying and spoiling the Country where he went; and being laden with spoil, returns to Burdeaux. The French King being thus assaulted on all hands, gathers together all the Force he could, and first goes against his Enemy in Normandy, and recover'd many of his lost Towns, and might have prevailed there, had not the Prince of Wales, who was got abroad again, and had invaded Tureine, obliged him to carry his Army from thence to oppose him, and stop his Course; to which end he marched towards him with his whole Army, causing all the Towns and Passages upon the River Loir to be strongly guarded. The Prince knowing himself too weak to encounter so great Forces as the French King was bringing up against him, retreats again through Tureine and Poitou towards Burdeaux, but was pursued by the French, who within two Leagues of Poitiers had him at an advantage. At this Instant came two Cardinals<sup>d</sup> from the Pope to mediate a Peace between them, and prevailed so far upon the Prince, that he was contented to restore to the French King what he had gained upon him, but without prejudice to his Honour, in which he said, He stood accountable to his Father and his Country. But the French King supposing that he now had his Enemy at his Mercy, would accept of no other Conditions, but that the Prince should deliver him four Hostages, and surrender up himself and Army into his Hands, to be used according to his Discretion, otherwise (notwithstanding the Legate's Persuasions to milder terms) he would immediately set upon the Prince with his Army (which was six to one<sup>e</sup>). The Prince being reduced to these Straights, that he must yield either to dishonourable terms, or fight immediately, prepares for a Battel, taking what advantage he could of the Ground, and providently getting the benefit of the Vines, Shrubs and Bushes on that side, where he was likely to be assaulted most furiously by the French Horse. The Success answered the Prince's Expectation; for the French Cavalry, to whom the French King designed to give the Honour of the Victory, with some discontent to the rest, being upon their first assault entangled among the Vines, were so disorder'd and gall'd by the English Archers, without harm or danger to themselves, that they were forced to give ground, and the whole Army was by that means conquer'd, and the Prince, who must have been ruined by delay, purchased so memorable a Victory, as was never before attained by the English with so few hands. For the French King<sup>f</sup> himself and youngest Son Philip (who valiantly defended his Father, when his other two Brothers had forsaken him, for which afterward he had the Title of Hardy, and Dukedom of Burgogne given him) were taken Prisoners, and with them Jacques de Bourbon, Count de Pontbieu, the Archbishop of Sens, John d'Artoys, Count d'Eu, Charles de Artoys, his Brother Count de Longueville, Charles Count de Tancarville, the Counts of Vendosme, Salbource, Dampmartin, and La Roche, with many other eminent Lords, besides two thousand Knights, Esquires, and Gentlemen; which the Conquerors holding to be<sup>g</sup> too great a Number to be kept Prisoners, released many of them. The French, who best knew their own Losses, relate, that there were slain in this Battel seventeen hundred Gentlemen, among whom were fifty two Bannorets, and many of the Nobility, as Peter de Bourbon, the Duke d'Atbens Constable of France, Jan de Clermont Marthal, Jeffrey de Charny, High Chamberlain. Three of the French King's Sons escaped (for they were all in the Battel) viz. Charles the Dauphin, who was the first so entitled, Lewis afterward Duke of Anjou, and John Duke of Berry, all of them Men of great Action in the following times. This Blow might seem to have given France a complete overthrow, and subdu'd it entirely to the Crown of England; but that it was a Body of so many strong Limbs, and so great extent, that it is almost impossible to weaken it so much, but that it will recover at length again, as it did soon after. The Prince of Wales in this Battel gained a double Victory, the one by his Sword, and the other by his Courtesie; for he visited the Captive King with all the Reverence and Respect due to his Majesty, comforted him by the Examples of like Fortunes in War, and assured him of all fair Treatment, according to his Dignity. The Chief Nobles, who attended the Prince in this Action, were the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, Oxford, and Stafford, the Lords Cobham, Spencer, Barkley, and Bassett, and of Gascoigne, Le Capital de Beuse, the Lords Pamier, Chaumont, and others. But the most remarkable Instance of Honour and Valour was the Lord James Audley, who having vowed to be the foremost of the Battel, performed his Word, and confirmed it with many Wounds, for which the Prince having rewarded him with five hundred Marks per Annum, Fee-simple in England, he presently gave it to four of his Esquires, who had underwent the same Dangers with him. The Prince knowing it, asked him, Whether he did not accept his Gift? He answer'd, Yea; but those Men had deserved it as well as himself, and had more need of it. The Prince was pleased at this Reply, and gave him five hundred Marks more, as if he resolv'd, that so much Worth should not go<sup>h</sup> unrewarded.

All things being carefully settled and accommodated by the Prince after the Battel, he retir'd with his Prisoners first to Burdeaux, and shortly after he passes with great Glory into Eng-

<sup>g</sup> The English are said to have taken more French Prisoners than their whole Army contain'd.

<sup>h</sup> The Prince is said also at this time, after he had given most devout Thanks to God for this wonderful Victory, to have given all his Soldiers particular Thanks for their Bravery, and dispens'd as great a Largess to every one of them, as the strictness of his Fortune at that time would allow.

A. D. 1357. Reg. 31. land<sup>a</sup>, now the Theatre of Triumphs: The French King was lodg'd at the Savoy, then a noble Palace of Henry Duke of Lancaster's. Many Prisoners upon reasonable Ransome, and not a few upon the French King's Word (who undertook for them) were released and sent home honourably. David King of Scots, who had been a Prisoner eleven Years in England, was at the earnest Solicitation of his Queen Joan, King Edward's Sister, released; upon an Obligation to pay him an hundred thousand Marks Striveling<sup>b</sup> in ten Years: The Security the King had of France, was a means to grant this Prince his Liberty. The French King remained a Prisoner in England four Years, in which time many Overtures and great Offers were made for his deliverance, but nothing effected. Charles the Dauphin, a very prudent Prince, who manag'd the Kingdom in his Father's Captivity, endeavour'd all he could to procure a Contribution of his factious People to ransom his Father, but could not prevail. A Parliament was at length called to consult about it, and the Dauphin very gravely propounded to them the necessity of recovering and redeeming their King, in order to the Safety of the Kingdom; but after many Meetings of the Committee of fifty, to whom it was referred to avoid Confusion, there was a Resolution produced to the Dauphin, much different from what he expected: For instead of an Aid and Contribution, they require a Reformation of the State; and first the Bishop of Laon, who was chosen their Speaker, besought him to keep secret whatsoever should be spoken to him by the States. The young Prince answers, That it was derogatory to his Station in the Kingdom to receive Rules and Laws by his Father's Subjects, and thereupon commanded them upon their Allegiance, to speak their Intentions. The Bishop then complains of the ill Management of the publick Revenues, demands a speedy Redress, and that Commissioners should be appointed to call all Persons answerable to an Account. That all the present Managers of the Treasury should be displaced; That the Moneys and all Affairs of State should be manag'd henceforth by four Bishops and twelve Burgesses, of which those of the City of Paris should be the Chief, and that without this Council the Dauphin should do nothing; and in Conclusion, they require, That the King of Navarre should be set at Liberty: Which things, if he would cause to be granted, they would give any reasonable Tax for Redemption of their King. To these Demands the Prince desired time to give an Answer, thinking by delays to separate and disunite their Councils; but the Deputies at length grew cold, and so nothing was done at that Meeting, save that it so much infected the Subjects, and especially the People of Paris, that they demanded to have the King of Navarre deliver'd immediately according to the Decrees of the Deputies; and at length so prevailed with Pinguigny, the Governour of Artoys, who had the keeping of him, that he was released after nineteen Months Imprisonment, comes to Paris accompany'd with a stately Train, and so much Confidence, as if he would shew that he intended to revenge himself, and was receiv'd with universal Joy of the Citizens; to whom he declares with great Eloquence, what Wrongs he had receiv'd, and intimated, that he had a Title to their Crown, and so put that City into such a Combustion, that the Redemption of the King was quite laid aside, and the Prince was forc'd by an Act of Abolition to pardon the King of Navarre, and all his Complices for all former Offences to pacifie them. The Prince seeing the Perverseness of the Parisians, went to other Cities and Provinces to solicit for Moneys towards the Redemption of his Father, leaving his Brother Philip Duke of Orleans at Paris to keep them in the best Order he could, in his Absence. The Province of Languedoc is highly commended in the French Histories for the first who made the largest Offers to purchase their King's Liberty, in the Assembly of the three States at Toulouse, promising in it to their Governour the Count D'Arminiacque not only to contribute their Revenues, and moveables, but to sell their Wives Jewels to raise a sufficient Sum for it; and to testify their Sorrow for their King's Misfortunes, they order'd, That no costly Cloaths, Feasting, Plays, or other Pastimes, should be us'd in their Province, during the time of their King's Captivity. Champaign follow'd this Example; but nothing could prevail with the People of Paris to give any thing. The King of Navarre had won them not only from their Obedience, but taught them to put off all Humanity, and put them into such Flames of Rebellion, that when the Dauphin return'd to the City, the Provost of Merchants beset his House with three thousand Artificers in Arms, and rushing up into the Prince's Chamber with some of his Company, slew Jan de Constans and Robert de Clermont, in his Presence, because, as he pretended, they being his chief Counsellors, had given him bad Advice; takes off the Prince's Hat from his Head, and having put on himself his own as the City Livery, went out to the Throng, and caused the Bodies of these two Noblemen to be drawn along the Streets, that the Rabble might applaud the Murther. Then the Provost writes in the Name of the whole City to all the great Towns to joyn with them, and take their Livery, as the Prince had done for the Reformation of the State; and in the mean time, they compos'd a Council among themselves, of which the Bishop of Laon was President: And the Provost, with some of the University chief Heads, assuming a Sovereign Power to order all Affairs of State as a Commonwealth. In so great a confusion was the Kingdom without an Head, and so ready to shake off all Regal Authority and Power.

The Dauphin thus disgraced and perplexed, with much Difficulty got out of that tumultuous City, and flies into Champaign, where he assembled the States at Vertus, whom he found Loyal and ready to yield him all Assistance. The rest of the great Towns refusing also with much disdain to joyn with the City of Paris, offer him their Aid: So that he was much encourag'd, and likely to have effected his Desires in a short time, had not the King of Navarre, who sought his Destruction, raised new Troubles in the State, and taken Arms against him; by which means not only he was much hinder'd in his Designs, and the Malecontents of the Nation encourag'd to disturb the Peace (for the Peasants, who had been undone by the Soldiers, and miserably plunder'd by their Lords, armed themselves in the Country of Beauvais, and reveng'd themselves upon the Gentry and such as had done them wrong, spoiling and burning their Houses, killing their Wives and Children in a barbarous manner, and Troops

Wherefore he passes over into France with eleven hundred Sail, and lands at Calis with a mighty Army<sup>b</sup>, which he divided into three parts, committing one to the Conduct of the Prince of Wales, another to the Duke of Lancaster, and the third he leads himself: And first he marches to the City of Arras, which he took within three Days, thence into Champaign, where the Cities of Sens and Nevers are surrender'd to him. The Dutchy of Burgogne being terrify'd with these Examples, redeem'd it from Spoil, by paying to the King two hundred thousand Florins of Gold<sup>c</sup>. Being furnished with this Treasure, King Edward marches up to Paris, where the Dauphin (who having lately overcome the Faction, and executed the principal Mutiners, was created Regent) had posted himself with a considerable Body of Men, who in the common Danger flocked together to defend their Country, and would not (by the Example of his Father and Grandfather) be drawn out to hazard them, but only stood upon his Defence; which the King of England seeing, after many Provocations, he rais'd the Siege and<sup>d</sup> returned into Britain to refresh his Army. In the mean time, the Regent lays in great store of Victuals, and provides that he might have enough to maintain his Soldiers without oppressing the Inhabitants, and with extream Diligence so fortify'd the City, that King Edward returning with all his fresh Power, was not able to do any thing against him, as he expected; and so the City, that so lately was like to have endanger'd the whole Kingdom, was now the only means to save it. From Paris therefore King Edward goes with his Army towards Chartres with a Design to besiege that City; but in the way he was so affrighted with a terrible Storm of Hail, Thunder and Lightning, which fell upon his Army, that he vow'd he wou'd make Peace with the French King upon any reasonable Conditions, as he shortly after<sup>e</sup> did at the Treaty of Britigny near Chartres upon these Articles, viz. That the Country of Ponthieu, the Fiefs of Thouars and Belleville, the Countries of Gascoigne, Agenois, Perigort, Limosin, Cahors, Torbe, Bigorres, Rovergne, Angoulesm in Sovereignty, with the Homages of the Lords within those Territories; Monstruel on the Sea, Pontbieu, Calis, Guines, La Merke, Saugote, Boulogne, Hames, Vales, and Onis, should be under the Command of the King of England; That King John should pay for his Ransom three Millions of Scutes of Gold, of which six hundred thousand to be presently paid in hand, four hundred thousand the Year following, and the remaining part in the two next Years upon reasonable demand: And in Consideration of the former Grants, the King of England, and his Son the Prince of Wales as well for themselves as their Successors, for ever should renounce all the Right which they pretended to the Crown of France, the Dutchy of Normandy, the Countries of Tourin, Anjou and Main, the Sovereignty and Homage of the Dutchy of Britain, and the Earldom of Flanders; and within three Weeks King John should be carry'd to Calis, and set on Land at the King of England's Charge, except the Expences of his House. And for the sure Performance of these Articles on the King of France's part, the King of England was to have these Hostages deliver'd to him, Lewis Duke of Anjou, John Duke of Berry (his Son) Philip Duke of Orleans his Brother, John Duke of Burgogne, the Counts of Bloys, Alençon, S. Pol, Harcourt, Poncian, Valentinois, Grand Pre, De Brenne, Des Forrests; the Lords Vaudemont, Coufey, Piennes, De S. Venant, De Preaux, De Momerancy, De Garancieis, La Roche, Guion, Estou-reville, Le Dauphine, d'Avergne, d'Andrignil, and De Craon, sufficient Securities for the said Sums and Conditions. The Scots also were not to be aided by the French King, nor Flemmings by the English: Charles King of Navarre, and his Brother Philip were likewise comprehended in these Articles, &c. This Agreement of Peace enter'd into by both Kings, was ratified by their two eldest Sons Charles and Edward, and sworn to by the Nobility of both Kingdoms. The Hostages were thereupon deliver'd to King Edward; who departing from Honfleur, brought them over into England, leaving the Earl of Warwick in France to compleat the Peace<sup>f</sup>. King John is honourably attended to Calis, ready to be deliver'd at the Payment of the first part of his Ransom, which to raise the City of Paris, pays one thousand Royals, and by their Example other Cities contributed their Proportions: And so King John was again set at Liberty<sup>g</sup> after having remain'd about five Years a Prisoner in England, the two King's parting from each other with all outward Demonstrations of Brotherly Love.

King Edward being returned home, calls a Parliament, wherein the Form of Peace between him and the French King was read, approv'd on by all the States, and an Oath taken by all the Nobility to observe the same for their parts. And here the King restored the Houses, Lands, and Tenements, which he had taken from the Friars Strangers, An. Reg. 12. to maintain him in his French Wars; which now being ended, he granted them to them again in as free a manner as they before had held them: A rare Example of Justice in this King, it being seldom known that a Prince will part with any thing he hath gotten. And now was the Glory and Happiness of England a little allay'd by a great Mortality, call'd The Second Pestilence, by which many Noblemen died, of whom the chief was Henry Duke of Lancaster, one of the Royal Blood; a Prince eminent for his Wisdom and Valour, who had been a chief Actor in all these Wars, and a principal Support to the Crown of England, whose Daughter and Heir was a little before marry'd to John of Gaunt (by a Dispensation from the Pope for their too near Consanguinity) whereby he was Duke of

A. D. 1362. Lancaster. And shortly after, by the like Dispensation, the Prince of Wales marries the Countess of Kent<sup>a</sup>, the Daughter of Edmund, Brother to Edward II. The King upon this Marriage gives to the Prince of Wales the Duchy of Aquitain, reserving to himself<sup>b</sup> Homage and Fealty; and shortly after sent him over with his Wife and Retinue to keep his Court there. His Son Lionel Earl of Ulster is sent into Ireland with an Army of fifteen hundred Men, to guard his Earldom against the Irish, and was created Duke of Clarence in the next Parliament held at Westminster in November, and continued till the Feast of S. Brice, his Birth-day, and fiftieth Year of his Age. This Day, that he might render remarkable to his People, and make it a Jubilee, he shewed himself exceeding Gracious to the Nation, freely pardoning many Offenders, releasing Prisoners, recalling banish'd Persons, &c. And upon a Petition of the Commons order'd, that all Pleadings, which before were in French, should be made in English, that the Subjects might understand the Law, by which he holds what he hath, and is to know what he doth. An excellent Act, and worthy of so great a Prince; but he had deserved greater Honour, if he could have freed it from those Difficulties and Mysteries, which render it a greater Affliction to the People than a Remedy. In it also was made a Statute for Purveyors (as there had been many before) enacting, That no Provisions for the King's Court should be taken up, but for ready Money, under a severe Punishment. For which Ease the Parliament granted him 26 s. upon every Sack of Wool transported for three Years. And so both People and Prince were generally pleas'd, saving that some particular Men look'd upon themselves aggrieved by removing the Staple from England to Calis, on purpose to enrich that Town of his own acquiring, which might make it to be born withal. And as this greatest of English Princes was careful to enlarge his Dominions, and make his People Great abroad, so also to reform their Vices, and make them Good at home. And to this end, in the next Parliament held at Westminster, Anno Regn. 37. he caus'd to be enacted certain sumptuary Laws to prevent all Excess both in Apparel and Dyet, appointing every degree of Men, from the Shepherd to the Prince, what Habits and Stuffs they should wear, prohibiting all Ornaments of Gold and Silver, Silks, and rich Furs to all, except Persons of Quality; by which foreign Superfluities were excluded from the Nation, and our own Manufacture only us'd. The Labourer and Husbandman appointed but one Meal a day, and what Meats they should eat, &c. By which means Gluttony and Drunkenness, those Vices which have enfeebled the Nation since, were totally banish'd. So careful was this wise and frugal King to preserve his Subject's Estates from excess. And as provident was he for the ordering and securing of his own Treasure, committing the Custody of it to Conscience and Religion. For by a Certificate sent to Pope Urban, Anno Regn. 39. concerning Pluralities, and the Estates of the Churchmen in England, there were more Clergymen in Office about the King, than about any Prince in Christendom beside. For first Simon Langham Archbishop of Canterbury was Chancellor of England; William Wickham Archdeacon of Lincoln, keeper of the Privy-Seal; David Welles Parson of Sommerham, Master of the Rolls; ten Beneficed Priests, Civilians, Masters of Chancery; William Mulse Dean of S. Martin le Grand, Chief Chamberlain of the Exchequer, Receiver and Keeper of the King's Treasure and Jewels; William Aylby Archdeacon of Northampton, Chancellor of the Exchequer; William Dighton Prebendary of St. Martin's, Clerk of the Privy-Seal; Richard Chesterfield Prebendary of St. Stephen's, Treasurer of the King's House; Henry Snatch Parson of Oundle, Master of the King's Wardrobe; John Newham Parson of Fenni-Stanton, one of the Chamberlains of the Exchequer, and Keeper of the Treasury and Jewels; John Ronsby Parson of Harwich, Surveyer and Controulor of the King's Works; Thomas Brittingham Parson of Aylby, Treasurer to the King for the Parts of Guines, and Marches of Calis; John Troys Treasurer of Ireland, a Priest, and beneficed there. These Men, who were destitute of Feminine Allurements to Expence and Pomp, and devoted to pious Thriftiness, were thought the fittest to be trusted with his Riches by this wise King.

Shortly after this<sup>c</sup> three Kings came to visit the King of England, the King of France, King of Scots, and King of Cyprus. The occasion of the French King's coming was chiefly to free some Hostages<sup>d</sup> that remained here, and to clear himself of the Imputations laid to him, for not observing the late Peace in all points; wherewith his Nobles were much discontented, and many Contests rose about it; so that in an Assembly of the States at Paris, certain Lords, whose Homages by the Treaty were due to the King of England, protested against it, alledging, 'That the King could not dispose of the Sovereignty of his Kingdom, nor alienate his Demesne, and therefore they would not submit to it. Nevertheless the French King, lest King Edward should look upon it as Contrivance between the King and his Subjects, published his Edict to command the Observation of the Treaty, and certified the King of England of it. Besides, he had resolv'd upon an Expedition to the Holy War, and desired to settle all things at Peace at home before his going. And these were the Occasions of his coming, and not his Love to the Countess of Salisbury<sup>e</sup>, as was imagined by some. But howsoever it was, this King shewed a strange Inclination to return to his Gaol, where he had endured so much Affliction, and where shortly after his coming he ended his Life<sup>f</sup>, much lamented of the King of England, who solemnly attended his Corps to Dover, from whence it was conveyed to S. Dennis, and there entomb'd with his Ancestors. The Debate for the Duchy of Britain was about this time ended by the Death of Charles de Blois, who was slain in a Battel near Vannes by John de Monfort, and the English Forces commanded by the Lord Latimer, Sir John Chandois, and Sir Hugh Caverley. John de Monfort marries Mary the Daughter of King Edward, and by his Consent did Homage for that Duchy to Charles now which is unwelcome to none but Soldiers, of which many, whom the War had bred, and Peace would not maintain, getting into strong Bodies in France, did much mischief, till a new Employment was found for them in the Spanish Wars, which happened soon after. A Company of them passed over into Italy under the Conduct of Sir John Haucut<sup>a</sup> a great Warriour, who found such Entertainment among the Princes there for the Restoration of military Discipline among them, and such Honour and Estate by his Valour, that his Fame remains to this Day, and his Statue (tho' he was but Tayler) is there set among their Princes, most memorable for Virtue and Actions. So able was England at that time to furnish the World with great Commanders.

1366. And now is this mighty King come to the fortieth Year of his Reign, which if it had been the last, he had dy'd the most glorious Prince of the World, having always hitherto had Fortune his Friend; but after this he suffer'd a Declination in his Glory, and his Age and Frailties brought some Blemishes upon his Actions. Charles V. King of France, furnam'd the Wise, having learned, by the Sufferings of his Father and himself, to manage a Crown before he had one, by his prudent Government got great advantages of him, and by the Advice of a wise Council, and good Conduct of his Wars by Gueselin, a Brittain, chosen Constable of France, recovered his Estate and Power.

Charles K. of France gains much from the K. of England.

1367. The Prince of Wales remaining in the Duchy of Aquitain, with a great Court, and many military Attendants, which had no Employment, was solicited by Peter King of Castile<sup>b</sup>, whom his Bastard-Brother Henry had driven from his Kingdom to assist him in recovering it; which the Prince, having obtained his Father's Consent, and being allured to, by the large Promises of Requitall made by the said Peter, undertakes. The Cause was much better than the Person. For this Peter, Son to Alphonfus II. King of Castile, was become intolerable to his Subjects, by his many tyrannical Cruelties acted upon them, oppressing and destroying his Nobles to enrich himself, and after murdering his Wife (who was the Duke of Bourbon's Daughter, and Sister to the present Queen of France) by the Instigation of his Concubine Maria de Padilla, whom he after marry'd. These Actions of his so incensed his People, that they adhering to his Bastard-Brother Henry, a more virtuous Prince, crown'd him King of Spain at Burgos, and forced Peter to fly his Kingdom. Peter being thus rejected of his People, and expelled his own Dominions, fled to the Prince of Wales, and obtained of him so much, that he went with an Army of thirty thousand, attended by his Brother John Duke of Lancaster, and many other English Lords, to re-invest him in his Kingdom. Henry had to support his Possession the French, under the Command of Gueselin Constable, and Dandreben<sup>c</sup> Marshal of France, besides so many Castilians, Christians and Sarazens, as made him up an Army of near an hundred thousand Men. Upon the Confines of Castile these Prince of Wales assists the King of Castile, and restores him to his Kingdom.

Princes and their Armies came to a Battel<sup>d</sup>, and the Prince had the Victory, Henry being put to flight, the French Captains taken Prisoners, and Peter placed upon his Throne again at Burgos. The Work being done, the Prince required the promised Reward, but Peter could not, nor would provide it; but having tired him with Delays, forced him at last to return to Burdeaux, without Money to pay his Army, and which was worst, without Health, which he never after recovered. This Success proved not fortunate to either. Peter, an ungrateful Tyrant, enjoy'd not his Right long, but was soon after dispossessed again, taken and put to Death. The Prince of Wales returning out of Spain without Reward, was forced to find out ways to content his Soldiers, who wanted their Pay; and imposed a new Tax upon the Gascoignes, of Feuage, or Chimney-money; which so discontented the People, that they exclaimed against the Government of the English, and appealed to the King and Court of France for Redress. The King of France, at the earnest request of the great Lords, and others, who by the late Treaty were obliged to hold of the Crown of England, sends a Gentleman to the Prince of Wales at Burdeaux, to summon him to answer to their Complaints before him and his Court at Paris<sup>e</sup>. At the same time also the Lords Arminiag<sup>f</sup>, D'Albert, Peregort, Cominges, and many others, made their Proteftations against the King of England, in behalf of the Crown of France, which, said they, they were by Nature to obey, and not a strange Prince; That it was against the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom to separate them from the Crown; That the Contract was made in Prison, and therefore constrained, and so not to be observed by the Right of Nations. So that they were resolved to spend their Lives and Estates, rather than be under the Government of England. And by their Example the Cities of the County of Pontbieu submitted themselves to Guy Count de S. Poll, and Guy de Chastillon. The King of England displeased with this Breach of the Treaty, complains to the Pope, and the Emperor Charles IV. who made a Journey into France on purpose to determine the Business, and reconcile the two Kings. The Ambassadors on both sides declared their Cause to him. The English alledged first, That this Treaty having been made more for the advantage of France than England, in that we resigned thereby not only our Title to Normandy, Tourain, and Anjou, the richest Countries of France, but our Title to the Crown, that we might have the Sovereign Dominion of the Duchy of Aquitain, the County of Pontbieu, with some other pieces, which by Right of Inheritance belonged to the Crown of England, whereby the Effusion of Christian Blood was prevented, France had Peace, and their King restored upon as reasonable Conditions as could be devised. Notwithstanding this, the French King (who himself, with all the Council of France, had agreed upon the Peace, and sworn to observe it) hath contrary to the Law of God and Nations (after he had gotten his Hostages by Fraud) seized upon the Duchy of Aquitain, and Country of Pontbieu, without denouncing War, &c. A. D. 1369. Reg. 43. French reply, 'That we by the Treaty ought to have immediately drawn our Army out of France, but did not during all King John's Reign, by which means the Peace was more offensive to them than the War, they being forced to purchase the departure of our Soldiers at more Charge than would have maintain'd an Army: So that the Breach was on our side. That King Edward was bound by it to renounce his Title to the Crown of France in an open Parliament of both Realms, which he had not done. And as to the Release of their King, they said, that it cost France more Gold than it did to redeem their King S. Lewis, with his Nobles and whole Army, when taken by the Solden of Egypt, an Infidel. Thus both sides defended themselves. But the French King (it seems) tho' willing to get in what he could of his Country, yet was unwilling to renew the War, and therefore courted the King of England to Peace by many Presents. But Edward seeing himself thus deluded, prepared to vindicate himself by the Sword; and having borrowed great Sums of Money of the Clergy, sends over John Duke of Lancaster, and Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, with a mighty Army to Callis, to invade France on this side, while the Prince of Wales endeavour'd to recover the revolted Towns of the other. But the Duke returned a little after without effect. Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was then sent over with fresh Supplies, but dy'd in the Journey. Sir Robert Knolls<sup>b</sup>, a Man highly celebrated in those times for his Conduct and Valour, was sent with another Army, consisting of many great Lords, who disdaining to be commanded by one that they accounted their Inferiour, overthrew themselves, and frustrated that Expedition. Thus the English lost their ground, and the French King grew greater both in Power and Alliance. For Margaret, the only Daughter and Heir of Lewis Earl of Flanders, to whom King Edward sought to match his Son Edmund, was won to marry Philip the Hardy Duke of Burgogne, Brother of the French King. This much vexed the King of England, who to revenge himself the better, calls a Parliament at Westminster, wherein he resumes his Claim to the Crown of France, and desires an Aid of his Subjects to recover it, and obtained it. The Clergy granted him fifty thousand Pound to be paid the same Year, and the Laity as much. For the levying of which every Parish in England was rated at first to pay 23 s. 4 d. (the Great to help the Leis) upon a Supposition there had been Parishes enough to have made up that Sum. But by a Certificate made in return to the King's Writs, sent out to enquire what Number of Parishes there were in every Shire, they found it came short, and then they rated every Parish at 5 l. 16 s. (the Greater to help the Leis) and so of 8600 Parishes found to be in the 37 Shires, 50181 l. 0 s. 8 d. was raised. But in regard of the great Poverty of Suffolk and Devonshire, the 181 l. was abated, and so the King received 50000 l. for the Laity. Upon the grant of this Supply, the King again confirmed<sup>d</sup> the great Charter, and the Charter of Forests, and promised that they should be observed in all points, which in most of his Parliaments was his first Act, as appears by the printed

Statutes. And now John Duke of Lancaster, and Edmund Earl of Cambridge, are sent with Forces into Aquitaine to assist the Prince of Wales, who after he had taken Limoges<sup>c</sup> that had revolted, his Health not holding out to perform any more, left the prosecution of the War to his Brother, and with his Wife, and young Son Richard, born at Burdeaux, returns home into England, and resigns to his Father the Dutchy of Aquitaine. The Duke of Lancaster, after the departure of the Prince, did little else but provide himself a Wife. For being a Widower by the Death of his Wife, who dy'd about two Years before, near the time of the Queen Philippa's Death, he marry'd Constantine the Daughter of Peter King of Castile, by whom he had (after her Father's Death) the empty Title of King of Castile and Leon, but left it to his Daughter to possess. For Katherine, whom he had by her, being marry'd to Henry the Grandson of the Usurper, Henry the Bastard, and in her Right now King of both those Realms, became Queen of Castile and Leon, and left her Posterity Kings of Spain. Edmund Earl of Cambridge marry'd at the same time Isabel the Daughter of King Peter, and both of them shortly after return'd into England, tho' without Victory, yet with Wives. Lionel Duke of Clarence, a little before, had marry'd Violenta, the Daughter of the Duke of Milan in Italy, where they feasted him so much, that he dy'd soon after. The City of Rochel, which yet held out for the English, had endured a long Siege both by Sea and Land; to relieve which important place, the Earl of Pembroke is sent with forty Ships well mann'd and victuall'd, and furnish'd with twenty thousand Marks to defray the Charge of the Voyage. But encountering the Spanish Armado, which was sent to aid the French in this Siege by Henry King of Castile, after a long and cruel Fight he was taken Prisoner, and his Navy utterly destroyed. King Edward himself, tho' now aged, sets forth with a mighty Army to recover these Losses, but lost the more, Winds and Fortune being against him to beat him back; so that all his Preparations, in which he had spent nine hundred thousand Marks, were to no purpose. Shortly after John Duke of Lancaster went over to Callis with another, which he led through France by the way of Avergne, and lost many of his People in the Mountains for want of Victuals, and almost all his Horse; so that he came to Burdeaux with his Army almost starv'd. After he had refreshed them well, he made some attempts upon the Enemy, but without effect; the Date of the English Victories was out, and all things were unsuccessful. The Duke returns the next Year, and all Gascoigne revolted, except Burdeaux and Bayon. King Edward obtained another Supply of the Parliament, a tenth of the Clergy, and fifteenth of the Laity, towards these Wars. But sought all means to end them by a Treaty; a very unlikely way to do any good. Yet two Years were spent therein at Burges and other places, at great Charges by Commissioners, and with much Debate. The French having now the advantage of the Time, would make their own Conditions, requiring Callis, and Restitution of great Sums of Money, which would not be granted. So that nothing but temporary Truces could be gotten,

A. D. 1373. and in them the Englifs and their Party had all ways the worst.

Reg. 47. Nor was the state of the King's Affairs better at home than abroad. The Sickness of the Prince K. Edward grew desperate, the Government disorder'd, the King in his Age mis'd, the Treasure exhausted, and all Affairs ill managed. A Parliament<sup>a</sup> was call'd at Westminster to cure these Evils, in which the King's Wants were laid open, and Supplies required; but the whole Body of that Assembly, weary of bearing such continual Burthens, instead of contributing, prefer Complaints, charging the King's Officers with Fraud, and humbly begging, that<sup>b</sup> the Duke of Lancaster, the Lord Latimer then Lord Chamberlain, Dame Alice Peirce the King's Concubine, and one Sir Richard Sturry, might be removed from Court. These Complaints and Desires were so vehemently urg'd by their Speaker, Sir Peter la Mare<sup>c</sup>, that the King, rather than not be supply'd, gave way to them, and all those Persons are immediately expell'd from Court. The Prince was thought to favour these proceedings, because there was no good Correspondence between him and his Brother the Duke of Lancaster, who manag'd all under his aged Father, and whose Ambition might be dangerous to his young Son Richard, whom he was like to leave to his Mercy. In this Parliament, the King being now in the 50th Year of his Reign, to gratifie his Subjects, granted another General Pardon, as a second Jubilee, only excepting William Wickham Bishop of Winchester, who was lately fallen under the King's Displeasure, through the procurement of the Duke of Lancaster, and forbidden to come to the Parliament. But this Jubilee was turn'd into Sorrow by the Death of the Prince of Wales, which happen'd while this Parliament sat: A great loss to the State, being a Prince endued with all excellent Virtues, and free from all Vices. His Death chang'd the face of Affairs. The late excluded Persons return to the Court, and their former Places; and so this Parliament (tho' call'd the good Parliament) produced ill effects by their Petitions. For Sir Peter de la Mare, at the Suit of Alice Peirce, an impudent Woman, was committed to a perpetual Imprisonment at Nottingham. The Duke of Lancaster is<sup>d</sup> enstat'd in the Regency, and manages all the Affairs of the Kingdom. But King Edward, to prevent the mischiefs which might arise by disordering of the Succession, providently settled the same in Parliament upon Richard of Burdeaux, creating him first Earl of Chester and Cornwall, and then Prince of Wales; which made much for his Safety against the Designs which the Duke of Lancaster had form'd to supplant him. For this Confirmation by the Parliament, which he had offended, and the Breach he had with the Londoners soon after, deterr'd him from so much as attempting that which his Son in the next Reign effected. But yet in the Station he was in under his Father, he play'd the King very much, and carry'd himself very imperiously. And first he shews his Authority upon the Earl of March, commanding him to go over to guard Callis, and the parts adjoyning, which the Earl refused, and chose rather to lay down his Office of Earl Marshal, than obey his Command in that. His Office the Duke gave to Sir Henry Percy, one of his intimate Friends. About this time the Parliament met again at Westminster, (whether it was a new one, or the last prorogued, I know not) and thither the Duke himself brings Prince Richard (being about eleven Years old) and places him in the King's Seat, having taught him to demand a Subsidy, which was two Tenths to be paid in one Year, or Twelve-pence in the Pound of all Merchandises sold for one Year, and one Pound of Silver for every Knight's Fee, and of every Fire-House one Penny. And this Demand the Duke earnestly urged, saying, 'That one of them must of necessity be granted, because the Enemy had proclaimed War, and purposed to invade the Realm. The Knights of the Parliament (who were all pack'd by the Duke, as 'tis said, except twelve, which he could not remove) required a time to give their Answer, and so a day was appointed. The major part made choice of one Hungerford, a Creature of the Duke's, to give their Answer. The other would have Sir Peter de la Mare to be enlarged, and deliver theirs, and answer to what could be objected against him before the Lords in Parliament, and submit to their Judgment. Then the Duke demanded Aid of the Bishops, but they refused to treat about it, without their Brother the Bishop of Winchester, who was prohibited from coming to the Parliament; and so nothing was obtained, and the Duke disappointed, which he shew'd no small Resentment of afterwards.

Another Accident happen'd now, which much interrupted this and all other Affairs. A certain Divine, named John Wickliffe, being depriv'd of the Archbishop of Canterbury of a Benefice in Oxford, which he was found unjustly to hold, grew thereupon discontented, (an Humour which generally breeds Schisms) enveighed in his Sermons, and other Acts in the Schools, against the Abuses of Churchmen, Monks, and other Religious Orders, (which were indeed not so free from Scandal, but that they deserved blame) and had by <sup>d</sup> He was a Knight of Herefordshire, but not Speaker of this Parliament, as Walsingham and Daniell after him erroneously relate. Chron. Eves.

<sup>e</sup> This Bishop had divulg'd, that the Duke of Lancaster was not the King's Son, and that the Queen her self told him in Confession so; which coming to the Duke's Ear, he caus'd him to be depriv'd of his Bishoprick, his Goods to be confiscated, and himself injoynd not to come within twenty Miles of London.

<sup>g</sup> Contrary to the Order of this Parliament, which provided, that since the King through Age and Weakness was unable to govern the Realm, twelve of the most sage and discreet Lords should dispose of all National Affairs under him, by six at a time.

<sup>h</sup> Mr. Daniell seems to have taken up an Account of John Wickliffe's Preaching, and other Circumstances, from his Enemies the Monks. He represents him little better than a poor Parish-Priest, so streightned for Preferment, that he wrongfully seiz'd upon another's Benefice; and because he was justly depriv'd of it, meerly out of Anger and Discontent, he broach'd a Schism, and factiously maintain'd several Anti-papistical Doctrines. But the truth is far otherwise: For tho' his Parentage be not known to us, yet his Education and Life is manifest enough. He was brought up in Merton-College in Oxford, where he took his Degrees to Doctor of Divinity, and perform'd all his Exercises with great applause, according to the Reputation he had for Learning in that Unversity. He was once sent Ambassador by this King to the Pope, and his Commission is extant in Mr. Fox, p. 390. and bears Date July 26. 1391. He was Reader in Divinity several Years in Oxford, and was only through force of Truth induc'd to hold the Doctrines against the Real Presence, Pilgrimages, Purgatory, &c. He had a Living in Oxford, where through Zeal to reform the Church, he preach'd the same Doctrine, and so enrag'd the Monks, that they procur'd Simon Sudbury Archbishop of Canterbury to silence and deprive him. Several Noblemen favour'd and encourag'd him, if for any politic ends, 'twas their fault; we find not that he us'd their Favour for any Interest, but to defend himself in Preaching the divine Truth. We wonder Mr. Daniell shou'd not have inform'd himself better of Wickliffe's Condition. Mr. Wood in his Antiq. Oxon. c. 1. p. 184, 186. says, He was Warden of Canterbury College in Oxford.

A. D. his Doctrine there and at London, gotten himself many Followers (who after were called in 1376. Contempt Lollards) professing Poverty, going Reg. 50. bare-footed, and poorly clad in Ruffet; which made them (as Extrems usually are) the more noted, and get the more into the Opinion of the People, who are apt to embrace Novelties, and usually beguiled with Disguises, being more apt to believe than judge. Among other his Doctrines he taught, That neither any King nor Temporal Lord could give any thing in Perpetuity to Church-men; and that Temporal Lords, if they needed, might lawfully take away the Goods of such Religious Persons to relieve themselves in their Necessities by the Example of William Rufus, &c. A Doctrine very pleasing to great Men, who embrace Sects, either thro' Ambition to get, or Fear of losing, or thro' Hatred, that they may revenge themselves. This Man, the Duke of Lancaster, and Sir Henry Percy, much favour'd and encourag'd, extolling him both for his Learning and Integrity of Life; which so embolden'd him, that he daily in one Church or other publish'd his Opinions freely: Whereupon, at length, he is cited to answer before the Archbishop and Bishop of London, and others in S. Paul's. At the day appointed the Duke of Lancaster and Lord Marshal went to conduct him, and by the way he was animated by his Followers not to fear the Bishops. When they came to S. Paul's the Preb was so great, that hardly any Passage could be made into the Church; whereupon the Marshal using some Violence, thrust in among the People; which Courtney the Bishop of London observing, forbade him to do, saying, 'If he had known that he would have behav'd himself so in that place, he should not have come into it. The Duke hearing these words, angrily replied, 'That the Marshal should execute his Authority whether he would or not. When they were come to our Lady's Chapel, the Duke, Barons, and Bishops sitting down; John Wickliff being sent for in by the Lord Marshal, was by him desired to sit down, because as he said, The Man had much to answer to, and needed a convenient Seat. The Bishop of London told him, That it was against all Law and Reason, that a Person cited before his Ordinary should sit, and thereupon angry words arose between the Lord Marshal and the Bishop. The Duke takes the Marshal's part, and sharply reprov'd the Bishop, and the Bishop returns the like to the Duke; who in great Rage, seeing he could not prevail, swore, 'That he would pull down the Pride of of him, and all the Bishops of England: And tho' you trust, said he, to your Parentage, that shall do you no Service. The Bishop answer'd, 'I trust not in my Parents, nor any Man living, but in God only, in whom I ought to trust. The Duke, as if he whisper'd in his Ear, told him, 'That he had rather pull him out of the Church by the Hair of the Head, than suffer such Indignities and Affronts; which Words the Londoners over-hearing, swore with a loud Voice, 'They would lose their Lives, rather than suffer their Bishop to be thus injur'd, and threaten'd to be pull'd out of his own Church. And their Fury was the greater towards the Duke, because the day before in the Parliament (of which he was President) it was requir'd in the King's Name, that from thenceforth there should be no more a Mayor of London, but a Captain appointed for the Government of the City, and that the

Lord Marshal of England should arrest Offenders A. D. within the Liberties, as in other places. About 1377. this Business, and the Wrong offer'd to their Bishop, Reg. 51. the Citizens assembled the next day, to consult among themselves what to do; which, as they were concerting upon, the Lord Fitz-Walter and Guido Brian, came into the City. The People seeing them, furiously ran to them, and had like to have fall'n foul upon them for coming unsent for at that time: But the Lord Fitz-Walter protested, That he came for no other end, but to offer his Service to the City, being by Inheritance their Standard-bearer; and therefore thought himself oblig'd to take all Injuries offer'd to them as done to himself, and desir'd them to stand upon their own Defence. At this The Citizens assault the Marshal's Inn, and breaking open the Gates brought forth a Prisoner in his Shackles, and set him at Liberty, but found not the Lord Marshal, whom they sought, being at Dinner that day with the Duke at John de Trespas's House. Then did the furious Multitude run to assault the Savoy, the Duke's House; which a Knight of the Duke's Retinue seeing, went in haste to the Place where the Duke dined to acquaint him with this Uproar in the City. The Duke hearing it, leaps so hastily from the Table, that he broke both his Shins against the Form, and with Sir Henry Percy, passes over by Boat to Kensington near Lambeth, to the Prince and Princess his Mother, to complain of the Violence offer'd him by a riotous Rabble of the Citizens. In the mean time, the Multitude coming to the Savoy met a Priest, who being inquisitive to know the Business they were about, was answer'd, 'They were going to take the Duke and Lord Marshal, and compel them to release Sir Peter de la Mare from his unjust Imprisonment. The Priest replied, 'That Sir Peter was a Traitor to the King, and deserv'd to be hang'd. The Rabble at these words cry'd out, 'This is Percy, the Traytor to England, his Speech betrays him, tho' in Disguise, and presently they fell upon him and kill'd him. The Bishop of London hearing of this Tumult, leaves his Dinner, and goes in haste to the Savoy; where he admonishing the People to be mindful of the Holy Time of Lent, and beseeching them for the Love of Christ to desist from such seditious Attempts, and assuring them that all things should be ended for the Good of the City: He so pacified them that they forbore to assault the Duke's House, having missed of his Person, whom in their Fury they had certainly destroyed, if they met with him, as also the Lord Marshal; but to shew their Anger, they hung up his Arms revers'd in Sign of Treason, in all the principal Streets of the City. The Princess, from Kensington, sent Albert de Vere, Lewis Clifford, and Simon Burleigh, to the Citizens to persuade them to make their Peace with the Duke. They returned Answer, 'That for her Honour they would do whatever she commanded, but enjoyn'd the Messengers to require the Duke to suffer the Bishop of Winchester and Sir Peter de la Mare to have their lawful Tryal according to the Custom of England. They sent likewise some of their chief Men to the sick King to excuse themselves for this Tumult; protesting, 'That they were not privy to it, but endeavour'd all they could to suppress it, but could not do it, because the whole Commonalty were in a Commotion; being inform'd, That all their Liberties were likely to be taken from them by Parliament. The King

prive them of their Liberties, but desired rather to enlarge them; and therefore required them to rest satisfied, and keep their People in Peace and order, which upon this Answer they easily did. But they could not hinder Rhymes and Libels (those secret Stings of Discontent) which were spread daily about the City to defame the Duke, and make him odious to the People; for which the Duke caused the Authors to be excommunicated by the Bishops. dious as well to himself as the King, yet the Commons being assembled in Parliament, granted the King a Tax, upon condition that being levied, it should be put into the hands of certain Earls and Barons to be disposed of according to the Occasions of the King and Kingdom. This Tax was perfectly new; every Person, Man and Woman, within the Kingdom above fourteen Years of Age, was to pay 4 d. a Head, those that lived upon Alms only excepted. The Clergy likewise granted 12 d. a Head for every Person beneficed, and 4 d. for all other Religious Persons: A mighty and unknown Aid, never granted to any King before, but a Precedent to the following Reigns; in the next of which it caused the greatest popular Insurrection, that ever was seen in the Kingdom. And so the Parliament ended, but not the Duke's Displeasure against the City: For the Mayor and Aldermen were brought before the King at Shene, and advised to submit themselves to the Duke, and crave Pardon for their grievous Offences. They protest as before, That they could not stop the Rage of the Multitude, who committed those Insolencies, and beseeching the King not to punish them who were innocent and ignorant of the Fact; promised the Duke to use all means that they could to bring in the Malefactors, and oblige them to satisfy his Honour, and more they could not do. Upon this Answer, they were sent from the Court, and shortly after put from their Places by the Duke's Power: Sir Nicholas Brember was made Mayor instead of Adam Staple, and other Aldermen put in their Places. The King was desirous to have reconciled them to his Son, but Sickness disabled him from his Design, Death forced him to give over the World by its near Approaches. At his last Moment, when he stood most in need of Attendants, tho' they did not of him, he was deserted by all; his Concubine packing up all she could lay her hands on, even to the Rings of his Fingers, left him; which tho' a very bad Example, and like such a Woman's, yet was imitated by his Counsellors and Attendants, who forsook him and left the Room where he lay a dying empty; which a poor Priest*, who was passing by observing, enter'd, and going to the King's Bed-side, whom he found sensible, he besought him to remember his Saviour, and beg pardon of his Offence, (which none before would do) and so wrought upon him by his Advice, that he resign'd his last Breath, with many Signs of a sound Faith and hearty Repentance, at his Manour of Richmond (or Shene) June 21. His Character, of Justice.

He was a Prince best known by his Actions, the soonest a Man, and the longest that held so of any we read. He was of a comely Personage, of a good and graceful Stature, affable and courteous, well expressing himself. He was a great Lover of Justice, Order, and his People, the chief Vertues of a King. His Justice he shew'd in making so many Statutes for the Execution of it, and the Oaths he caused his Justices to take for that end, and the severe Punishment he inflicted upon his Judges (viz. Sir Henry Green, and Sir William Shipwith) for their Corruptions. He also better'd the Form of publick Justice, which his Grandfather began, and settled it so as it remains to this day. His Care of the Order of the Nation is proved from so many Laws made to restrain Excesses in all kinds. His Love to his People he expressed by often easing their Grievances, and Willingness to give them Satisfaction at all times, particularly in granting the Observation of their Charters in most of his Parliaments; and when (Anno Reg. 14.) they were jealous, that upon his assuming the Title of King of France he would subject England to that Crown; he passed a Statute to clear their Doubts, that this Kingdom should remain entire as before, without any Violation of their Privileges. He was very circumspect in all his Actions, never undertaking any thing but what he had means to perform; which his Subjects knowing, yielded him more Taxes readily, than any of his Predecessors had before him, and he was as careful to expend them for the Good and Honour of the Kingdom. He was indeed covetous to get Money, but without the oppressing any Man, as his Grandfather did the Judges, Jews, and his other Officers. His Gifts were never profuse, or misplaced, so as to hurt his Treasure, Fame, or Reverence with his People. In fine, he was a Prince who knew his Work, and did it; and therefore was he better obeyed, more respected, and better served than any of his Predecessors.

His Works of Piety were many. He founded the Abby of Eastminster for Cisterians, near the Tower, a Nunnery at Deptford; the King's Hall in Cambridge for poor Scholars; an Hospital at Callis, and S. Stephen's Chapel at Westminster, and the Church he endowed with 300 l. per Annum. He enlarged the Chapel at Windsor, and made a Provision not only for the Churchmen, but twenty four poor Knights. These were his publick Works, the best Monuments to perpetuate the Memories of Princes. Besides these, his private Buildings were many; as the Castle of Windsor, which he re-edified and enlarged, the Castle of Quinborough, Fortifications at Callis, and other Places. He shewed his Magnificence in his Triumphs and Feasts, which were sumptuous, with all due Rites and Ceremonies to preserve Reverence and Majesty. To conclude, He was a Prince whose Nature was so suitable to his Office, as if he were made only for it. His Failures are to be imputed to Age, in which Princes are never happy, their Vigour and Fortune departing usually together. His Queen was a Lady of excellent Vertue, who tho' she brought him little or no Estate, yielded him much Content, some Alliance and a fair Issue. She conspired to advance his Honour and Power, and was very gracious and loving to the Nation, doing many pious Actions; among which, Queens College in Oxford is a Monument of her Goodness and Name. She bare him seven Sons, of whom five lived to have Children; Edward Prince of Wales,

From him the Title of the Line of York to the Crown was deriv'd by his Daughter Philippa, marry'd to Edmund Mortimer, by whom she had Roger Mortimer, whose Daughter and Heir Isabella in Right of the Lady Philippa, on the Death of Richard the Second was Heir to the Crown.

no Issue. Thus we have seen the beginning and end A. D. of this great King: He stepp'd over his Father's 1377. Head to the Throne, which tho' it was not his Reg. 51. Fault, yet had its Punishment in that he had a plentiful Issue, but had no Son of his own to sit on his Throne, but left his Crown to a Child of eleven Years of Age, expos'd to the Ambition of his Uncles, to a factious and discontented People, and broken and shatter'd Inheritances abroad, having Lost all his gettings in France, but Callis.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Edward III.

IN the fourth Year of his Reign, on the 16th of July, there happen'd a great Eclipse of the Sun, and the Rains were so violent this Year, that the Harvest did not begin till Michaelmas. At Christmas a mighty Westerly Wind overthrew several private Houses and publick Edifices, tore Trees up by the Roots, and did a vast deal of Mischiefe.

In his 9th Year the Rains were so fatal, that the Corn was spoil'd, a Dearth ensu'd, Wheat being sold for 40 s. a Quarter as much as 20 s. a Bushel now, and the Cattel was destroy'd by a Murrain.

In the 12th Year it rain'd almost continually from the beginning of October to the beginning of December, and then came a Frost upon it, which lasted twelve Weeks; yet, tho' the Corn was destroy'd by it in a great measure, the War with Scotland, says my Author, made Money so scarce, that all sorts of Grain were sold at a reasonable Rate.

In his 13th Year one hundred and twenty Laymen and several Priests, besides Women, were drown'd by an Inundation of Water at Newcastle upon Tyne.

While the Battel of Cressy was fighting, in the 20th Year of his Reign, there fell a violent Storm of Hail, accompany'd with an Eclipse, and terrible Thunders, at which time prodigious Flights of Crows hover'd over the English and French Armies.

In his 22d Year it rain'd from Midsummer to Christmas so constantly, that there was not one Day or Night dry together. This wet Season caus'd great Floods, and a Pestilence, which rag'd for a whole Year: The Earth was at the same time barren, and even the Sea did not produce such Plenty of Fish as formerly. The Mortality was so great, that in the City of London two hundred Corps were bury'd every Day in the Charterhouse-yard, besides those interr'd in other common burying Places, and this lasted from Candlemas to Easter.

His 27th Year was remarkable for the Scarcity of Corn and Provisions in England and France, occasion'd by a great Drought: 'Twas call'd the Dear Summer, Rye was brought out of Zealand to support the Poor, who otherwise must have perish'd for want of Sustenance.

In his 34th Year Men and Beasts were destroy'd in several Parts of England by Thunder and Lightning; many Houses were burnt and ruin'd by it, and strange Sightings were also seen. The second Mortality happen'd, so call'd to distinguish it from that we have mention'd already: This latter was the more remarkable, because it seiz'd generally on Men; and in the same Year, if we may give Credit to the Continuator of Nic. Trivet's History, two Castles were seen in the Air, the one in the South-east the other in the South-west, out of which Castles about Noon there seem'd to fall several Troops of arm'd Men. The Band that came forth of the Castle in the South-east appear'd in White, and the other in Black: They fought for some time, the White conquer'd at first but in the end the Black got the Victory.

In his 39th Year the Rains were again violent, and a great Dearth and Pestilence follow'd: Flights of Sparrows fought in the Air, and many of them dropp'd dead down to the Ground.

Caxton.

In his 42d Year a Comet appear'd in March between the North and West, the Beams were darted towards France, and were thought to preface new Troubles to that Kingdom in the following Year. The Western Parts of England, and Oxford particularly, were sorely afflicted with a Pestilence.

This King's Reign, as it was Glorious in Arms, so it was renown'd for the Arts and Sciences which flourish'd in his Days more than in any of the former Reigns since the Norman Invasion.

Edward the Black Prince, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Henry Duke of Lancaster his Father-in-Law, Edmund Earl of Cambridge afterwards Duke of York; the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Huntington, the Earl of Salisbury, the Earl of Stafford, the Earl of Northampton, the Earl of Arundel; the Lord Cobham, the Lord Basset, the Lord Thomas Holland, the Lord Walter De Manny, the Lord Spencer, the Lord Chandois, the Lord James Audley; Sir John Copland, Sir Thomas Felton, the Capital de Beuse Knight of the Garter, born in Gascoign; Sir Robert Knolles, Sir Hugh Calverly, Sir Thomas Piercy, Sir Hugh Hastings, Sir Baldwin Freville, Sir John Harleston, Sir James Pipe, Sir Thomas Dagworth, and Sir John Hawkwood, were all of them famous for their brave Actions in War: As those that we are about to name, were for their Vertue and Learning, John Bacontbrope, Doctor of both Laws in the Universities of Oxford and Paris; William

† From him by the Marriage of Blanch, sole Heiress of Henry Duke of Lancaster, Son of Henry Earl of Lancaster, Son of Edmund Earl of Lancaster, Brother to Edward the first, was deriv'd the Title of the Lancastrian Family to the Crown; which the three Henry's successively enjoy'd, as Heirs of that Family, but yet with much War and Bloodshed, as we shall see in the Course of this History. This Title was very little made use of, and indeed was a very weak one; for all the Sons of Edward the third, and the Posterity of Edmund Earl of Kent, Son of Edward the first, had a Prior Title to the Descendants of Edmund Earl of Lancaster, younger Brother to Edward the first.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF RICHARD II.

1377.
Reg. 1.

His Age and Descent.

The Duke of Lancaster and Londoners reconcil'd.

RICHARD II. surnam'd of Burdeaux, a City in the Province of Guienne in France, because he was born there, when his Father, the most illustrious English Hero, Edward the Black-Prince was Duke of Aquitain, succeeded his Grandfather Edward III. in the Throne of England, June 21. 1377. He was but eleven Years old when he began his Reign; but there appear'd in him so great a pregnancy of Wit above his Years, and so sweet a Disposition, set off with an admirable Beauty and proportion of Body, that the People were enamour'd with him, and as if the Virtues of both his immediate Ancestors were united in him, received him for their King with universal Joy and Satisfaction; the loss of their brave Prince Edward III. so lately deceased, was quite forgotten, being swallow'd up with the hopes of that Happiness which they promised themselves under this his Successor. And indeed their high Opinion of this young Prince was much confirm'd by the first Action which he undertook after he was King, viz. the Reconciliation of the Duke of Lancaster and City of London, in which he shew'd a Prudence and Moderation much above his Age. For whereas the Citizens, who had gotten a certain Information of the King's approaching Death, had made an Address to him, then Prince of Wales, the day before his Grandfather's decease, assuring him of their Service and Fidelity, if their present King should die, and petitioning his Highness to mediate between his Uncle the Duke of Lancaster and them; he return'd them not only promises of his Love and Favour to their City, but of his Endeavours to effect their Desires; and accordingly the very next day spoke to his Uncle about it, and brought him to submit to his Decision. Of which he gave the Citizens notice immediately by the Lord Latimer, Sir Richard Adderbury, Sir Simon Burley Prince Richard's Tutor, and Sir Nicholas Bond, whom he sent on purpose upon that Message, and to tell them, that he expected the like Submission from them. The Citizens were a little afraid, lest the Influence which the Duke had upon him might prove to their disadvantage, if they should leave the matter entirely to his Judgment; but Sir Richard Adderbury giving them hopes of a good Conclusion, brought them to yield; and so certain Aldermen going along with them to him (then King) at Stene near Richmond, were reconciled honourably to the Duke in the Name of the whole City; and in favour to them, the King also released Sir Peter de la Mare from his Imprisonment, and receiv'd him into his special Grace.

The only thing which threaten'd a disturbance to the Nation being thus compos'd, the next Care was to settle the Crown upon the young King's Head; and to that end, June 16. was appointed for his Coronation. This the Nation took for a fit opportunity of testifying their Affections to him; and therefore all things by general consent were so prepared, that it might be as magnificent and splendid as possible. The Duke of Lancaster, who for his Dukedom of Lancaster, and Earldoms of Leicester and Lincoln, was admitted upon his Claim to be High Steward, Bearer of the King's chief Sword, call'd Curtana, and Carver at that Solemnity, (which two last Offices he executed by his Deputies the Earls of Darby and Stafford) held the Steward's Court several days in Westminster-Hall, to receive the Claims of such Persons as by certain Tenures or Custom were to officiate at that Ceremony, and such as were of an inferior degree, he put Noblemen into their places, that none but Persons of the best Quality might attend upon the King at it. On the day before the Coronation, the King rode through the City to Westminster in great State, and being royally attended by his Nobles and Great Men, the Citizens in his passage gave him large demonstrations of their Loyalty and Affections, having adorn'd their Houses with rich Tapestry, and erected several costly Pageants, the Conduits ran Wine, and the People in crowds saluted the King with loud Acclamations, and wishes of Blessings and Prosperity. The Duke of Lancaster, and the Lord Peirey, who rode before the King, behav'd themselves with so much Obligingness and Respect to the Citizens all along, that all the Spectators were fully persuaded, that the late Reconciliation made between the City and them was real and hearty. The King lodged at Westminster that night, and the next day was crown'd in the Abby-Church, by Simon Sudbury Archbishop of Canterbury, with the usual Ceremonies of Anointing, giving him the Sword of Justice, taking an Oath of him for the good Government of the Nation, and requiring the People's Consent to have him for their King. After his Coronation, the King return'd to Westminster-Hall to Dinner; but before he sat down, he created four Earls, viz. His Uncle Thomas Woodstocke, Earl of Buckingham and Northampton; Thomas Mowbray, the younger Brother of John Lord Mowbray Earl of Nottingham; Guisbald Angolism, a Gascoigne, his Tutor, Earl of Huntington; and Henry Peirey, Son of Henry Lord Peirey Earl of Northumberland; allowing his Uncle and Tutor a thousand Marks a Year a-piece out of his Treas-fury,

A. D. 1377. Value. He also made at the same time nine Reg. 1. Knights. The next day was celebrated a very devout Procession by the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots and Clergy, to pray for the Peace of the Realm, and prosperous Reign of the King. Thomas Brinton Bishop of Rochester preach'd, and in his Sermon pathetically exhorted all Men to Peace and Unity, conjuring all of a superiour degree to deal gently with the Commons, and the People to obey their Superiors willingly; but most of all, the Nobility, who were to be about the King, to give him a Religious and Virtuous Example, lest the King being either by their Flattery or Vices misled, the People should have cause to curse them. Thus was the young King fully settled in his Throne; but because he was himself, by reason of his tender Age, unable to rule, the Government was committed to the Care of the King's Mother<sup>a</sup>, his two Uncles, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, and Edmund Earl of Cambridge, and certain Bishops, who were as well to provide for the Security and Happiness of the Nation, as the Education of the King.

The French and Scots infest the Nation. But notwithstanding the ordering and supreme disposal of all things was put into so many hands, and those of such Persons, whose Conscience, Interest and Honour were obliged to manage all Affairs, for the good both of the King and People; yet as if a Kingdom could never be govern'd well by Guardians, or as if many Governours were very little better than none, the old Enemies of the Nation, the French and Scots, thought the Minority of the King a fit opportunity to annoy and spoil it. The French, who had been making Preparations for that end in King Edward's Reign, and had mann'd out a Fleet just before his Death, to revenge all the Losses they had suffer'd by his victorious Sword, entred the narrow Seas immediately after his decease, and while the Nation was busied in settling their new King, invaded the Coasts of England, and did much mischief, which they continu'd for several Months without opposition.

Ry and the Isle of Wight plunder'd and burnt. On S. Peter's day, June 29. they put in with fifty Sail at Ry in Sussex, and having rifled and plundered the Town at their pleasure, set it on Fire, and so departed, leaving the miserable and helpless Inhabitants to quench the Flames with their Tears.<sup>b</sup> From hence they coasted to the Isle of Wight, and enter'd it without Resistance. The Houses they spoil'd of all such Goods as were valuable, and easily carry'd to their Ships, but spared the Buildings from burning, having compounded with the People of the Isle for a thousand Marks to forbear that Cruelty; and so left it, sooner perhaps than they intended, because they could not, after several attempts, make themselves Masters of the Castle of Carisbrook, which was bravely defended against them by the valiant Governor of it, Sir Hugh Tyrrell. From hence they return'd back to do the like at Winchelsea, supposing that the terror of the Sufferings of their neighbouring Town of Ry would have made it an easie Prey to them, but they found the contrary at their coming. For the Abbot of Battel, being a Man of Courage, and some Skill in Warlike Affairs, had so fortify'd and mann'd the Town for its defence, that the French could gain no entrance into it; yet supposing it to be easily taken, they sent to the Abbot to redeem it from Assault; but the Abbot return'd them answer, That he had no reason to redeem what was not lost. The French hereupon having in vain endeavour'd to draw the Defendants out of the Town to a pitch Battel in the Fields, feil to battering the Walls with such Engines and Warlike Instruments as they had brought with them on purpose, but with no success. So that they were forced to leave the Town with little advantage. But in the mean time they sent a Party to Hastings, which finding almost void of People, who were gone to maintain the Siege of Winchelsea, they burnt and utterly consumed it. Their next attempt was upon the small Town of Rottington in Sussex, near Lewis, where the Prior of Lewis, Sir John Falesley, Sir Thomas Cheyney, and one Mr. Brookes, so zealous for the preservation of their Country, that they did not consider what Forces they had to do it with, encountred them boldly with an unarm'd and undisciplin'd Rabble; and tho' they kill'd many of their Enemies, yet were in the end beaten, the Prior and Knights, with some others, being taken Prisoners, and an hundred slain. Many other Towns they plunder'd and robb'd, as Portsmouth, Dartmouth, and Plymouth; by the Spoils of all which, having fill'd their Ships, they return'd home; and soon after their arrival, besieged the Castle of Arde,<sup>c</sup> which they got not by their own Valour, but the Treason of the Lord Gurney, a German, the Governour of it, who for a Bribe resign'd it to them. But he had but small Enjoyment of his base Gain, being soon taken by Sir Hugh Calverley Governour of Callis, and sent into England to suffer the deserved Punishment of his Treachery. The Scots in the mean time were not idle, (tho' not so mischievous as the French desired them) for they assaulted the Town and Castle of Roxborough, then in the possession of the English, and having gain'd it with no small loss to themselves, took what was of any price out of it, and then burnt it. Thus was the Nation miserably afflicted by a double Enemy, and little or no care taken to secure the People from them; whether out of negligence, design, or want of Shipping, or whether it was forborn till a Parliament could meet, and provide some more effectual Remedy against them, is uncertain; yet the Duke of Lancaster, who had the chief Management of publick Affairs, brought an incurable Odium upon himself from the People ever after, because he did not endeavour their Relief so diligently as his Place and the People's Necessities required.

About Michaelmas a Parliament met, to rectifie the Disorders, and provide for the Security of the Nation, the first thing they went upon<sup>d</sup> was the punishment of Alice Peirce, the late King's Concubine, who had been the cause of many Mischiefs in the last Reign, and for that end had been banish'd from the Court, and made to take an Oath, that she would never return again; but, as it generally happens, that those who allow themselves in one Sin, seldom make any Conscience of committing another, she kept her Oath no longer than the fear of the Parliament was removed; she became as great at Court, and as insolent as before, and caus'd Sir Peter de la Mare, the Speaker of the House of Commons, to be imprison'd. These impudent Actions the Parliament thought fit to

<sup>d</sup> It was not the first thing they went upon. The first was upon the Petition of the Commons, to appoint a Council to be joy'd with the King's Officers, and to advise him in the Affairs of the Government. These Counsellors were appointed by the Parliament, viz. the Bishops of London, Carlisle, and Salisbury, the Earls of March and Stafford, Sir Richard de Stafford and Sir Henry I'Escrop Bannorets, Sir John Deverause and Sir Hugh Degrave Knights. The next thing the Commons did, was to grant the Tax desir'd, and then they prosecuted Alice Peirce, or Parrers. Rot. Par. 1 Rich. 2.

A. D. 1377. take notice of, and Sir Peter de la Mare contributed his utmost to have them punish'd, which was by general consent thus agreed upon: That the should be banish'd, and all her Goods confiscated, which was immediately done. Then the Necessity of a Tax being made known to them, to provide a Navy for the defence of the Kingdom, against the Invasion of the French, and their Confederates the Spaniards, there was granted to the King two Tenths of the Clergy, and two Fifteenths from the Laity; yet upon these Conditions, that the Monies collected should be deposited in the hands of two eminent Citizens of London, William Walworth and John Philpott, who were to take care that they were expended for the publick Good: 2. That for the future the King should maintain his State and Wars out of his own Revenues, which if well manag'd were judg'd sufficient to maintain both. The Laws which the King made in Compensation of this Tax, for the good of the People were several. He confirm'd the Great Charter<sup>b</sup>, Charter of Forests, and the many good Laws of his Ancestors unrepeal'd; and enacted, 'That the Peace should be carefully preserved, and Justice impartially done to all his Subjects; That the Prelates, and the rest of the Clergy, should have a Remedy by Action of Trespass against all Purveyors, who contrary to the Laws of his Predecessors, did without their consent take away their Corn, Hay, Beasts, or Carriages from their Houses, Mannours, or Granges for the King's use, and should recover treble Damages; That Persons that shall maintain any Quarrels, if Officers of the King's Exchequer, or other Courts, shall lose their places, and others be fined at the King's pleasure; That all Persons that shall arrest any Clergyman in his Church, or the Church-yard, or while he is performing divine Service, shall suffer Imprisonment, and be ransom'd at the King's Will, but shall first make satisfaction to the Person arrested. The King also confirm'd the Pardon granted by his Grandfather in the fiftieth Year of his Reign. In this Parliament it was farther moved, 'That the Clergy might be restrain'd by Statute from imposing Money-penance upon Offenders, because by this means the Church exhausted the Treasure of the Nation. The Clergy hotly opposed the Proposition, and the King unwilling to disoblige the Churchmen, order'd, 'That the Prelates should proceed therein as formerly, according to the Canons of Holy Church, and not otherwise. But tho' the Commons could not prevail in the restraint of their own Clergy's Exactions, they were more successful in opposing the Pope's Encroachments; for they obtained several Acts, whereby it was order'd, 'That the Pope's Collectors shall gather the first Fruits of Benefices in this Realm no longer, and that the Clergy should not pay them; That no Man should procure any Benefice by provision from Rome, on pain of being put out of the King's Protection; That no Englishman farm any such Benefice of any Alien, on the like penalty. In it 'tis said, the French had six thousand Pound yearly from England by such Benefices; That a Remedy be provided against the Pope's Reservations of Dignities Elective, they being against the Treaty made with the Pope by King Edward III. These Matters being thus settled and debated, the Parliament broke up about the Feast of All Saints.

After the Parliament was risen, the Governours of the Nation being enabled to act against the Enemy, began to think upon some ways to revenge the last Summer's Losses, sustain'd by the People from the French; and having received Information, that the Spanish-Fleet lay at Sluce in Flanders, richly laden with Wines, and other Commodities, and waiting only for a fair Wind to return, they sent out a great Fleet, under the Command of the Duke of Britain, Earl of Buckingham, the Lords Latimer and Fitz-Walter, Sir Robert Knolles, and other chosen Captains, to intercept them in their passage; but by contrary Winds they were so dispers'd and shatter'd, that they could at that time effect nothing. A little after Christmas, Sir Hugh Calverly Governour of Callis was more fortunate in his Adventures against the French. For making an Inroad towards Bulloigne, he plunder'd twenty-six Vessels, besides Barges, which lay in the Haven, and a great part of the Suburbs of that Town; and in his return, drove along with him into Callis a great Booty of Sheep and Oxen, which he found in the Pastures adjoyning, to the great enriching of his Garrison. He also recover'd the Castle of S. Mark, on the same day the French had it betray'd to them by the Picards, whom Sir Hugh homag'd. Not long after, Sir Hugh with his Garrison Soldiers made an attempt upon the Town of Estaples on the Fair-day, when the Merchants of Paris, Amiens, Bulloigne, and Lutterell, had brought great Quantities of Goods thither to sell, which all became an easie prey to the English. The more valuable and portable they carry'd back with them, the rest they sold to the Merchants themselves for a great Sum of Money, resolving otherwise to have burnt them. While the Garrison at Callis thus acted its part under its valiant Captain, the Fleet under the Earl of Buckingham being gotten together, and new rigg'd, set out to Sea, and cruising upon the Coast of Britain near Brest took eight Spanish Ships, and might have taken more, had not their own Divisions and the tempestuous Weather been an Impediment to their farther Success. While the King's Ships were thus employ'd against the Enemy, divers private Men and Towns provided Ships, and observed all opportunities of annoying them. The Lord Peirce with one great Ship and some small Vessels putting out to Sea, met with a Fleet of fifty Sail of Spanish and Flemish Ships, laden with French Merchandize, which to attack look'd more courageous than prudent; yet he was so fortunate, that he took two and twenty of them, the rest escaping by flight. The Inhabitants of Winchelsea and Ry, who had felt so much of the French Cruelty, being bent upon a sharp Revenge of their late Sufferings, fitted out a certain Number of Ships, with sufficient quantity of Men and Provision; with which they made an Inroad into Normandy, enter'd and plunder'd the Towns of S. Peter's Haven and Willet, where they found and recover'd many of the Goods, which the French had lately taken from them, and having set the Houses on Fire, took their Ships, and got home safe. Thus did the English in some measure repay the French for the Injuries they had done them, and free their Coasts a-while from their Depredations.

The Duke of Lancaster about this time, thro' some disgust or suspicion, desired leave of the King to retreat from Court to his private Habitation at Kellingworth-Castle, and obtained it

but

A. D. 1378. but before he retir'd, he settled such Governors about the King as were more pleasing to the People, viz. William Courtney Bishop of London, Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, and several others, yet because the Bishop of Salisbury and Lord Latimer were put in the Number, they were not fully contented, and thro' a desire of securing the Nation from their Enemies, he requested that the Money granted the last Parliament for that end might be put into his hands, and he would take care to guard the Coasts from the Incurfions of the French, and their Confederates, for the succeeding Year. Some of the Nobility oppos'd his Proposition, but it was at length consented to, and the Duke immediately set himself to provide a sufficient Navy for the Safety of the People, and hired eight Ships of the City of Baion to joyn with it; but before the Duke's Ships were ready (whither thro' necessity, or wilful delay, is not known) one Mercer, a desperate Scot, having gotten together a small Number of Scotch, French, and Spanish Ships, enter'd the Haven of Scarborough, and seizing upon several Ships in it, carry'd them away to Scotland. This Mischief he did to that Town, because his Father, who had been taken not long before by some Northern Vessels, was by the Earl of Northumberland committed Prisoner to Scarborough Castle. This Success much encourag'd him and his Crew, so that he greatly infested those Seas; and tho' the Duke of Lancaster had undertaken to prevent such Evils, and Complaints of it were brought to the King and his Council, yet none appear'd to oppose the Pirates, so that those Parts of the Kingdom suffer'd many Calamities from them. The News of these things being brought to London, John Philpott, an Alderman, and a great Lover of his Country, pitying the Miseries of the People resolv'd upon a Relief at his own Charge; and fitting out such a Number of well-built Ships, as would conveniently carry a thousand Men, with all Ammunition and Provision, which he hired and paid himself, he set out to Sea with them himself being their Captain, and found out Mercer and his Associates, whom he immediately set upon, and after a smart Engagement conquer'd; taking Mercer himself, and all the Vessels he had carry'd from Scarborough, with fifteen Spanish Bottoms well laden with rich, tho' ill gotten Goods. With Spoil and Victory Philpott returns to London, where he met with Acclamations from the People, but no welcome from the Nobles, who envy'd him that Honour which they had not either Courage or Fidelity enough themselves to seek and gain. For he was sent for to come before the Council, to give an Account of his Action; which tho' they could not dislike, yet much blam'd him for daring it without a Commission from the King and his Council; and Hugh Earl of Stafford charg'd him with doing a very unlawful Act to levy Arms in the King's Dominions without his Leave. But Mr. Philpott made a modest and ingenious Defence, telling them, 'That it was not out of any Desire or ambitious Aim to get himself a Name, or raise to himself the Reputation of being a great Soldier, that induc'd him to venture his Money and Men to vanquish the Scotch Pirate, but merely out of Love to his Countrymen, and for the Honour of the Nation, that the Sloth of such as ought to have secured the Nation, might not ruine the People and make it contemptible. This Answer so satisfied the Council, that he return'd with as much Commendation from some of the Nobility as he was receiv'd by the City with Applause.

While the Duke of Lancaster lay at Anchor with his Ships, getting in Provision and Ammunition slowly, and with unnecessary Delays, some of his Men weary of their unmanlike Idleness, and of plundering their own Brethren, set out to Sea under the Command of the Earls of Salisbury and Arundel, and sailed towards the Coasts of Britain; Sir Peter and Sir Philip Courtney, two Brothers, who had the Command of some Ships, spying certain Vessels belonging to the Enemy inconsiderately assaulted them, being the whole Spanish Fleet; and tho' they bravely fought and defended themselves, yet in the end were beaten, most of their Men, who were good Gentlemen of Somersetshire and Devonshire, being slain, and Sir Peter with some others were taken Prisoners. This Misfortune at their first setting out much disheartned them, but yet they persisted in their Design, and went on in their intended Voyage, which proved some Compensation to their former Loss; for being arrived, they found the King of Navarre fall'n into a Difference with the King of France, and very desirous of an Alliance with the King of England: Whereupon, for a certain Sum of Money lent to the said King, and a Confederacy establish'd between the English and him. The Haven of Chierburg was put into the Possession of the English, whereby an easy Entrance was made for them at all times into Normandy, and present occasion given them to annoy the French; but this advantageous Alliance was not thought sufficient to compensate the Loss of the Gentlemen that were kill'd, and taken Captive at the beginning of this Voyage: Yet the Spaniards did not long escape without Loss; for the Ships of Baion coasting about the Kingdom to defend it from the Enemy, took fourteen Ships laden with Wine and other Goods.

In the latter end of this Year Pope Gregory XI. wrote a Letter to the King, requiring him to assist the Bishops in suppressing John Wickliffe and his Adherents; but that the Bishop's Heat stirred up by his Letters to them almost of the same Date, was little encourag'd by the King's Authority, the Favour that Wickliffe found may serve for a Demonstration. The Letters from the Pope to the King and Bishops are printed at large in Mr. Fox Acts and Mon. in the beginning of this King's Reign.

About Midsummer the Duke of Lancaster having compleatly equipp'd his Ships, put out to Sea with a great Force, and landing in Britain, laid Siege to S. Malo de Lisle, an important Fortrefs in those Parts. The Earls of Buckingham, Stafford, Warwick, and other Noblemen, who had great Experience in Warlike Affairs, manag'd it with much Art and Subtlety; but it was so well defended by the French, that the Duke was forced to raise the Siege and return home. A little after the Duke's Departure from England, viz. on Aug. 11. was committed a barbarous Murder in the Sanctuary at Westminster, which whether caused by the Duke or not, is uncertain; yet he was so far concern'd in it, as that it redounded much to his Dishonour, and increased the Hatred of him among the People. The Occasion of it was this: In the War, which the Black Prince Edward had in Spain for the Restoration of Peter King of Castile and Leon, two Gentlemen Robert Hawl, and John Shakell, had by their Valour taken the Earl of Denia Prisoner; and that such brave Actions might be encourag'd, the Prince himself, and Sir John Slandois, a chief Commander under him, gave him to the Gentlemen to make the best of his Ransom. The Earl being thus left in their hands, made an Agreement with them for his Liberty, and left his Son with them as an Hostage, till the Ransom was paid; which the Earl neglecting, the Earl's Son remained with them many Years. The Duke of Lancaster, who had marry'd one of the Heiresses of the Crown of Spain, but was kept out by their Uncle, casting about him to find out all ways how to recover his Wife's Right, thought upon the Restitution of the Earl of Denia's Son, whereby he might oblige his Father to engage in his Interest, and make a Party among his Friends for him. Wherefore the Duke sends to Mr. Hawl and Shakell, in the King's Name, to deliver up their Prisoner; and because they obstinately refused, he caused them to be imprison'd in the Tower. The Gentlemen, tho' thus unjustly handled, yet kept him; but after some time made their escape out of the Tower, and got to the Sanctuary at Westminster, where they hoped to find more Liberty and kinder Usage. The Constable of the Tower, Sir Allen Buxhall, a great Friend of the Duke's, much troubled at this escape, contriv'd with the Lord Latimer and Sir Ralph Ferrers, two of the Duke's Creatures, to take them by Force out of the Sanctuary; and accordingly with a sufficient Strength of arm'd Men enter'd the Abby-Church when the Monks were at Prayers, and seiz'd upon the two Gentlemen. Mr. Hawl made some Opposition, and was slain in the Quire, with a Monk, and his Servant who stood up for his Assistance; but Mr. Shakell they carry'd away with them to the Tower, from whence he at length got his Freedom, by resigning his Prisoner to them, upon condition, that he should receive an hundred Marks per An. and that the King should found a Chantry of five Priests to pray for the Souls of Mr. Hawl and his Servant. This Violation of the Sanctuary was so highly resented by the Archbishop, Bishop of London and other Bishops, that they excommunicated all that were Assistants in this Murther, except the King, Queen, and Duke of Lancaster; and the Bishop of London pronounced the Excommunication every Sunday, Wednesday, and Friday, for a long time after. The King looking upon it as a Reflection upon himself and the Duke, sent to the Bishop to cease it; who not regarding the Order, he was summon'd to Windfor, but he would not obey: Whereupon the Duke of Lancaster in a Rage told the King that he would fetch the Bishop by Force to him in spite of those Rebels the Londoners, if he would give him leave. These words lost the Duke the Good-will of the City, and made him generally thought the Author of the Murther.

* This was done in Parliament the last Year, and not now by the Procurement of the Duke of Lancaster.

On the 20th of October the Parliament met at Westminster, and Glocester, out of Displeasure taken against the Londoners. In it many things were propounded, but few concluded; besides that the King had granted to him a Subsidy of a Mark for every Sack of Wooll, and Sixpence in the Pound for all Foreign Commodities brought into, and sold in the Nation. The chief things enacted were, 1. Concerning Merchant Strangers, That it should be lawful for them in all Places of the Land to buy or sell all sorts of Commodities by Wholesale or Retail, which was a great Encouragement to Merchandize. 2. And whereas both Pope Urban and Clement had sent to the King, Nobles, and Bishops, to accept each of them for lawful Popes, the Legality of both Popes Election was debated, and in Conclusion it was agreed upon and passed into a Law, That Pope Urban was duly chosen, and so ought to be accepted and obey'd; That all Benefices of the Nation, which were held and enjoy'd by such Cardinals, or others of the Clergy, as were Rebels to Pope Urban, should be seized into the King's hands, and the Profits of them answer'd to him; That whosoever should purchase or obtain any Provisions, or other Instruments from any other Pope than the said Urban, shall be put out of the King's Protection. This Law is said to have been made through the Advice of the Archbishop. 3. That all Persons that shall report any slanderous words, concerning any Bishop or Nobleman, shall be imprison'd till he can produce the Author of such Calumnies. Some other things were propounded, but nothing enacted concerning them. The Archbishop complained of the late Violation of the Sanctuary of Westminster, and desired that some effectual Course might be taken to secure the Privileges of Sanctuaries; but the Nobles objecting the voluntary Abuses of them maintained by the Clergy in protecting Debtors, Accountants, &c. the Archbishop dropp'd the Motion, lest they should be depriv'd of those Advantages. Complaint also was made by the Commons against the Clergy for taking Timber as Tyth under the Notion of Silva Cadua; and it was desired, that it might be limited to Woods of ten Years Growth, but the King answer'd them, That he would not alter common Usage.

Soon after the Parliament was risen Robert The Scots King of Scots raised an Army to invade the Borders of England, being put upon it by the King of France; and one Alexander Ramsey, a valiant Scot, with forty of his Countrymen, surpriz'd the Castle of Barwicke, and slaying Sir Robert Bointon, the Governour of it, with the whole Garrison, made themselves absolute Masters of it. This first Attempt proved not only advantageous to the fortunate Aggressors, who seized much Spoil, and put the Governour's Wife and Children to pay two thousand Marks for their Ransome, but open'd a freer Passage for the whole Army into England. The Earl of Northumberland, who had the keeping of that Castle and Town committed to him, as soon as he had received Information of it, raised an Army out of those Parts for the Recovery of it; the Earl of Nottingham, the Lords Nevill, Lucy, Graistocke, and Stafford, Sir Thomas Musgrave, and many other Knights and Gentlemen brought in their Assistance to him: So that the Earl had soon gotten an Army of above a thousand Men well arm'd. With these he march'd to Barwicke, and finding that the Townsmen had broken down the Draw-bridge, by which only the Scots could get into the Town; so that Ramsey and his Fellows could have no Assistance from their Army, which lay near. He laid siege to the Castle, and within nine days after his Arrival took it by a two hours Assault: All the Scots but Ramsey their Captain were put to Death, and he saved partly in respect to his Valour, and partly that he might discover the Strength and farther Designs of the Scottish Army. The Earl and Lords with the English Army being flush'd with this Success, sent out a Party of six hundred Men under the Command of Sir Thomas Musgrave to pursue the Scots Army, which upon the Loss of Barwicke were a little withdrawn into the Country: But Earl Douglasse watching his Opportunity, fell upon them at such an Advantage, that he utterly defeated them, taking Sir Thomas himself, and one hundred twenty more Prisoners, the rest hardly escaping by flight. In this Expedition the Earl of Northumberland's eldest Son Henry, behaved himself so bravely, that he was highly commended and admir'd.

About

A. D. 1379. About Christmas Sir Robert Rouse, who was made Governour of Chierburg the last Summer, and had done many brave Actions against the French in taking Sir Oliver Clifton<sup>a</sup>, and by other adventures, was call'd home, and Sir John Herleston put in his place. Sir Hugh Calverley also was remov'd from his Government of Callis, and made Admiral, being joyn'd in Commission with Sir Thomas Percy, and William Montacute Earl of Salisbury succeeded Calverley as Governour of Callis. This noble Person began his Office with an Inroad into France, by which he took a great Booty of Cattel, and much enriched the Town. Nor was Sir Hugh less active against the Enemy by Sea, than he had been formerly by Land; for soon after he had set out, he took seven Merchant Ships laden with Goods, and one Man of War. The Merchants of London being angry with a Genoese Merchant, who had brought into Port a Ship laden with rich Spices, because he would not sell them at such low Prices as they would give, but was departing to seek a better Market, fell upon him and slew him<sup>b</sup>; which unjust Action was very much reſented by the Government, and the Actors, as they could be taken, punished according to their deserts. About this time began the Popes to stir up an Holy War, for the Establishment of themselves singly in the Papacy, and sent their Agents into the Nations, which submitted to them, to undertake a War against the Antipope. The Archbishop of Cassis in Ireland, who had been lately at Rome, brought with him a full power from Pope Urban to excommunicate all Persons that should hold with Clement, or uphold his Cause; and because the French were the chief Maintainers of Clement, who had establish'd his See at Avignon, the same Archbishop in a Sermon preach'd at London, told the People, 'That the French were excommunicated, and that if ever they could hope for success against that old Enemy of the Nation, now was the time, when they would have no Courage to make Resistance; or if they had, the powerful Curse would so weaken their Hands, and bind them over to inevitable Ruin, that they would become an easie Prey to the English.' Thus did the Vicar of the Prince of Peace blow up the Flames of War among Christians; a very bad proof of so high Office, to act so directly contrary to the Practice of him, whose Deputy he pretends to be.

A little after Easter the Parliament was assembled at Westminster, and some things settled of most necessity. For after the King, according to the usual Custom, had confirm'd the Privileges of the Church, and the two Great Charters; the principal was about the Privileges of Sanctuaries, and particularly of that of Westminster, which being found to be abused to protect Debtors against their Creditors, it was enacted, 'That all such Debtors, as after they have made over their Goods and Lands by Feoffments, Deeds of Gifts, or otherwise, to their Friends, and had for protection fled into Sanctuary, so defrauding their Creditors, if they did not render up themselves upon Proclamation made at the Gates of the Sanctuary, Judgment should pass against them, and an Execution be awarded upon their Goods and Lands, which were without such privileg'd places, as well such as are given by Collusion as otherwise. By this Parliament a Poll-Tax was given to the King, but with a particular Exemption of the Commons, and therefore laid the more heavy upon the Nobility and Gentry; for A. D. Dukes and Archbishops were to pay * twenty Marks; Bishops, Earls, and mitred Abbots, six Marks; Monks, ten Groats; and Gentlemen, and all the other Clergy, at a certain Rate, none was spared; but the Commons paid nothing.

This following Summer the Plague so afflicted the Northern Counties, that the Inhabitants were many of them forced to remove their Dwellings into other parts of the Nation; and those, whom either Necessity or Charity oblig'd to remain there, the Scots being sure of no resistance, so infested with frequent Incurſions and Robberies, that the Country was almost wholly depopulated.

The Duke of Britain, who in the first Year of Reg. 2. this King's Reign came into England to beg the King's assistance against his Rebellious Subjects, who by joining with the King of France had expelled him out of his Dominions, was now invited home by his Nobles, to return and accept the Government of his Country. He had hitherto solicited with small success, because the Duke of Lancaster thought to have got his Dukedom for himself, and for that end went over with a powerful Army; but the Constable of France opposed him with so strong a Force, that he was obliged to give over the thoughts of it; but now he had sufficient Aid granted him to attend him into his Country, and greater Forces promised to be sent after him. On August 4. Sir Hugh Calverley and Sir Thomas Percy set him ashore in his own Country, where he was received by his Nobility, and all his other Subjects, with a great deal of Joy, except some few who held great places under the French Government, and were likely to lose them by his coming. But because it could not be expected, but the French Faction would create him great Troubles and Disturbance; therefore on the Feast of St. Nicholas, Sept. 10. the Army promised him, to maintain him in his Dignity, was sent after him under the Command of Sir John Arundel, Sir Thomas Banister, Sir Nicholas Trumpington, and Sir Thomas Delaware, with others; but in their passage they met with so terrible a Tempest, that they could not touch the French Shore, twenty five Ships were cast away, most of the Captains drowned, and a great number of Soldiers. This unlucky Accident was look'd upon as a just Judgment from Heaven upon them for their Wickednesses, which they had committed on Shore, not only plundering Houses, and robbing Churches, but ravishing Men's Wives and Daughters, and carrying them on Board with them to satiate their Lusts, whom they cast into the Sea when the Tempest began, and so inhumanly hasten'd the ruin of their Souls, as well as corrupted their Bodies.

Sir John Harleston, and his Men, who held the Town of Chierburg, having Intelligence that the French had laid up great quantities of Provision in a Church and Mill adjoining, as in Storehouses, fall'd out with a strong Force, and possessed themselves of them, tho' guarded and defended by the French. But in their return were encountered by Sir William de Bourd, the French Captain in Mountbergh, the Counter-Garrison to Chierburg. The English, loth to lose so soon what they had so lately gotten, stood upon their defence, and there follow'd a furious Battel. The French were the greatest in Number, but the English in Resolution, which Fortune so far favour'd, that by the help of a few fresh Men, who came out of the Town to their assistance, they ob-

A. D. 1380. Reg. 3. tain'd a compleat Victory, taking Sir William himself, and a hundred and twenty Prisoners. But this advantage was allay'd by as great loss to the English soon after; for several English Ships lying in the Haven of Britain, under the protection of a Castle, then kept by the English, under the command of Sir John Clarke, a valiant Captain, the French had intelligence of it, and going with a Squadron, sent one Ship into the Haven, either to fire them, or draw the English Ships to a pursuit of it, by which means they might come into their hands. The English, not suspecting the design, accordingly pursu'd the Ship, and Sir John Clarke and his Men went aboard to effect the taking of it, and so fell into the Ambuscade. Sir John perceiving his danger, fought bravely to free his Ships, but all was in vain, the French were too strong for them; and tho' few of the Men fell into the Enemy's hand, many being kill'd, among which was the Captain himself, and some escaping ashore, they gain'd the Ships, but so shatter'd they could not carry them home.

1380. About Christmas the Earl of Salisbury was remov'd from the Lieutenancy of Calles, and Sir John Devereux was put in his place. Sir John Harleston also was call'd home from Chierburg, and Sir William of Windsor sent over to succeed him. About the Feast of St. Hilary a Parliament met at Westminster, and sat till the beginning of March. In this Parliament it was enacted, 'That since many of the richest Church-preferments of the Nation were got into the hands of Strangers, who neither could nor did do their Duty in hearing Confessions, preaching to, and teaching the People, maintaining Hospitality, or furthering the good of Men's Souls, contrary to the intent of the pious Donors, and the ancient Custom of the Realm, whereby the Riches of the Nation was carry'd into foreign parts; therefore no Alien should hold any Benefices in England, nor any Englishman be a Farmer, Procurator, or Attorney for such Aliens, without an express Licence from the King and his Council. The Commons also petition'd, 'That a Provision should be made against the Pope's Collectors of the first Fruits of all Ecclesiastical Benefices within this Realm, and that all Priors Aliens might be remov'd out of their Houses, and licens'd to depart the Nation, never to return, and that Englishmen be put in their places, answering the King's Revenues as they did. At the Request also of the Lords and Commons, Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was made sole Governor of the King's Person, instead of the greater number of Bishops and Barons, which hitherto had enjoy'd that Office, because they were found burthensome and chargeable to the Nation; and he had a competent Salary allow'd him for his Care and Attendance. This Parliament granted to the King a tenth of the Clergy, and a fifteenth of the Laity, but upon condition that the King should not summon another Parliament till the Michaelmas twelve-month after, which tho' at present he assented to, yet was not perform'd.

The Lady Joan Courtney marry'd to the Earl of S. Paul. A little after Easter, the Lady Jane de Courtney, the King's half Sister, was marry'd to the Lord Valeran Earl of S. Paul, who having been taken Prisoner in the Marches of Calles, was kept in the English Court, and by his winning Behaviour much engag'd the young Lady's Affections to him. The Princess her Mother was very much against the Match; but fearing lest it might be prejudicial to the young Lady to cross her Affections, she yielded, and the King gave his Consent, and for her Dowry bestow'd upon the Earl the Mannour of Breffert.

The Duke of Britain having been disappointed of the Aids which he expected from England soon after his arrival, but were kept back by a Tempest, not knowing the Cause of the Delay, sent a fresh Petition to the King for his assistance; whereupon seven or eight thousand Men were rais'd to be conducted thither, under the Command of Thomas Woodstocke Earl of Buckingham, Sir Thomas Peirce, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir Robert Knowles, Sir John Harleston, and other experienced Commanders; but to avoid the former danger by Sea, were set on Shoar at Calles, June 4. and so were to pass through France into Britain. In their March through the Country, tho' they did much harm to the French, yet they met with no Opposition. The Duke of Burgundy would have vain oppos'd them, and the injur'd People were very ready and desirous to crush their Insolencies; but King Charles, being a very politick Prince, strictly commanded his People not to engage them, who could have no Refuge in the midst of their Enemies, but an irresistible Boldness and Desperateness; he order'd them to keep themselves and Cattel close in their Towns, while they pass'd by, and in the mean time he so dealt with the Britains, that he made their Journey unsuccessful; for the City of Nantz deny'd utterly to receive them, and the Britains gave them a cold welcome; which Disappointment did more damage to the English, than the French had suffer'd by them, and Charles's Policy outdid their Force, tho' he liv'd not to see the success of it. For that great Prince having been poison'd about the time that the English landed at Calles, was hardly preserved by a German Physician a few Months, and dy'd Sept. 26. just as the English were passing the River Sartie, and left his Kingdom to his Son Charles VI. then but twelve Years old. This Accident might have prov'd fortunate to the English, had the Duke persisted in his Quarrel with France, especially since there was a Dissention among the French Princes of the Blood about the Regency and Government of the King's Person; but the Peers of Britain being more desirous of Peace than War, and the French as willing to comply with them, the English were sent home again, and a Peace concluded to the no small displeasure of the Earl of Buckingham, and his whole Army, whom to appease the Duke pretended, that his Nobles over-rul'd him, and forc'd him to it; which Excuse did not satisfy the angered Soldiers.

While the English under the Earl of Buckingham were passing France, the French and Spanish Gallies under the Command of the Lord Oliver de Clisson, and other great Men, much infested the Coasts of England, especially in the Western parts, where they took several Ships; and at last, entering the Thames, burnt Gravesend, after they had plunder'd it, and so return'd with much Booty. About the latter end of June the Merchandizing Towns of the West set out a Fleet to repress their Insolencies, which being in pursuit of them, forced them into Ireland to King'sale; but they were so assaulted from the Irish and English on both sides, that above four hundred of them were slain, most of their Captains and Ships taken, besides one and twenty Vessels, which had been taken from the English, which they now recover'd; but four of the most desperate of their Captains escaped, who being enrag'd at their loss, got up what Force they could together, and observing their opportunity, came again upon the English Coasts, robbing, killing, and burning in a more outrageous manner than before; against whom, tho' the People oppos'd themselves with what strength they could get, and did some Execution upon them, yet they suffer'd much damage, for they burnt the Town of Winchelsea, and put the Abbot of Batel

The Scots invade England.

The Scots, who were always joyned with their old Confederates the French, in assaulting England, were not backward at this time to contribute their Assistance; and because the French acted only as Pirates, without Declaration of War, therefore the Scots made this a Pretence of their Invasion, that the Townsmen of Newcastle and Hull had taken one of their Ships worth six or seven thousand Marks, tho' they took it not from the Scots, but from the Pirates that infested England. Whereupon the Scots, with a considerable Body of Men, enter'd Cumberland and Westmorland, spoiling and destroying the Country; and out of the Forest of Inglewood drove away forty thousand Head of great and small Cattle as was thought. It happen'd, that just at this time Penrith Fair was kept; of which, when the Scots had notice, they halted thither; and finding none to oppose them, for the Tradesmen, who were naked and unarm'd, hearing of their coming, had left their Goods to save their Lives; they seized upon all their Shops and Stalls, and returned laden home by the City of Carlisle; which, tho' strong enough to defend it self, yet made no Resistance; and so the Scots got safe into their own Country, save that an Ambush of Archers cut off some few of them. The Earl of Northumberland, who was the Guardian of those Northern Parts, hearing of these Mischiefs done by the Scots, was preparing a sharp Revenge against them, but was forbidden by Letters from the King and Council to proceed against them, till the time of Treaty with them was past, that it might be known, whether they would make any Satisfaction for those Wrongs or no.

A Treaty with the Scots.

About Michaelmas the Duke of Lancaster, the Earls of Warwick and Stafford, with other Noblemen, went with a great Army into the North, and lay on the Borders to treat with the Scots. This Negotiation, which lasted long, ended in a Truce till Easter following, but was so great a Burthen to the poor Inhabitants, that they had rather have had the Scots still their Enemies, than the Company of their Friends with the Army that attended them, who did them as much Injury as they could have done. The Truce was indeed no Security to the English, the Scots ever making use of such Cessations of Arms to plunder England the more fearlessly; for they never observ'd them longer than they could gain an advantageous Opportunity to break them. While the English Army lay here, some treasonable Letters were found at London by a poor Man, seal'd with Sir Ralph Ferrers's Arms, who was one of the King's Council, and directed to Sir Bertram Glegurn, the Lord de la River, Chamberlain of France, the Lord Gueselin, and the Patron of the French Gallies. They were carried to Mr. John Philpott, and by him to the King and Council, who sent him with them to the Duke of Lancaster, that the Knight might be seiz'd and secur'd; which the Duke accordingly did, and imprison'd him in Durham Castle, but upon his Examination at the next Parliament he was set at Liberty, four Barons being bound for his Appearance, till his Innocency could be more fully cleared.

Fifth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

The King called another Parliament to meet at Northampton in November, a place tho' not very convenient in Winter for the Entertainment of so great a Company, and so August an Assembly, yet was thought more fit than London at that time; because he was resolv'd to punish

John Kirby, a Merchant of London, who was one of those that had barbarously kill'd the Gencefe Merchant: And it was feared, that his suffering in the City might occasion some Tumult by the Interests of his Dependants or Friends, so he had his Tryal at Northampton, and was hanged. By this Parliament was granted to the King a Tax of 6 s. 8 d. for every Priest and Nun, and 4 d. by the Poll upon all Persons whatever being of the Age of fourteen Years and upward (such as took Alms only excepted) which was then thought so considerable a Sum, that it rais'd a great Discontent among the Commons, as we shall see, when we come to the Account of the Collection of it.

Soon after the rising of this Parliament, which was about Christmas, Thomas Braintringham Bishop of Exeter, was put out of his Office of Treasurer, and Sir Robert Hales Lord Prior of St. John's Hospital in Smithfield, was put into his place; a very worthy and gallant Person, but not beloved of the Commons. Also a Marriage began to be treated of between the King and the Emperor's Sister, and the Duke of Tarfilia and the Cardinal of S. Praxeder, came over to the King about it. The Cardinal made it a very advantageous Negotiation, for presuming upon the King's Favour and Permission, he sold Indulgences, Confessional Letters, Portative Altars, Absolutions and Dispensations at dear Rates to the superstitious People and Clergy, who glad of such near Markets, catch'd at them eagerly, to the great enriching of the Cardinal.

The Truce with the Scots being now just upon the Expiration, the Duke of Lancaster was sent into Scotland to procure a Continuation of the Truce for a longer time, viz. three Years. The Duke was the more zealous to promote a firm Peace at home, because he had an Opportunity put into his hand, as he thought, of recovering his Wife's Right to the Crown of Spain, by a Breach between the King of Portugal and the Usurper. The former had sent to the Duke to assist him, and he dispatch'd away his Brother Edmund Earl of Cambridge, with the Lords William Beauchamp and Botreux, and Sir Marston Gourney, with a considerable Force to help him, intending to follow himself with greater Strength as soon as things were put into a settled Posture at home; but while he was endeavouring to lengthen the Peace with a Foreign Nation, an unexpected Disturbance, but very dangerous one, arose at home among the People upon this Occasion.

The Collection of the Poll-Tax, which was so much displeasing to the Common People, began in the Spring, and, being manag'd by indiscreet and uncivil Officers, rais'd such Discontents in most Counties of England, that they were every where almost ripe for Rebellion: For tho' 'tis probable the severe exacting of so small a Sum would not have rais'd such Combustions alone, yet meeting with other Grounds of Dissatisfaction, which the People had long smother'd, it swelled them to so big a Bulk, that they could not be kept longer in. The Government of the Duke of Lancaster, the Exactions and Corruptions of Lawyers and Attorneys, and the Oppression from Lords of Manors by their Tenures of Villanage, had sat very uneasie upon their Shoulders a great while, and they longed for a Deliverance from both; but more especially from the insupportable Burthens of their Lords, whose Slaves and Servants they generally were, doing all their Work and Drudgery, as plowing, sowing, carrying their Dung, cutting their

A. D. 1381. Reg. 5. their Wood, and carrying it to their Houses, which being a great Avocation from their own Business, and Disadvantage to their Labours, they were glad of a just Cause and Opportunity of vindicating their Liberty. And this they were much the more encourag'd to do by the Sermons of a seditious Priest, nam'd John Ball, who in his Popular Discourses told the Commons, 'That all Men were equal by Nature; That as Children of Adam no Man is better than another; That if God had appointed any Man to Slavery, he would have declared, who should be Lords, and who Servants; That Servitude, which is gotten by unjust Force, is confirmed by as unjust Laws; and therefore he advised them to go to the King and require their Liberty, which if they could not obtain, to recover it with their Swords. Whether these Instigations had produced any settled Resolutions in the People to ease themselves after that manner, is uncertain; but that they made them more ready to lay hold of a slight Occasion to rebel, is out of Question, and so were the chief means to raise that Flame, which the Poll-Tax served but as a Pretence to. This Rebellion first began at Dartmouth in Kent, where a rude Collector of the Poll-Groats having offer'd some Incivility to one Jack Tyler's Daughter, created a Quarrel with the Father; which coming to Blows, Tyler being a Thatcher, with his thatching Staff beat out his Brains. The Fact was applauded by his Neighbours, but yet fearing he should be punish'd for it, they gather'd together for his Defence, and in a short time were become a large Multitude able to defend themselves against any Force almost whatsoever: For not only the People of Kent, but Essex united themselves in one Body, and as if his Cause were common to them all, resolv'd to vindicate themselves and him from all such unjust Oppressions and Abuses. Wat. Tyler became the Head and Captain of this Rabble, which being so strong as he thought to be beyond all Resistance, and able to vindicate themselves from all Wrongs, which they in their own Opinions sustained from their Superiors; he first engag'd them each to other with an Oath, 'That they would be true to King Richard, and the Interests of the Commons of England; That they never would receive a John (meaning the Duke of Lancaster) for their King; That they would persuade all their Neighbours to joyn in the same Cause, and would never yield to the Payment of any Tax, but a 15th. Being firmly united by this Oath, they began their March from Maidstone, where their first Rendezvous was, towards London, plundering all that would not joyn with them in their Passage. At Blackheath they had a general Muster, where they appeared to be sixty thousand, or as others say, an hundred thousand strong. The King hearing of the Approach of so great a Multitude in an Army, sent to them to know the Cause of their tumultuous meeting, and they sent him word, 'That they were come to speak with him about Matters of Importance, and desired him to come to them. The Message being related to the King, it was debated in the Council, whether he should go to them or no: Some thought it the best way to appease them, but Simon Sudbury, Archbishop of Canterbury, the Chancellor, and Sir Robert Hales the Treasurer, were utterly against it, as not safe for the King's Person. This Advice was taken, and the Rebels Petition rejected, which as soon as they heard the Authors of, they vow'd they would cut off their Heads; but the King fearing that this Denial would provoke them, he went down by Water as far as Rotterdam to talk with them. They were pleas'd with his Presence, and petition'd him to come a-shore among them, but that would not be granted: So that this new Distrust created a greater Displeasure against the King's Ministers, and Persons about him.

As soon as the King had left them, they march'd forward to London, and on Corpus Christi Day, June 2. enter'd Southwark; where they plunder'd the rich House-keepers, let out the Prisoners of the Marshalsea and Kings-Bench, whom they lifted into their own Company. The Mayor and chief Men of the City adher'd firmly to the King, and shut up their Gates against them; but the Commonalty taking their part, and the Rebels themselves threatening to burn all the Borough of Southwark, unless they had free Access into the City; they were forced to open the Gates to them, as well for their own as Friends Safety. And now being Masters of all the Wealth and Power of the Nation, they made no Law for their Actions, but their own Will; the Wine-Cellars and Shambles yielded them Dainties for their Bellies and Palates, and every Banker's Shop was their Treasury. The meanest Peasant knew no Want, when abundance of all things was at hand: But these Lawless Actions they justified by their Zeal for the common Good, and taking off such as they called the Enemies of the publick, which they were not sparing in the Execution of, or in destroying their Houses and Possessions. For they burnt the Archbishop's Palace at Lambeth, and the Duke of Lancaster's House in the Savoy, with all their rich Furniture and Goods; which, as if they had been devoted to God, they would suffer no Man to rescue from the Flames; but when one of their Company took a piece of Plate, and put it in his Bosom, they cast him into the Fire. S. John's Hospital in Smithfield also they set on fire, and the Manor of Highbury, belonging to it. All the Professors of the Law, which they could get into their Power, they put to Death; and entering into the Temple, they destroy'd all the Rolls or Records of the Chancery which they could find, with all Law-Books and Writings of the Students, and so they dealt with the other Inns of Court. They divided themselves into three parts to prevent any Opposition, and remained one part in the City under Jack Straw, another at Mile-End, and a third at Tower-Hill. The King and his Guards (tho' twelve hundred) were so much afraid of them, that they allow'd them to come into the Tower, and took out from thence the Archbishop Simon Sudbury, then Chancellor, and Sir Robert Hales the Treasurer, and beheaded them on Tower-Hill. In the City also they were very severe to Foreigners, especially the Flem-

Their Shibboleth to discern them by, was to pronounce the words Bread and Cheese, which if they could not do, but said as usually, Brot and Cause, they instantly beheaded them. Wat. Tyler's private Revenge in beheading his old Master, Richard Lym, in Cheapside, for his necessary Severity to him when he was his Apprentice, much stain'd their glorious Pretences of reforming publick Disorders, and punishing bad Ministers of the State. Nor was it very agreeable to the Justice they pretended to observe, to open the Prisons of Newgate and the Compters, and let out those Pests of Societies, Thieves, Burglers, and other disorderly Persons, burning their Registers, that in more settled times they might not be again apprehended: But so it for the most part happens, Hypocrites can't keep the Vizard on so close, but their Pretences will be seen through, and their disagreeing Actions betray the Wickedness of their Designs.

King's methods to appease the Rebels.

The King compassionating the Miseries of his People, which by force he was unable to relieve, consulted with his Council about such Courses as were best to be taken to prevent them; and upon deliberation it was advis'd, That since Rebels, tho' strong, are yet timorous, the King should offer them all Pardon for their former Offences, and give them Charters of Freedom to confirm their Liberties for the future. The greatest part of the Rebels accepted of the King's Favour, and especially the Essex Men, who sorry for their Disloyalty, departed immediately home, leaving only some of their chief Men to get their Pardon and Charter of Freedom pass'd and sign'd. But Wat. Tyler, and his Kentish Men, which were about twenty thousand, still continued unsatisfy'd, and persisted in their mischievous Actions of plundering and killing whom they pleas'd. The King and his Council made larger Proposals to him, but nothing would be accepted, tho' he pretended he would be quiet upon reasonable Conditions; which that the King might know, and comply with for the Peace of the Nation, he with many of his Nobility, the Mayor and Aldermen of London, and his Guards, went into Smithfield, and sent one of his Attendants, Sir John Newton, to summon Tyler to a Parley with him. Sir John thinking it Condescension enough in the King to send for so mean a Subject, hasten'd Tyler to attend upon his Majesty; but he told him, he would come at his own time; and tho' he set forward, yet did it so slowly, as if he had been as great a King, which he dream'd he should soon be, and the King were to wait upon him. His delays caus'd Sir John to be sent again, and to quicken his pace, without respect to him; which so angered the proud Rebel, that he drew his Dagger at him to kill him; and tho' he was in the King's Presence, would not lay aside his Fury: Whereupon Sir John was commanded by the King to deliver up his Dagger to Tyler, and submit. When the King and Tyler came together, as he gave very little Respect to the King, so his Demands were very unreasonable; for he required, That the ancient Laws of the Land should be abolished; That the Sword, which was carry'd before the King, should be deliver'd to him; and many other insolent matters, unfit to be granted. William Walworth the Mayor of

London, and John Philpot an Alderman, both Men of as undaunted Courage as zealous Loyalty, told the King, That the rude Behaviour of Tyler to him was intolerable, and desired that the Mayor might have liberty to arrest him, being in his Jurisdiction. The King doubting the issue of such an Attempt, which their Pailion would not suffer them to consider, was very unwilling to permit them, but at last yielded; and Walworth immediately with his Sword struck him from his Horse, and being seconded with Philpot, and others that stood by, they kill'd him. The Rabble seeing their Captain dead, presently incited one another to revenge his Blood, and bent their Bows to shoot at his Murtherers, as they call'd them. The King considering their unavoidable danger, though but fifteen Years of Age, rode bravely up to the People, and said, What will you kill your King? Be not troubled for the loss of your Leader, I will be your Captain, and grant you what you desire. These Words had so great an influence upon them, that they laid aside their Intentions, and march'd with the King into St. George's Fields, as sure to obtain their Requests of him. In the mean time, Walworth posted into the City, and brought back with him a thousand Citizens well arm'd, who waited under Sir Robert Knowles to give the King assistance, when it was most seasonable; and upon this notice, immediately march'd in good order into the Fields to the King. The Rabble were amaz'd at their approach, and flung down their Weapons, begging the King's Pardon; which being obtain'd, they fled, and got home as fast as they could. The Nobles and others that attended the King, desired him to execute three or four hundred of them instantly for a terror to others; but the King would by no means consent to it, and only order'd, that the City should give them no entertainment, and that the Heads of them should be apprehended, and legally punish'd. The Tumult being thus compos'd, the King sensible of the Service which Walworth and Philpot had done him, with so great hazard of their Lives, conferr'd the honour of Knighthood upon them and some other Aldermen, John Standish, Nicholas Brambre, John Lawnd, and Nicholas Twiford; and as a perpetual Memorial of the City's Loyalty, commanded the Dagger to be added to their Arms, and gave also an hundred Pound per Annum to Walworth, and forty Pound per Annum to all the rest. After this success, the King return'd to the Tower, where he was receiv'd by his Mother with much Joy, and the more, because she knew him to be in great danger of Life from the numerous and heady Rout of his rebellious Subjects.

While the former Commotions were about London, the Commons in other parts of the Nation rais'd the like Stirs and Tumult, under the same Pretences, being instigated by the Emisaries of the Kentish Rebels, John Ball and John Wraw, two seditious Priests, who had a special Talent of Haranguing the Rabble into Discontents and Rebellion. In Suffolk, about St. Edmundsbury, they were gather'd together into a Body of fifty thousand, under the Command of Robert Westbroom an Inkeeper, and John Wraw the above-mentioned lewd Priest, as his Assistant. They made it their business also to go about the Country to plunder and murder Lawyers, Justices, and all such as they imagin'd to be the Instruments of * This cannot be right, for Mr. Lyons was a very eminent Merchant, the same that had been in the former Reign condemn'd in a great Fine to the King for several Misdemeanours, and Alise Pince begg'd it off for him when she was in favour. So 'tis not probable, that Wat the Thatcher or the Tyler was ever Prentice to him.

† He was angry with the Knight, because he did not dismount in his Presence, but presum'd to talk to him on Horseback.

‡ Sir William Walworth seeing Tyler begin to meddle with the Bridle of the King's Horse, and play'd with his Dagger, shifting it from one Hand to the other, was afraid he meant some mischief to his Royal Person, and struck him on the Head with his Dagger; Alderman Philpot seconded the Blow with his Sword, and so the Rebel came down.

the People's Slavery. These beheaded Sir John Cavendish Lord Chief Justice, who had his Dwelling in those parts, and the Prior of Bury, John of Cambridge<sup>a</sup>, forcing the Monks of the Abby to bring forth and burn those Writings, by which the Privileges of the Monastery over the Townsmen were granted and confirmed; and left the Abbot, who escap'd from them, should recover his former Immunities of them, they put a Cross, Chalice, and other Jewels belonging to the Monastery into their hands, that the Abbot should be oblig'd to seal a Release of all Services to them for the recovery of them. In Cambridgeshire also and the Isle of Ely there were the like tumults, and many mischiefs done by the seditious People, who shrunk away upon the first Proclamation of Pardon, and sav'd themselves. But in Norfolk, tho' they were as forward in disquieting the Nation, yet they were not so wise to secure themselves. John Litterster, a Dyer of Norwich, whom they stiled King of the Commons, headed a vast Rabble, and with the same mad Fury destroy'd the Lawyers, Lords of Mannours, and such as they believ'd Instruments of their Slavery. These were, as they thought, more politick than their Fellows in other parts, in compelling several Gentlemen of that Country to joyn with them to increase their Numbers, and make themselves the more Considerable, as the Lord Scales, Sir William Morley, Sir John Brewes, Sir Stephen Hales, and Sir Robert Salle. This last was too Loyal to comply with such a rebellious Rout, and too Bold to keep his Sentiments of their wicked and unjust Actions to himself; wherefore reproving both their Attempt, and the ill Conduct of it, he was knock'd on the Head by them. The rest sav'd their Lives with such servile Compliances as were worse than an honourable Death, for they were forced to serve Litterster at Table upon their Knees<sup>b</sup>, and outwardly applaud his brave Endeavours for the People's Liberties. They sought to have brought William Ufford Earl of Suffolk to the same Union with them, but he had some notice of their Intentions, and so timely made his escape, and went to the King. When the Proclamation of Pardon to the Rebels about London was published, they had news of it; but whether they suppos'd themselves not included in it, or whether they disput'd with themselves about accepting it, is uncertain; yet they kept together in a Body, and sent three of their chief Leaders, with Sir John Brewes and Sir William Morley, with store of Money<sup>c</sup> to obtain their Pardon. The Bishop of Norwich, Henry Spencer, a Man of a Warlike Spirit, tho' a Clergyman, being zealous to purge his Diocese of such Troublers of the Nation, was at the same time coming down with a small Force, of eighty Lances, and a few Archers, and hoped by the assistance of such as continued Loyal in his Diocese, to rout the Rebels. The Messengers from the Mutineers met the Bishop near New-Market, who question'd them about their Business, Company, and the People in Arms; and finding that three of the chief of the Rebels were with them, and that their Camp lay at North-walsbam strongly entrench'd, the Bishop being hot in the pursuit of them, beheaded the three Leaders, set up their Heads at New-Market, and hastening forward with Sir William Morley and Sir John Brewes, gather'd an Army of such Gentlemen and Commons, as flock'd to them in their passage; which making up no inconsiderable Body, the Bishop assaulted their Camp, and routed them, tho' with some difficulty. Litterster, and several others of his Associates, he beheaded; but Wraw, with several Prisoners, were sent up to London to receive the just Punishment of their Demerit. Thus was the Rebellion ended, and almost as soon suppress'd as rais'd, not continuing above three Weeks, or thereabouts, from the beginning to the end of May, the heady Rabble wanting Skill and Courage to maintain their bad Cause.

The Nation being thus a little appeas'd, tho' not settled, the Governours with the young King thought it necessary, for the compleating of its Quiet for the future, to raise a good Army of such as were firmly Loyal to the King, who might be able to suppress any Insurrections hereafter, which were not a little to be feared, because the Commons were yet in a ferment, and they had resolv'd to punish many of the Leaders of the Rebellion, that were in Custody in several places of the Nation, with as great severity as their Crimes deserv'd, which would probably incense the People, and cause new Stirs. The King thereupon call'd all his Friends together about London, and sent into the Country to such as he knew to be Men well-affected, and Persons of Interest, to attend him, and bring what Men they could with them well arm'd; by which means he got in a few Days a gallant Army of above forty thousand Men, which he muster'd himself in Person at Black-heat with great pleasure and satisfaction. As soon as this Force was got together about the King, news was brought him, that the Commons were risen again in two parts, viz. in Kent, and in Essex about Billerica. The King, whether tired with the former Provocations, or exalted with the Presence of his Army, which he wanted before, forgot all his former Gentleness, and immediately resolv'd to go himself into Kent, and destroy the whole Country, and to send the Earl of Buckingham and Lord Piercy to repress the Essex-Men, to whose Petition for Liberty, though promis'd before, he reply'd, that "Slaves they were, and Slaves they should be." But the Lords, by their earnest Persuasions, allay'd the Fierceness of his Passion, and brought him to yield to more gentle and legal ways of proceeding against them. So the Earl of Buckingham, and Sir Thomas Piercy, with a good strength of Men, went into Essex, and finding the Rebels entrench'd between Billerica and Harfield Peverell, within Ditches and Carts; they assaulted their Camp, kill'd five hundred of them, and took eight hundred Horses, the rest escaping towards Colchester, which they solicited in vain to joyn with them, and from thence went to Sudbury. The Lord Fitz-Walter and Sir John Harleston with a Body of Men pursu'd them so hard, that they slew and took them almost all Prisoners, and committed them to several Gaols in their own County. And with the like success did the King's Army subdue the seditious People of Kent. After the Composition of these Disturbances, there appear'd a general Quietness over the Nation, which made way for the Punishment of those Captains of the Rebels which were reserv'd for Justice.

The Lord Mayor of London, Sir William Walworth, had taken several of the chief of them, as Jack Straw, Allen Threader, John Kirby, and John Starling, who bragg'd that he had slain the Archbishop with his own hands; and being seiz'd within his Precincts, they were by Law to be tried before him, from whom they received the

Straw's Confession.*

Straw, without any Promises, or Hopes of Pardon, ingenuously confessed at his Execution, 'That if they had been successful in their Enterprize, and could have gotten all the Power into their hands, as they had no small Reason to hope, being so very strong, they intended to have slain the King, Noblemen, Bishops, Monks, Canons, Parsons, and all the richest and wealthiest of the Commons, and seiz'd upon their Possessions, leaving only the Fryars Mendicants to administer Sacraments and divine Service: And when they had thus gotten all into their hands, they would have established new Laws for the Government of the Realm, which they had contrived to divide among their Leaders; Wat Tyler was to be King of Kent, and others of them in other Countries were to have their petty Kingdoms. This, he said, was true, as God should help him in those his last Moments. John Ball, who was taken about Coventry, was sent up to the King, and try'd before him at S. Albans, with other of the Rebels, brought thither from Hartford Goal. Ball behaved himself with very great Irreverence to the King; and tho' he was advised to submit and beg pardon, he scorn'd and despis'd his Monitors: So he was condemn'd and executed with fifteen others, July 15th. As for the rest, the King sent out his Judges with Commissions into the several Counties of the Nation to try them. Sir Robert Tresilian, Chief Justice, went into Essex, and the King himself accompany'd him at their Examinations. The Essex Men in a Body of about five hundred Men, address'd themselves bare-foot to the King for Mercy, and had it granted upon condition, That they should deliver up to Justice the chief Instruments of stirring up the Rebellion; which being accordingly done, they were immediately try'd and hang'd ten or twelve, on a Beam at Chelmsford; because they were too many to be executed after the usual manner, which was by beheading. In other Counties also, where the Rebellion had come, were the like Executions done; and the Lords of Manors dealt with the like Severity with their Tenants, and punish'd many of them with Death: So that in divers places of England, no less than fifteen hundred are computed to have suffer'd for this their Disloyalty; by which means the Mischiefs they did to others, and the Blood they shed, was justly return'd upon themselves.

Wickliffe's Doctrines no cause of this Rebellion.

This Rebellion hath since been imputed to Wickliffe and his Followers Principles, of whom John Ball is said to have been one; but that this is an Aspersion invented by Monkish Historians, to blacken the Protestant Doctrines, may appear from hence, that the Rebels were very cruel to some of the chief Followers of Wickliffe, as the Duke of Lancaster; and that Wickliffe himself, then residing upon his Parsonage of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, was never called in Question for this Rebellion; and tho' John Ball, who was a Franciscan Friar, was said to be imprison'd by the Archbishop for preaching Wickliffe's Doctrine; yet 'tis probable his Discontents, not Opinions, made him forward to promote these Disturbances of the Nation, and therefore neither Wickliffe nor his Doctrines were to blame.

*The Duke of Lancaster
in Scotland during this Rebellion.*

The Duke of Lancaster was all the time of these Commotions in Scotland, not so much to conclude the Peace, which upon the first News of them he suddenly clapt up; because if the Scots had heard of them, they would certainly have rejected all Propositions for it, as to secure his own Person, to whom he knew they bore a deadly

Hatred. The Scots, tho' vexed that the Duke had by his Policy debarr'd them from a great Advantage upon England by it, yet offer'd him twenty thousand Men to guard himself against the Rebels, if he purpos'd to return home; or if he thought it better to stay till the Storm was spent, the Accommodations of Holy-rood House; but the Duke accepted the latter, and abode some Months in Scotland extraordinary. This gave the tumultuous Multitude occasion to report, That the Duke of Lancaster was gone over to the Scots, and had obtained of them an Army to invade and conquer England; but as soon as the Rebellion was allay'd, the Duke cleared himself of that foul Aspersion, by sending a Message to the King to give an account of the Reasons of his stay; yet assuring his Majesty, That if he had any Suspicion of his Disloyalty, he would either come to him without any Attendance, or at his Command go into a voluntary Exile. But the King giving no Credit to the Report, sent him word, That he might return with his Retinue; and being come to Court, gave him an hearty welcome. Soon after his Arrival there happen'd a furious Quarrel between the Duke of Lancaster and Earl of Northumberland; because Sir Matthew Redman, Governour of Barwicke under the Earl, had deny'd the Duke Admittance into that Garrison, when he was on the Borders of Scotland, by the Earl's Order. This Act the Duke complain'd of to the King in the Earl's Presence, and accus'd him of Ingratitude, Unfaithfulness and Disobedience. The Earl being a Man of an high and angry Spirit, burst out into foul and reproachful Language against the Duke; and was so very furious, that tho' the King commanded him Silence, yet he would not hold in his reproachful Language. Whereupon the King commanded him to be arrested and imprison'd; but the Earls of Warwick and Suffolk undertaking for his Appearance at the next Parliament, he was left at Liberty, and returned into his own Country. About this time the King made William Courtney, Bishop of London, Archbishop of Canterbury, who was a zealous Opposer of Wickliffe and his Followers.

About the beginning of November the Parliament met at Westminster, and the Earl of Northumberland, and Duke of Lancaster attended it; but with very large Retinues of armed Men, to the great Terror of all Places where they came. The Earl and his Company were lodg'd in the City, and the Duke with his Men in the Suburbs, and both went every day to the Parliament House with their Guards, to the Amazement of the Citizens. The Quarrel between these two great Personages was first debated by the Houses, and took up so much time before it was fully decided by the King, that News was brought of the Queen's Arrival at Dover, before they could proceed to any other Business; and so the Parliament was prorogued to give Attendance upon her Reception, and the Celebration of the Marriage: For many of the Nobility, and others of the Parliament, were sent to receive her, and convey her honourably to the King's Presence. Before she came to London, the Mayor and Aldermen, with a great Company of the chief Citizens, met her at Blackbeath, and led her into their City with great Honour and Respect; from whence she was conducted in Triumph to the King at Westminster. Within a few days she was marry'd to the King by the Archbishop of Canterbury, by the Name of Ann, the Daughter of the late Emperor Charles IV. and Sister to Winceslaus the present Emperor. Her Coronation soon follow'd, which was celebrated with infinite Splendour.

A. D. 1382. Splendour and Magnificence; all the Nobility of the Nation attending, and sparing no Cost to heighten the Glory and State of that day. These Solemnities being ended, the Parliament met again soon after the Feast of Epiphany, and settled many good Laws for the publick Benefit: For after the Confirmation of the Liberties of the Church, the great Charters, and many old Laws found by Experience conducible to the Nation's Welfare, they establish'd several new ones, viz. That no Gold or Silver should be carry'd out of the Realm, either in Coin, or otherwise; it being found then, as well as now, that Traffick with ready Money impoverishes the Nation. That all Merchants, that were the King's Subjects, should traffick in English Bottoms only. That no Wines should be sold for above six Marks by the Tun. That all Manumissions, Obligations, Releases, and other Bonds made by Force and Compulsion in the late Tumults, as being against the Laws of the Land, should be void. That it should be lawful for the King's Loyal Subjects to seize and apprehend all Persons, whom they suspect to be riotously assembled, if there be in number above six or seven, without the King's Writ, and imprison them till they are brought to answer it. That such Persons as out of Zeal to the Safety of the King and Peace of the Realm, had taken up Arms to repress and subdue the Rebels without a special Commission from the King, should be all pardon'd. That such Persons, as in the late Troubles had lost their Charters, Releases, Obligations, Deeds, and other Monuments, (for the Rebels burnt many, and destroy'd them) upon their Petition to the King and his Council, and a Proof of the Contents of the Form and Tenure of them, their Rights, Titles, and Privileges, should be confirm'd otherwise to them. That Strangers might personally sell their Goods in London, without Impeachments to the Merchants of England. That no Furs nor Girdles garnish'd with Gold or Silver, should be worn, with some other Laws concerning the Regulation of Courts of Law, and Officers Fees. By this Parliament a Subsidy call'd a Maletoft (which is a fiftieth part) was imposed upon all Wools bought or sold by the Merchants, and at the Request of the Lords and Commons, the Lord Scroop, a Person eminent for his Knowledge and unbiass'd Integrity, was made Chancellor, and Sir Hugh Segrave Treasurer, those great Places remaining vacant ever since the Rebellion, wherein the Archbishop and Sir Robert Hales were slain.

The Death of the Earl of March in Ireland. About this time Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, Lieutenant in Ireland, dy'd in that Nation. He was nearly ally'd to the Crown by the Marriage of Philippa the only Daughter of Lionel Duke of Clarence, by whom he had large Possessions in the Province of Ulster; and by his prudent Government, had before his Death settled that barbarous People in great Peace and Order; he left one Son, Roger, who succeeded him in the Earldom of March, and a Daughter, Ann, who by Richard Earl of Cambridge was Grandmother to King Edward IV. John Wickliffe also published an Explication of several of his Doctrines and Opinions, which the Archbishop and Bishops were very zealous to suppress; as Mr. Fox, and our Ecclesiastical Histories relate it.

On the Tuesday after the Feast of S. John Portlatine, May 6. another Parliament met at Westmin- ster; in which, at the earnest Petition of the Knights of the Shires, John Wraw, a Priest, who had been active in raising the Rebellion in Suffolk, was tried, and after a Legal Sentence drawn and hang'd. In this Parliament, among other things of less Importance, one Act very memorable is said to have been made, which began the first Persecution that ever was among the English for the Christian Religion, on the Followers of Wickliffe. By it it was enacted, That Commissions should, upon the Certificate and Request of the Bishops into the Chancery, be directed by the Chancellor to the Sheriffs, and others, to apprehend certain Preachers of Heresie, who without the Licence of their Ordinaries, preached not only in Churches and Church-yards, but in Market-places, and other Places of Concourse, Sermons full of Errors and Heresie, and their Followers, and to keep them in strong Prison until they shall justify themselves according to the Law of the Holy Church. By Authority of this Act, the Bishops not only proceeded with great Severity against the Followers of Wickliffe's Doctrine, but as if the Power had been in their own hands, they procured Commissions from the King directed to themselves to prosecute them; and so cruelly imprison'd them in their own Houses, and punish'd them as they pleased. But this Act, tho' put in our Statute-Books, was not passed by the Assent of the Commons (as Mr. Fox in his Acts and Mon. p. 406. shews) but was fraudulently procured of the King by the Bishops to gratify their own bloody Malice against those whom they pleased to call Hereticks. A Subsidy was granted to the King by this Parliament, but upon condition, That it should be expended upon a Navy to guard the Nation by Sea.

This Summer some Ships that belong'd to Rye, and the adjacent Towns, meeting with some Pirates engag'd them, and overcoming them took seven of their Ships (of which one was an English Ship, call'd the Falcon, belonging to the Lord Latimer) richly laden with Wine, Wax, and other Merchandize, which they had taken from others. Also John Northampton, alias Comberton, Mayor of London, observing with Sorrow the Lewdness and Debaucheries of the Citizens, set himself with all Diligence to suppress them; and severely punish'd all such as he found guilty of Whoredom, by imprisoning both Sexes, and causing the Women to be carry'd thro' the Streets of London with their Hair shorn, as Thieves were in those days usually expos'd to Shame, with Trumpets and Pipes going before them; nor did he spare the Men more. The Bishops pretending, that the Punishment of such Immoralities belonged to their Jurisdiction rather than the Mayor's, were highly displeased with him, and forbid him; but that did not in the least deter him from proceeding in so good a Work, so long as his Power lasted, tho' against the Bishop's Will, who ought to have encourag'd him. Whether this uneven Zeal of the Church-men against Opinions and Doctrines, more than vicious Practices, were the cause of those fearful Judgments which happen'd at the same time they were carrying on their Prosecutions, is hard for us peremptorily to determine; but certain it is, that many heavy Calamities befel the Nation at this time. Such an Earthquake was felt, as not only wrought great Terrours in the Inhabitants, but shook down divers Churches and Houses in the Nation, and

* In this Parliament an Act of General Pardon pass'd, with some Exceptions to the following Towns, Canterbury, S. Edmunds Bury, Beverly, Scarborough, Bridgewater, and Cambridge; which, it seems, had been most mutinous in the late troublesome Times, and at last these Towns were also pardon'd, by Petition of the House of Commons.

* John Wickliffe is said to have put the Mayor of London upon this Reformation of Manners in that City, because he saw the Bishops Ministers tolerated all Lewdness for Money.

A. D. 1382. principally in Kent. Not many Days after happen'd a Water-shake, as it was call'd, which beat the Ships in the Havens so violently together, that many received no finall damage. And about S. Thomas-day there fell such great Rains, as caus'd mighty Inundations, which drowned many Villages, and carryed away divers Bridges.

Reg. 6.
King's Disposition at seventeen Years of Age.

His Favourites.

Id. Scroop the Chancellor remov'd, and the occasion.

The King, being now in his seventeenth Year, began to discover his Inclinations and Affections. He lov'd the State and Magnificence of a King, and was very Noble, Generous and Liberal, out-going all his Ancestors in stately Equipages, and the pompous Gallantry of a Court; but he lov'd not the burthenfome Cares and dangerous Achievements of a Crown, giving himself up to Pleasures and Ease, and favouring such as most encouraged and applauded him by their Flatteries and Company in that course of Life. His best Friends, and wisest Counsellors, knowing how much such a Life was inconsistent with the Greatness and Interests of a King, could not countenance his Choice, but much disapproved his Actions, to which he being too fondly addicted, and beyond all compulsive Restraints, became averse to the Persons and Counsels of such as really tender'd his Advantage, and the flourishing State of his Reign, and pleas'd himself in the Company and Careless of those Persons which sought to please him, with advantage to themselves, magnifying his Power, and extolling that Life of Ease and Pleasure which he naturally lov'd, as most suitable to the Happiness and State of a King. The chief of these Men were Alexander Nevill Archbishop of York, Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, a young and sprightly Nobleman, Michael de la Poole a Merchant's Son of London, and Sir Robert Tresilian Chief Justice. These Men had the Ear, the Company and Favour of the King, whilst others bore the heavy Toils and Troubles of Government, and scarce received Thanks for their pains; which rais'd Discontents in the one, and Pride and Insolency in the other; Passions which can never subsist long quietly together, as this Accident discovers to us: One of these Favourites having obtain'd a Concession of some part of the King's Revenues, went to the Lord Chancellor, Richard Scroop, to have it confirm'd by the Great Seal. The Chancellor, considering that Gifts are the Rewards of Deserts only, and that it was hardly agreeable to the Trust reposed in him, to confirm such Grants rashly as the King had given indiscreetly, put him off with this Answer, 'That the King was himself much in debt, and that all Profits of the Crown were therefore to be employ'd to the benefit of the King; wherefore he refused to set his Seal to such Grants till the King was of greater Age and Judgment. The angry Petitioner goes immediately to the King, and with Aggravations of the Chancellor's Disobedience, represents his Denial to him. The King, impatient of all Opposition at best, but much more now, being enrag'd by the Instigations of such as were about him, sent immediately to him to deliver up the Seal; but the Chancellor, having been put into that Office by the Parliament, refused to resign it, till the King came himself in Person and demanded it of him; to whom he, with all due Respect, said at his parting with it, 'That since his Fidelity to his Interests was so displeasing to him, he never would again serve him in any place of Trust, tho' he would obey him as a good Subject. The King having thus gotten the Seal, gave it to Robert Braybrooke Bishop of London. And tho' he pleas'd himself and Favourites in thus transferring that great Office, yet it much disgusted the Parliament, who had put the Lord Scroop into it, and discontented the People, who accounted him the fittest Person of the Nation for that Office, because of his impartial Justice and great Knowledge.

Not long after this Change, the Parliament met at Westminster, in the Octaves of St. Michael. In this Parliament, after the Confirmation of the Charter and old Laws in the usual manner, it was enacted, 'That Deeds enrolled, which had been torn and defaced by the Rebels, should be exemplified under the King's great Seal, and such Exemplifications shall be of as great Force as the Originals; which much pleas'd the King's loyal Subjects, whose Estates were endanger'd by the loss of their Writings. John Northampton Mayor of London also procured an Act, in prejudice to the Fishmongers of London, 'That no Victualler should exercise any Judicial Office, either in the City of London, or in any Borough, Town, or Sea-port, through the Realm, unless where no sufficient Person else can be had for such Office, in which Case such Person was to abstain from his Trade during the time of his Office. By this Act all Victuallers, viz. Fishmongers, Butchers and Grocers, (for so it seems they were then reputed) were debarr'd from being Mayors of London. Sir John Plilpot was much against this Action of the Mayor, and is said to have been put from the Bench of the City for opposing it. Mr. Fox in his Acts and Mon. p. 406. sets down a Petition of the Commons of this Parliament, extracted out of the Parliament Rolls, Art. 52. wherein the Commons humbly request of the King, 'That the Act made the last Session, giving the Bishops Authority upon their Certificates into Chancery to require Commissions to apprehend and imprison the Preachers, Maintainers and Abettors of Wickliffe's Doctrines, should be disannulled, because it was procured without their consent; and the King yielded to their Petition. Yet by the Artifices of the Bishops the aforesaid Repeal was suppressed, and Prosecutions carry'd on by virtue of the said surreptitious Act, without the least regard had to the Repeal; which is the Reason that that Act of Repeal has never since been printed among our Statutes. These were the chief Matters transacted by this Parliament; for no Tax was granted but a single fifteenth, instead of which the King granted a general Pardon to all concerned in the former Rebellion, excepting only some of the more notorious Leaders in it.

The second Holy War began now to be espoused in earnest in England. For Pope Urban sent over his Bulls to Henry Spenser Bishop of Norwich, a Man better qualify'd for the Camp than Church, granting large Pardon of Sin, and promising as great Imputations of Merit and Happiness, as if they had went against Turks and Infidels, to all such as would either go in Person, or contribute Money to maintain a War against Clement the Antipope, and his Adherents. The Clergy preach'd up the Merit of this Expedition, and gained many Lords, Knights and Gentlemen, as well as great multitudes of the common People to undertake it. Nothing but Money (which they had gather'd in great Sums, yet not sufficient for so chargeable an Undertaking) and the Consent of the King and Nation were wanting to the intended design, both which they referr'd to the Consideration of the next Parliament.

Toward the latter end of this Summer, Edmund Earl of Cambridge return'd out of Portugal, with the English Army under his Command, much discontented for the ill success of his Voyage. They had had a very hard and dangerous passage, and when they

* The King kept the Seal for some Days in his own Custody, and seal'd several Grants with it himself.

arriv'd,

A. D. 1382. arriv'd, found the King of Portugal, who had invited them, very backward in his Preparations, as if he were hardly resolv'd upon a War. They lay nine Months in Lisbon in Garrison, without any Action of moment, giving their Enemy the King of Spain time to raise an Army, which with such aid as he procured out of France thro' Arragon, was too strong for Opposition. So that by that time the Portuguese and English were ready to fight, the Spaniard was irresistible, and that King, who had no mind to fight at first, was in the end justly deterr'd from it. The English nevertheless being weary of Idleness, could not by the Persuasions of their General be kept from attempting something. Wherefore they invaded the neighbouring Territories of Spain, and taking several small Cities, put Garrisons into them. This angered the King of Portugal so much that he refused to pay the English according to agreement, which had like to have begotten a Quarrel between them, tho' Confederates; for the English had purposed to plunder the Country, and satisfy themselves. But this Breach being compos'd, the King of Portugal made a Peace with the King of Spain, and sent away the English with all speed, as if he had been glad to rid his Kingdom of so terrible Guests. The Earl of Cambridge was so much incens'd with this unexpected Treatment, that he departed in a great anger, and would not leave his Son behind him, tho' he had affianced him to the King of Portugal's Daughter. His arrival in England was no good news to the Duke of Lancaster, whose Title became so much the more worthless, as his Enemy was more successful.

1383. A little after Christmas a Parliament met at Westminister, to which the Consideration of the intended Expedition against the Adherents of Pope Clement was referr'd, and upon a full Debate disallow'd; but the Clergy and their Friends at length made such Interests that it was permitted, and a fifteenth which had been granted to the King by the former Parliament was given for the carrying on the Expedition, and only a tenth granted by the Clergy, reserved for the King's use. The Bishop of Norwich having received this Encouragement, sent out his Letters immediately unto all Parsons of his Diocese to preach up the Merit of this Holy War, and pronounce Pardon of Sin to all that would go to it; and his Brethren in other Diocesses did the same: Which had so great an effect, that by the entrance of the Spring he had an Army ready to attend him of fifteen thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse. The chief Men, who accompany'd the Bishop in this War, were Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir William Farrington, Henry Lord Beaumont, Sir William Elmham, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir John Ferrers, Sir Henry Spenser the Bishop's Nephew, Sir Matthew Redman, Sir Nicholas Traillton, and some others. Few of the Noblemen would engage in it, because the Duke of Lancaster oppos'd it, and would by no means be induced to joyn in it, unless they would have made War upon the King of Castile, who was also a Clementine. On the 23d of April these Religious Warriours put to Sea, and landed at Callis. The King had some Days before sent to the Bishop to attend him at Court before he left the Realm, for what Reason was not known; but the Bishop fearing it was to countermand his Proceedings, would not go to the King, but went on his intended Voyage. When they were all arriv'd at Callis, they entred into a Consultation which way they should bend their Forces. Some were for invading France, because their Commission was to make War only upon Pope Clement and his Party, of which the French were the chief. But the Bishop was for invading Flanders, because the Earl Lewis had lately expell'd all the English out of his Dominions, upon a Supposition, that King Richard had joyned with the People of Gaunt against him, and many in their hasty Removal from Bruges, and other places, had sustain'd great Damages in their Merchandizes. To the Bishop's Judgment they all yielded, tho' Sir Hugh Calverley and some others did not approve of it; and therefore entering Flanders in the beginning of May, they besieged and took in less than three Weeks Graveling, Burburgh, Dunkirk, and Mardike. This sudden Storm the Earl of Flanders not suspecting, sent to the Bishop to know the Cause why he made War upon him, and was answer'd, Because he had a Commission to assault all the Abettors of Pope Clement. The Earl's Messengers reply'd, That they then were his Friends and Allies, being for Pope Urban; but that was not sufficient to divert the English from them. Whereupon the Earl raised an Army of twelve thousand Men to oppose the Current of their Victories, and engag'd them about Mardike; but the English behav'd themselves with that Valour and Resolution, that they slew nine thousand of their Enemies on the place, and gained a great Victory; upon which they immediately became Masters of all the Country between Graveling and Sluce, and got such Spoils as laden one and forty Ships with the Riches of the Country. The Earl of Flanders being thus driven to the lowest ebb of Fortune, hath no Refuge but to the King of France, whom he solicited with the greatest Earnestness to oppose and stop the Current of the English Victories, which would certainly in the issue prove dangerous to his Kingdom. The Duke of Burgundy seconded the Earl's Request, and prevail'd so far with the French King, as to raise an Army of a hundred thousand Men. In the mean season, the English being reinforced with twenty thousand Gauntiners, had laid close Siege to the City of Ipres, and tho' it was a very strong Town, were in no small hopes of taking it. But the Earl of Flanders hastening out the French Forces against them, oblig'd them to raise the Siege, after one successful Assault, and retire to Burburgh, wherein they fortify'd themselves with Waggon's set upon the Rampeirs and Ditches. The French pursu'd them, and besieg'd the Town; but by the mediation of the Duke of Britain, a fast Friend to the English, a Composition was made, 'That the English, upon their surrendring up the Town to the French, should have safe Conduct, with Arms and Baggage, to Callis; which was perform'd on both sides. The English being thus driven out of Flanders again, all the places which they had taken fell into the hands of the French, who spoil'd them of all the English had left. The King, to whom the Bishop of Norwich had given an account of the French Army's success while he was besieg'd in Burburgh, had order'd the Duke of Lancaster to hasten over with all the Force he could to relieve the Bishop; but the Duke delay'd so long, till the Bishop had left all, and was landed in England. Thus this Expedition concluded, with both Dishonour and Disadvantage to the English; for they not only lost the Towns, but the Prey they had gotten, being forced to burn their Ships, lest they should come into the Enemy's hand; which that the King might shew his Repentments of, he seiz'd upon the Bishop's Temporalities, and imprison'd Sir Thomas Trivet and Sir William Elmham soon after their return.

After the Departure of the English Army home, the French and Scots began their wonted Ravages

The French sent out several Ships to infest the Coasts, and annoy the Passage into Gascogne and Flanders: The Scots invaded the Borders, drove away a great Booty of Cattel, took the Castle of Werke, and burnt it. The Inhabitants of Portsmouth, and the Neighbouring Towns, set out some Ships to defend their Coasts, which took five Ships of the French after a sharp Fight; another Squadron of English Vessels took eight French Ships laden with Wines, to the Quantity of fifteen hundred Tun; but the Scots found no Opposition till the Parliament met, and gave a Tax to defray the Charge of the Expedition.

Tenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

On the Monday before the Feast of All Saints, the Parliament met at Westminster, and after the Confirmation of the Charters, and other old Laws, repealed the Act against the Victuallers made in the last Parliament, and enacted, That no Foreigner should purchase any Benefice of the Church in this Realm, or enjoy the same without a special Licence from the King, with several other Laws. But since the main end of their meeting was to provide for the Defence of the Nation against the Scots, it was resolved, That a puissant Army should be immediately raised to repress their Insults with Severity; and for that end, there was given the King half a fifteenth of the Laity, and half a tenth of the Clergy; and because it would require some time to raise an Army of such Strength as was design'd, therefore a part of the Tax was order'd to be allow'd the Lords of the North to guard the Borders, till the Grand Army could arrive. The Scots having Advice of this impending Storm, sued to the King for the Continuation of the Truce, which they had broken, but were deny'd, and sent home to provide for their Defence; and the Care of providing and conducting the Army, was committed to the Duke of Lancaster and the Earl of Buckingham, with Order to be ready to march early in the Spring.

The Duke of Britain seeing Matters to ripen apace to a War between the French and English, small inroads and Incurfions being usually Prologues to great Battels, solicited the French King earnestly to come to a Peace, and by many Importunities prevail'd, of which he gave the King of England speedy notice. About Christmas the Commissioners on both sides met: The Duke of Lancaster, Earl of Buckingham, Sir Thomas Holland and Sir Thomas Peirce, were Plenipotentiaries for the English; the Dukes of Berry and Burgogne, the Bishop of Laon, and the Chancellor of France, were for the French. The King of Spain also had some Embassadors at the Treaty, because the French would not conclude any thing, unless the Scots and Spaniards were included in it. Three Weeks or more were spent in Propositions on both sides, but the Demands of the French were so extravagant, and so obstinately persisted in, especially in having Aquitain, Callis, and some other Castles, which the English then held in France, deliver'd up to them, that they came to no Agreement; but for the present made a Truce for ten Months, and at the end of them agreed to meet again to conclude a Peace, and so the English returned. The Spaniards, Scots, and Gauntiners, were included in this Truce; and the French were, by an Article of it, to give the Scots notice of it. Soon after this Accord the Earl of Flanders died, and the Duke of Burgundy, who had marry'd the Earl's Daughter, being Heir of all his Dominions, was very busie in settling himself in his Government, so that he forgot to give the Scots notice of the Truce. The English having already made Preparations to invade Scotland, proceeded in their

Design; and about the beginning of Lent, the Duke of Lancaster, and his Brother the Earl of Buckingham, went with a very great Army down thither, and wasted all the Country with Fire and Sword, as far as Edinburgh; out of which also the Inhabitants were fled, with the best of their Goods, to save themselves from this Torrent. The Duke of Burgundy hearing of this Rupture, which was no Breach of the Truce, because it was not confirm'd with the Scots through his own Neglect, immediately dispatch'd an Embassy into Scotland to compose this Breach; but the Scots, who had receiv'd so much Damage, were so hardly brought to sit down without Revenge, that the English Army did almost as much harm by their long Continuance on the Borders to their Countrymen, as they had done to the Scots; but at last a Cessation of Arms was consented to for the time fix'd, and the English return'd home. About this time happen'd very great Thunders and Lightnings, Presages of those Tumults, which concurr'd in the City of London between John Northampton, call'd for his turbulent Humour Cumbertown, and Sir Nicholas Bramber, Mayor.

A little after Easter there was a Convocation of the Nobles at Salisbury, and in it one John Latimer, B. D. an Irish Fryar appeared, and brought an Information against the Duke of Lancaster. That he had a design to destroy the King, and usurp his Crown, relating such Circumstances of his Actions, as render'd the Accusation very probable. The Duke being about the King at the same time came into his Presence, as soon as the King had receiv'd the Accusation, not suspecting what had happen'd; but seeing the King displeased, withdrew. The King having taken Advice of his two Chaplains about it, sent for the Duke, and told him how and by whom he was charged of high Treason against his Person. The Duke not seeming concern'd, as if he had been innocent, gave such an Answer to every Particular, as satisfied the King that he had no such Intentions; yet desired, that the Fryar might be put into safe Custody, till he should clear himself of what he had charg'd him with: Whereupon he was committed to the keeping of the Lord Holland, the King's Brother, in the Tower. When the day of Tryal was come, and the Duke was to clear himself, and convince the Fryar of false Accusation, in a publick Judicature, the Lord John Holland and Sir Henry Green, two of the Duke's Friends, the Night before entering the Fryar's Lodgings, cruelly put him to Death with their own hands, by hanging him up by the Neck and privy Members, and laying a great Stone upon his Breast, which brake his Back; and as if they had done this by publick Authority, drew his dead Body through the Streets the next day, as being deservedly punish'd as a Traytor. This cruel Action got the Duke much Dishonour, and tho' it rid him of a false Accuser, as was thought till the Fryar was so illegally put to Death; yet it render'd his Innocency more suspicious than before, and many believed him really guilty, who before thought him falsely accused. This Parliament gave the King half a Tenth of the Clergy, and half a fifteenth of the Laity, and so was dissolv'd.

The Scots notwithstanding the Truce, which they were over-persuaded, rather than yielded to, could not forbear to revenge the Wrongs they so lately suffer'd by the English; and therefore infested the Borders with continual Inroads and Plunderings all this Summer, and particularly did much Wrong to the Inhabitants of Northumberland. The Earls of Northumberland and Nottingham, who were the

Reg. 8. The Truce renewed with France. The Truce made with the French and their Allies being now near the Expiration, the Duke of Lancaster was sent over again with a great Equipage to endeavour a Peace, or renew the Truce for a longer time. He remain'd a great while there, as if some great things were settled; but at length return'd with the News only of a Continuation of the Truce till May, which was generally meanly thought of, as not worth the time and Expence that was consumed about it. In the Duke's absence John Northampton, Alderman of London, was accused by his own Chaplain of conspiring against the King and Government, and raising Stirs in the City. He had his Tryal at Reading, before many of the Nobles of the Realm, but could alledge nothing in his own Defence, only that he ought not to be condemned in the absence of the Duke of Lancaster<sup>b</sup>; yet being found guilty, he was sentenced to perpetual Imprisonment at an hundred Miles distance from London, and all his Goods to be confiscated, which Sentence was executed strictly, and he was sent to Tintagil Castle in Cornwall and his Goods and Estate were all seized for the King. The like Punishment did his Associates John More and Richard Norbery suffer.

Eleventh Parliament, its Acts and Taxes. On the Morrow of St. Martin, Nov. 12. the Parliament met at Westminster to furnish the King with Moneys for the War, which threaten'd him from the Scots and French; which, when his Subjects had given liberally, the King in Recompence passed several Laws for the exact Administration of Justice, viz. That no Judge should keep an Assize in the County where he lives; That a Judge should take no Fee or Reward for the Administration of Justice, but only of the King; and if any Judge raise a Record, make a false Entry, or change a Verdict, he shall after Conviction make Satisfaction to the Party aggrieved, and be fined at the King's Pleasure. While this Parliament was sitting, the Scots besieged and took the Town and Castle of Barwicke, yet not so much by their Valour as by the Bribery of the Governour; who being put in by the Earl of Northumberland, to whom belong'd the keeping of that Garrison, by Inheritance from his Ancestors, brought great Blame upon the Earl. For the Duke of Lancaster, who bore an ill Will to the Earl, so aggravated the Loss of the Town, that he had almost persuaded the Members of both Houses, that it was a treasonable Conspiracy in him and his Deputy to resign it to them; but the King observing the Passion and Prejudice of his Uncle, permitted the Earl to go down to recover it, tho' many of the Nobles were for imprisoning him. He bestir'd himself so briskly among his Friends in the North, that he gather'd an Army, and so straightly besieg'd the Castle, that the Scots surrender'd it in a few days upon better Conditions than they gave the English, viz. That they should march out with their Arms and Goods, and have two thousand Marks paid them down by the Earl, because he was willing to get it again in as small time, and with as little Loss to the Nation as possible. This set him right again in the good Opinion both of King and Parliament, and taught him more Care for the future, in chusing such Deputies as would be faithful. In the time of the sitting of this Parliament were two Combats fought before the King, one between John Welsh, an English Gentleman, and a Navarrais, and the other A. D. 1384. between John Wallis, and a Navarre Esquire. The English Gentlemen were Victors, and the Navarrais hang'd, as false Accusers; for Victory in these single Fights was accounted a sign of Innocency.

The Duke of Lancaster, who being the King's Uncle, and chief Governour about the King, was the greatest Obstruction to the ambitious Aims of the King's Favourites; who growing now impatient of Delays, thought upon all ways to remove him, if not out of the World, yet out of the King's Affections, was now in great Danger of losing both his Life and Honour by their means. For these cunning Flatterers having by forged Crimes and Accusations incens'd the King against him, contriv'd to have him suddenly arrested, and try'd before Judge Trisilian; who being perfectly framed to their Interests, would be ready enough upon such Evidence as they should produce to condemn him. But these Consultations were not so closely manag'd, but they got Wind, and came to the Duke's Ear; who knowing that Innocency in such cases could not be Guard sufficient against their bloody Designs, fled to Pomfract Castle, and there strongly fortified himself against his Adversaries, drawing in all his Friends of the Nobility to his Assistance. The Duke indeed was not very well belov'd by the People, yet the King's Favourites were generally so odious, that the greatest Endearment to the People was to oppose them: So that if the King had persisted in his Anger against the Duke, here was a Foundation laid for a Civil War between his Favourites and Nobility. This the King's Mother presently observ'd, and easily foresaw the Effects of, and therefore in her own Person undertook a Mediation between the King and Duke; and to make a Peace between them, tho' she was very corpulent and unfit for Travel, yet made many Journeys from the one to the other; and in the end, by the Duke's dutiful Submission, wrought a perfect Reconciliation between them, to the great Satisfaction of the Nation, as well as her own Eternal Honour.

The Truce between the English and French being to expire in May, the French King resolv'd upon a vigorous War with England as soon as it was ended, and to that end first sent the Duke of Bourbon with an Army into Aquitaine to drive the English from thence, and then provided a great Fleet, which he fill'd with Land Soldiers, to invade the Coasts; and that the Scots, his inseparable Confederates, might be able to make the stronger Opposition on their part, and divert the English the more, he sent his Admiral John de Vienne into Scotland with a thousand Men at Arms, besides Cross-Bows, to strengthen them against the English. The Scots were not at all pleas'd at their Arrival, because they thought themselves strong enough to encounter the English alone, and chiefly because their Country being barren, could not afford Forage for Strangers, without some Prejudice to the Inhabitants: But the French Admiral promising the King of Scots a large Sum of Money for the Damages they should sustain; and for their Assistance, encouraged him to raise an Army of thirty thousand Men, to joyn with his Master. The King of England and his Council were not ignorant of these joyn't Proceedings against the Nation; and to provide against both, not only fitted out a strong Navy, under the Command of the Lord S. Johns and Sir Thomas Peirey, but sent into all Parts of the Kingdom to summon together an Army against the common Enemy. The general

A. D. 1385. Fear of an Invasion stirred up so many to stand up in the publick defence, that the King in a short time had an Army of three hundred thousand Men to attend him. With a part of these, viz. sixty thousand, the Duke of Lancaster was immediately sent towards Scotland, the King himself resolving to follow as fast as he could with the rest.

Reg. 9.

The Scots and French had been very busie in plundering, burning and killing, before they had the news of the Duke of Lancaster's approach; but as soon as they heard of that, they retreated home, and with their Cattel withdrew themselves into the Mountains: So that the Duke found no opposition. The King being come to York, heard of the Scots retiring, yet proceeded in his Journey, and joyning with the Duke destroy'd the Country of Scotland as far as Edenburgh, which City also they burnt, all but the Abby of Holy-rood, which was spared by the Intercession of the Duke of Lancaster, because he had been civilly entertain'd in that Convent in the time of the late Rebellion. The French were very desirous to have stopped the progress of the English Army, by giving them Battel; but the Scots shewing them from the Hills the Numbers and Strength of the English, prevail'd with them to wait for a more probable way of revenging themselves by an Invasion of England on another side. So they passing over the Hills, fell into Cumberland, and did much mischief there to countervail their own Losses. The King of England and his Army remain'd but five days about Edenburgh, and then return'd, and by the way heard of the Scots Inroads. The Duke of Lancaster advis'd the King to stop up the Passes strongly, that they might all fall into his power, which they could not have avoided, had it been done; but the Earl of Oxford, who was most in favour, and whose advice the King principally follow'd, suggested to him, that the Duke of Lancaster designed to bring his Person into danger: Whereupon the King neglected the advantage, and departed home. In his return, a great trouble happen'd to the Army by the Murther of the Earl of Stafford's eldest Son, slain by the Lord John Holland, the King's half Brother. The Murther was so foul, being without any provocation on the Lord Stafford's part, that the King resolv'd to punish his Death by Law, and so much the more, because he was the Queen's Favourite. The King's Mother was very importunate with him to pardon the Lord John Holland her Son, who was fled to Sanctuary at Beverley, but not obtaining, she fell sick with the violence of the discontent, dy'd within four or five days, and was bury'd at Wal-lingford. The Scots being return'd home, found their Country so miserably harass'd and wast'd, that they turn'd their Fury upon the French, who had been the Movers of them to this War, and spoiling them of all they had, sent them home.

The King's Justice in punishing Murther.

Nor was the French Navy more successful against the English, than their Land Army had been. The English Fleet indeed, through negligence of the Commanders, did not act its part so well as it might have done; but yet it kept them from landing, and the People of Callis, Portsmouth, and Dartmouth, with the Ships belonging to their Ports, took about thirty Ships at several times from them, which with eleven that they lost by Storms, much lessen'd the Fleet, and depriv'd them of the Triumph they dream'd of. And thus ended the French Expedition.

Twelfth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

On the Monday after S. Luke's-day a Parliament met at Westminster, wherein though little publick Business was done, yet there happen'd a signal Contest about the raising of a Subsidy then granted to the King; for after the Laity had granted him a fifteenth and an half, the Clergy refused to bear their proportion of a tenth and an half, according to the usual manner, and Archbishop Courtney boldly deny'd the Payment of it. The Commons being incensed at this Refusal of the Clergy, petition'd the King, that he would seize upon their Temporalities. But the King, who was always a great Favourer of the Church, answer'd, 'That he would continue the Patronage which he had always shew'd to the Church so long as he liv'd, and would rather gratifie the Clergy's Humour, than offer any Injury to their Function. This mild and pious Answer so prevail'd upon the Clergy, when the Archbishop related it to them, that they voluntary gave the King a tenth part of their Benefices; which being so freely done, and beyond the King's expectation, the King told them, That it was more pleasing to him than if he had received four times as much by Compulsion; and upon the Petition of the Bishops, who came to make the Tenders of this Subsidy, he restor'd the Bishop of Norwich to his Temporalities, which he had kept some Years in his hands. In this Session of Parliament the King made several Promotions, creating several new Dukes and Earls. Edmund Earl of Cambridge he made Duke of York; Thomas Earl of Buckingham, Duke of Gloucester; Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, Marquis of Dublin; Henry of Bullingbrooke, eldest Son of the Duke of Lancaster, Earl of Derby; Edward Plantagenet, the eldest Son of the Duke of York, Earl of Rutland; Michael de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, and Lord Chancellor; Thomas Mowbray, Earl of Nottingham, Earl Marshal; and by the Authority of this Parliament Roger Mortimer Earl of March was publickly proclaim'd Heir apparent to the Crown of England. And then the Session ended by reason of the approach of Christmas.

A. D. 1386.

The King and Queen kept their Christmas at Eltham this Year, according to Custom of these times, which was at the three great Festivals of the Year to keep open Court, and in a most magnificent and princely State to feast and entertain all the Nobility of the Nation, and foreign Princes or their Ministers. To the King at this time came Leo King of Armenia, who had been expell'd out of his Dominions by the Turks, endeavouring to make a Peace between the Kings of England and France, that he might engage them both against the common Enemy of Christianity. He had no success in his Proposals of Peace, because both Nations hated each other too much to hearken to any moderate terms of Agreement; but he was nobly entertain'd for two Months by the King and Nobility, and presented with many rich Gifts, and at his departure the King, by the advice of his Council, settled a yearly Pension of a thousand Pound for his Life upon him. A little after Christmas, the Earl of Derby marry'd the only Daughter and Heiress of Humphry Bobun Earl of Hereford, in whose Right he was a little after made Duke of Hereford. A Peace also was now concluded between the Citizens of Gaunt, who had by the assistance of the English held out a War with the late Earl of Flanders all his Life-time, and the Duke of Burgundy their new Lord; whereupon Sir John Bourchier the Captain of the English, and Peter de Bois one of the chief Captains of the Gauntiners, were sent over into England from Callis, and King Richard allow'd De Bois a hundred Pound a Year Sterling out of his Customs upon Wools. About the same time also Roger Earl of March having re-

Leo King of Armenia came over to K. Richard.

A. D. 1386. Reverend Morimer killed in Ireland. Received fresh news, that the wild Irish had done much Injury to his Estate in Ulster, which was descended to him by his Mother, he undertook a Voyage into Ireland to appease them, and rescue his Lands from their Depredations, but was very unfortunate in this Attempt; for not long after his arrival, the Irish being assembled in a great Company, assaulted and took his Castle, slaying him and almost all his Retinue. He left behind him a numerous Off-spring, viz. two Sons and three Daughters. His two Sons, Edmund and Roger, dy'd Childless; Ann his eldest Daughter was marry'd to Richard Earl of Cambridge, then eldest Son to the Duke of Tork, by whom she had Richard Earl of Cambridge, the Father to Edward IV. Of the other two, Eleanor was a Nun, and Alice left no Children, if she were marry'd.

R. of Spain invades Portugal, and D. of Lancaster goes against him. The King of Spain pretending a Right to the Crown of Portugal by his Wife, made War this Spring upon that King, and besieged Lisbon, the Metropolis of his Country. The Portuguese had twice encounter'd the Spaniards, and had by the help of some English as often foil'd them, but yet could not raise the Siege of Lisbon. Wherefore the King of Portugal being sensible that the Duke of Lancaster, who was King of Spain in Title, would be glad of any opportunity to make himself so indeed, and that there could not be a better way to secure himself, than by a Conjunction of their Arms together, sends an Embassy into England to the Duke, to beg his speedy assistance, and promise him an easie recovery of his Right, because he had already foil'd the Spaniards twice alone, and their united Arms would infallibly effect a Conquest. The Duke, who had been for some time making Preparations for this Expedition, and was much encouraged to it by the King and his Friends, who long'd to have him out of their way, was ready to embrace so likely an Offer; and therefore, that he might lose no time, muster'd up his Forces with all speed, and began his Voyage thither in the beginning of May. His Fleet was eighteen Ships, and seven Gallies, of which Sir Thomas Percy was Admiral; and his Army, of which the Lord John Holland, who marry'd his Daughter, was Constable, and Sir Thomas Moreaux one of his Marshals, consisted of twenty thousand Men, viz. two thousand Men of Arms, eight thousand Archers, and ten thousand others. Many Noblemen accompany'd the Duke to share in his Fortunes, as the Lords Lucy, Talbot, Basset, Willoughby, Fitz-Water, Poynings, Bradston, Fitz-Warren, Beauchamp, and Beaumont, besides many Knights and Gentlemen. He carry'd along with him his Wife, the Lady Constance Princess of Spain, and Katherine her Daughter, with Philippa his other Daughter. Just before his departure, he and his Dutcheß took their leave of the King and Queen, and the King gave the Duke a Silver Crown, and commanded that his Men should obey him as King of Spain; and the Queen gave the Dutcheß another Crown of Silver, with many good Wishes of Success in obtaining their Right.

Reg. 10. As the Duke pass'd by Brest with his Army, he called upon Sir John Roche then Governour of the Town, who complaining that he was much infested by two Forts lately built by the French to annoy his Garrison, the Duke sent out a strong Force under the Lord Fitz-Water to assault and demolish them, which they at length did; but they were so well defended by the French, that it cost them many Lives of valiant Men, as Sir Robert Swinerton, John Bolton Esq; and others, and was gained by them at last by Capitulation, the French Governor the Lord Maletret being wounded, and most of the Men in the Fort slain. From A. D. Brest, after this brave Exploit, the Duke pass'd along the Coasts of Gallicia, and landed at the Groin with all his Army upon S. Lawrence's Eve, Aug. 9. Here they tarry'd a Month, and then the Duke went to Compostella. While the Duke winter'd at Compostella, the Lord John Holland kept the Army in Action, and won many small Garrisons in the neighbouring Country, and others willingly submitted to the Duke, because his Dutcheß, the right Heir of the Spanish Crown, was with them. The Duke in this Season, which was not fit for Action, consulted with the King of Portugal about their Expedition in the Spring at Moujon, and it was agreed that they would with their united Forces invade Spain; and to confirm their Alliance, the Duke affianced his Daughter Philippa to the King of Portugal.

While the Duke of Lancaster was in his passage towards Portugal with a numerous Army, the King of France, who had for some Years past resolv'd upon an Invasion of England, resum'd his Thoughts afresh, and as if he had now met with an opportunity, wherein he could not miss of the Success he desired, because he thought the Duke of Lancaster had empty'd the Nation both of Soldiers and Commanders, gather'd such a mighty Army and Fleet, as if he intended to conquer and people England at once with his French. He is said to have had fifteen hundred Ships, and a numberless Army, in which were twenty thousand Noblemen, with a proportionable Number of Commons. The news of these mighty Preparations not only struck a terror into the English, but put a stand to all the important Affairs of Christendom. The King of England, to secure his Nation, gather'd an Army of two hundred thousand Men, and with part of them fortify'd all the Sea-port Towns, and with another part defended the naked Shores in the places where they were most likely to land. The City of London also was in such fear, that they guarded their Walls, pulling down many Houses to make their defence the easier from them. Publick Fasts were appointed to lament the Dangers, and implore the Protection of God from their Enemies. All good Men bewail'd the approaching Invasion, as an unavoidable Scourge for the Nation's Sin, and could think upon nothing but Servitude or Death. The only Remedy and Defence against this Calamity was a Parliament, which upon that account was call'd together about Michaelmas, and accordingly met; but the Nobles brought such numbers of Men along with them, to be ready for their defence against the French if they should land, that all Towns within twenty Miles round about London, as well as that City and Suburbs, were filled with armed Men, who for want of pay were a great damage to the Inhabitants. At the opening of this Parliament, the King, as the occasion requir'd, demanded a present Subsidy to pay those Armies, which he had already got for the defence of the Nation, and make such other Provisions against the Enemy as the state of Affairs required. The Parliament were sensible of the danger the Kingdom was in, and easily consented to the King's desires, but thought it unreasonable to put any great Sums into his power, so long as he was so pliable to the covetous Humours of his Favourites, who made his Revenues but a Prey to enrich themselves. For Michael de la Poole the Chancellor, had, in less than a Year's time, by farming the King's Customs, and other Incomes, and wasting his Treasure, purchased a thousand Pound a Year in Land, and gather'd great Sums of Money which he kept in bank;

A. D. 1386. He was generally reputed guilty of Bribery in his Office, and indeed it could not be thought he could grow so suddenly rich, but by the Abuse of the King's Favours: Wherefore the Parliament unanimously resolved to have him removed with the rest of his Associates, or to give the King no Tax. This they signified to him by a Petition, wherein they not only represented the Misdemeanours of the Chancellor in his Office, and abusing the King's Favours to his own Gain; but the Poverty of the People, which ought much to be consider'd, and not further pressed than Necessity requir'd, which they humbly conceiv'd was not so great; but if the Chancellor were brought to a just Account, the King's Revenues, and the great Debts in the Chancellor's hands would be sufficient to defray them*. The King receiv'd the Petition very ill, and that he might avoid an Answer to it, withdrew to Eltham, leaving the Chancellor to press them to grant a Tax, and to demand four fifteenths in his Name. The Lords and Commons seeing the Cause of the King's Retreat, plainly told him, That they would give no Answer to his Demand, unless the King himself were present, and he was removed from his Office. The King had Intelligence soon of these Proceedings, and immediately sent up to the Parliament to order, that forty of their wisest Members should come down to him at Eltham, to declare to him the Reasons and Grounds of their Actions. The Parliament were in a great Dispute about this Message, because it was said, That the King had a Design to destroy and ensnare them; but at length it was agreed upon by both Houses, That the Duke of Gloucester, and Thomas Arundel Bishop of Ely, should be sent to the King in the Name of the whole Parliament, and the King was contented to have it so. When they came into his Presence, after all due Reverence paid to him, they submissively declar'd their Message to this effect, 'That the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled, desir'd nothing more than to live in Peace and Quietness like good Subjects under his Government; That as he might lawfully once a Year summon a Parliament, and require the Presence of the Lords and Commons at it, that by mutual Advice and Consent, they might reform all Oppressions, Wrongs, Extortions, and other grievous Enormities in the Realm, and enact such wholesome Laws as were for the Peace and Welfare of the King's Subjects, so they were met according to their Duty, and had no other Design than to pursue those Ends; That his late absence was a great Discomfort to them, and since there was an old Statute, whereby it was enacted, That if the King not hinder'd by Sicknes or necessary Business did absent himself forty days from his Parliament, they might return home, they should be oblig'd to leave him, if he still deny'd them his Presence. The King remaining yet in his Discontent and Anger reply'd, That he perceiv'd his People went about to rebel against him, and that he thought it better to desire the Assistance of the King of France, than submit to his own Subjects. The Lords reply'd, That the French King was the ancient and most inveterate Enemy of the Nation; who as he usurped his Dominions in France, so gaped after the English Throne, and therefore no Assistance was further to be expected from him, than such as might be a fair Pretence for him to get the Possession of his Right: That such Resolutions could proceed from nothing but the desperate Advice of his evil Counsellors, who by their Policy sought to uphold a Breach between him and his Parliament, which would end in his and his Peoples Ruine; wherefore they besought him to lay aside all Prejudice against his good Subjects, and to return to his Parliament, which no less sought and desir'd his Felicity than Presence. These, and other Arguments, which these wise Peers urged to the same Purpose, had so good an Effect upon the King, that he promis'd them to follow them, and accordingly came to the Houses soon after them. And here, in the midst of his Nobles and People, he immediately shewed how wise and good a Prince he was in himself, being separated from the bad Company and ill Counsellors that were about him; for he without much Reluctancy granted a Commission to the Duke of Gloucester, Earl of Arundel, and certain other Bishops and Noblemen, to survey and examine the Estate of his House and Courts, all his Officers and Ministers, Rents, Profits and Revenues; to correct and amend any Defaults and Offences prejudicial to his Person or Crown, and particularly to call Michael de la Poole Earl of Suffolk, the Chancellor, to an account about the Management of his Office. John Ford, or Fordham, Bishop of Durham, also was removed from his Place of Treasurer, and John Gilbert, Bishop of Hereford, was put in his Place. And because the Realm had for some Years past been badly govern'd, the Administration of all publick Affairs was put into the hands of thirteen Persons chosen by the Parliament, viz. Thomas Arundel Bishop of Ely, the Treasurer; Nicholas Abbot of Waltham, Lord Keeper; William Archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbishop of York, Edmund Duke of York, Thomas Duke of Gloucester, William Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Bishop of Exeter, Richard Earl of Arundel, Richard Lord Scroop, and John Lord Devereux. Richard Earl of Arundel, and Thomas Mowbray Earl of Nottingham, were made Admirals, and sent to Sea with a strong Navy to defend the Shore, and hinder the Passage of the Enemy. Robert de Vere Marquis of Dublin, created Duke of Ireland in this Parliament, was at the Petition of the Lords and Commons, order'd to be sent to Ireland before Easter next; and that the Nation might be rid of so dangerous a Person, and ill Counsellor, they consented that he should have thirty thousand Marks, which were shortly to be paid the King for the Heirs of the Lord Charles de Blois by the French, to provide him with an Equipage, and support his Charge there. While these things were thus order'd by the main Body of the Parliament, the Duke of Gloucester, and Earl of Arundel, with the other Lords in Commission with them, had examin'd and try'd the Chancellor; whom having found guilty of many high Crimes, Frauds and Treasons, they not only deposed him from his Office, but confiscated his Estate of a 1000 l. a Year, and fined him twenty thousand Marks. Thus did the Parliament not only pro-

* They remonstrated farther, That the Chancellor and Treasurer ought to be remov'd from their Offices. He answer'd them, They should not mention that, but proceed to Business: For he would not on their Account, or at their Request, remove the meanest Scullion Boy in his Kitchen.

† Thomas Arundel, Bishop of Ely, was made Chancellor. Henry Knighton. There were but eleven Commissioners appointed to have the Inspection of Affairs. These eleven were William Archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbishop of York, Edmund Duke of York, Thomas Duke of Gloucester, the King's Uncles; William Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Bishop of Exeter, Nicholas Abbot of Waltham, Lord Privy-Seal; Richard Earl of Arundel, John Lord Cobham, the Lord Scrope, and the Lord Devereux.

Notwithstanding these Preparations in England for its Defence, the French King held on his purpose to invade it with no less hopes of Success; and having all things ready for that Enterprize, waited at Sluice for nothing but the coming of the Duke of Berry, and a fair Wind. On All Saints Even a fair Gale blew, and the French King set Sail for England, tho' the Duke of Berry was not arrived, chusing rather that the Duke should follow them than lose so fair an Opportunity; but when they had passed about seven Leagues the Wind unexpectedly and suddenly turned, and brought them back again with much Loss. Before the Wind favour'd their Design again, the Duke of Berry, who was always averse to the Attempt, and delay'd his coming on purpose to prevent or discourage it, was arriv'd; and because the Winter was pretty well advanc'd, it being December, he very much dissuaded the King and Council from proceeding in it, as being both unsafe to his Kingdom and Army. This Advice was thought so reasonable, that the farther proceeding was laid aside till the Spring, and so that chargeable Design in the end came to nothing. But a clear different Account was carry'd of these Affairs into Spain; for there it was given out, that the French Army was landed in England, and therefore the King of Portugal's Council gave him Advice, That he should defer his Marriage with the Duke of Lancaster's Daughter, till they should know the Event of the French Expedition into England; because if that proved successful, as 'twas probable, an Alliance with the Duke would be of no Worth, which occasion'd some Coldness in the Duke's Affairs in Portugal, tho' the Reasons were kept from him for the present.

The Parliament being broken up, and returned home, the King was left again to his own unsteady Resolutions and partial Affections, which being so fast link'd to his old Companions, easily made way for their Reconciliation, or rather for fresh Engagements of his Favour: For as if their Sufferings had been immerited, or inflicted against his Will, he received them again with wonderful Expressions of Love. The Fine which had been impos'd upon the Earl of Suffolk, Michael de la Pool, he immediately released; and as if he had intended to make him Satisfaction for what he had suffer'd by redoubling his Honour, he caused him to be cloathed in Royal Robes, and to sit at Table with him, and that in publick upon Christmas Festivals, to the no small Grief and Trouble of the Nobility. The Duke of Ireland, and Archbishop of Tork, he admitted into greater Intimacy than ever, and they became again the three only Persons in the Nation, which the King shewed any particular Delight in. This dotting Humour of the King they were not sluggish to improve, as they thought for their own Advantage, which they imagin'd would be best promoted by a sharp Revenge upon the chief Instruments of it, whom they look'd upon as the only Obstacles of their ambitious Aims and design'd Happiness. They easily persuaded the King, That all they suffer'd was for his Sake; That their Crimes were forged to make him odious to the People; and that if he could not protect them, who did nothing but by his Command, and for his Interest, it would not be long but he would be too weak to defend himself; That the main Aim of those ambitious Nobles, their Enemies, was to dethrone him by disgracing his Ministers. For 'tis an easie and popular Inference, That the King is not fit to rule, who knows not whom to trust: He must be a bad Prince, that hath bad Officers. By these, and such like Arguments, the King was wrought to so great an Hatred of those they accounted their Enemies, that he readily concurr'd with them to put in Execution any Contrivance for their Deduction. The Duke of Glocester and Earl of Arundel were the most eminent, being the Earl of Suffolk's Judges; and therefore the first Plot was to take off the Duke, and then proceed to the rest, as they had Success in their first Attempt. This they contriv'd to do under the fair Pretence of Friendship, inviting the Duke to a Feast at Sir Nicholas Bramber's House in the City, where the Mayor, Sir Nicholas Exton, and Aldermen, had made a Treat for several Peers and great Men; and having resolv'd, that while the Duke was in his Mirth, and not suspecting any ill Design, he should be either poison'd or assassinated. This base Action was so much abhorr'd by the Mayor, Sir Nicholas Exton, that he privately gave the Duke notice of it, and desir'd him to take care of his present and future Safety, which he did by not going to the Feast: And so this their first wicked Purpose was defeated.

The Earls of Arundel and Nottingham, who were appointed Admirals of the Navy, which by Order of Parliament was to defend the Nation and annoy the French, did all the Winter following use their utmost diligence to furnish themselves with able Ships and stout Men, that the Noblemen who were to see them muster'd before they embarked, might give a good Account of them to the Governors; for they had spar'd no Cost nor Charges to gather up the bravest and strongest Men in the Nation for this special Service. In the Spring they were all ready to embark, and having receiv'd Information that the French, Flemish, and Spanish Fleet, laden with Wine, lay at Rockell waiting for a fair Wind, to sail to their several Ports for which they were bound, the Earls put to Sea with all speed to intercept them in their Pallage. On Lady-Eve they met them, and after a short Engagement took an hundred Sail of them richly fraught, with nineteen thousand Tun of Wine, besides other Commodities. The Citizens of Middleburgh offer'd the Earls to buy all their Wines at 5 l. a Tun, but they refusing so good a Market told them, That they would let none but the People of England whom they served, to have the Use and Advantage of them; and bringing them into divers Ports of the Nation, caused so great a Plenty, that Wines were sold generally for a Mark a Tun, and the best not above 20 s. Their own Shares they generously gave among their Friends, and having refitted their Ships, went out to Sea again. The Success of their first Atchievement Success always raises Men's Reputation with the Commons; but these Earls having added to their courageous and brave Actions a generous Contempt of their own Advantage, and a signal Zeal for the common Good and publick Safety, begot so high an opinion of their Worth in the Minds of all Men, that they became a Subject of publick Praise and Admiration. But this happend very unluckily for the Designs that were managing at Court against the Earl of Arundel, and those of his Party, that he whom they had decreed to Destruction should be thought most worthy of Life by all Men; and lest the King himself should conceive a more favourable Opinion of them for these Actions, they endeavour'd by all their Artifices to blast the Reputation of them, telling the King, 'That though the Vulgar cry'd up the late Action of the Earls of Arundel and Nottingham, in taking the Flemish Fleet, as a brave and glorious Achievement, yet to such as could see farther into things it was really far otherwise; for by thus robbing the Merchants all our foreign Trade would be spoil'd, and no Nation would care to trade with us, who liv'd so much upon the ruin of them. So that tho' a small Gain did redound to the Nation by their Piracy for the present, it would prove an inestimable Damage in the end. The King's Mind being thus byass'd by their Calumnies, look'd upon his Admirals great Service as demerit; and when they came to Court, gave them such a cold Reception, that they could easily see their Enemies had been with the King before them, and their good Actions were made their Crime; at which they took so great a disgust, that they resign'd their Office<sup>b</sup> and retired to their private Mansions, choosing rather to live in Obscurity, than to serve that King who would not thank them for their most faithful Labours, but counted their Merits little better than Faults.

The late disappointment which the King's Favourites had met with in acting against the Duke of Glocester's Life, did not so discourage them from farther attempts, but they were still hatching new designs against him, till they could find out some more effectual way; the Duke of Ireland, knowing him to be a Person very jealous of his Honour, and impatient of the least contempt to his Royal Blood, put away his Wife to anger and affront him, without any just cause for a Divorce, and marry'd a Bohemian, one of the Queen's Maids of Honour. The injur'd Lady, being so nearly related to the King himself, (for she was the Daughter of Isabel his Father's Sister<sup>c</sup>, and so Cousin-German to the King, and Neice to the Duke of Glocester) hoped to find some redress of her Wrong by appealing to the King, but petition'd him often in vain: Her Husband was too deep in the King's Favour for her to obtain any Justice against him. But the Duke of Glocester could not forbear to shew his Resentments of the Wrong done to his Family, and to the King himself (if he would have impartially consider'd it) and told him plainly, That he would revenge the Wrong done to his Kinswoman. This Threat from a Man of such Power and rough Disposition as the Duke of

Glocester was, put Spurs to the wicked Contrivances of the three Favourites and their Friends, as fearing, that if the Duke were not suddenly taken off, their own Lives were in manifest danger.

Easter now drawing nigh, at which time the Duke of Ireland was to go into that Kingdom, Ireland's great Preparations were made for his departure, as if he had been in earnest. And not long after that Feast, he began his Journey into Wales, in order to his passage thither; the King himself, with the Earl of Suffolk, Judge Tresilian, and some others, accompanying him in State, stay'd some time there with him, till they thought the Expectations of the Nation being satisfied, he might return again without much notice. In this Progress, or rather Retirement, for the safety of their mischievous Consultations, they set all their Wits on work by various methods to compass the destruction of their Enemies; and being come to Nottingham in their return, which is near the heart of the Nation, they began to make some Essays how their Devices would succeed. The first thing they had contrived, was to suppress them by force; and to effect this, they summon'd all the Sheriffs of the adjoining Counties to the King at Nottingham, and demanded of them what Forces they were able to raise to assist the King against the Lords, if they were required to do it? They answer'd, 'That the People were generally persuaded that the Lords were the King's Friends, and that they fought the good of the Nation in all they did, and therefore they believed that they should get very few to oppose them. This disappointment was the less, because they knew that the Lords were very popular, and they had still other Plots which they hoped would prove effectual, tho' this had miscarry'd. Wherefore they next mov'd it to the Sheriffs and Gentlemen, then attending on the King, whether they could not by their Interests and Power choose such Men for the next Parliament as the King should nominate to them, and approve as most faithful to him? They reply'd, 'That the People would be very hardly depriv'd of their ancient Privilege of choosing their Members of Parliament, and that if there were a true freedom observed in choosing, it would be almost impossible to impose any Persons against the People's liking, especially since they would easily guess at the design, and the more resolutely stand upon their Right. The Sheriffs answer a little startled them, because they confided much in this Invention; for what was done by a Parliament would, as they imagin'd, carry a face of Justice, and their private Revenge would be turn'd into publick Punishment; but losing their point, they dismissed the Sheriffs and Gentlemen, and fell upon their last, but most desperate Stratagem, to ruin them by Law. And to this end the King sent his Summons to all the Judges to attend him. Sir Robert Tresilian, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, was one of the Cabal, and being present with the King, had drawn up several Articles for their purpose, to have the Opinions of the rest of his Brethren upon. Sir Robert Belknap Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, with Sir John Holt, Sir Roger Fulthorp, and Sir William Burgh, Judges of the same Bench, and John Lockton the King's Serjeant, Robert Bramble, and the other Judges of the King's Bench, obey'd the Summons, and went to Nottingham according to appointment. Soon after their arrival, a solemn Council was called, Aug. 11. and the King, in the presence of many Nobles, demanded of them the Judgment of the Law upon these following Questions,

A. D. 1387. fions, which had relation most of them to the Actions of the last Parliament, and chiefly to their dealings with the Earl of Suffolk, and required them by their Faith and Allegiance which they ow'd him, to deliver the true Sense of the Law upon them, viz.

1. Whether the Statute and Commission made the last Parliament were prejudicial to the King's Prerogative? They all unanimously answered Yes, because it was obtain'd against his Will.

2. and 3. How these Persons ought to be punished, who were either eager to procure it, or mov'd the King to consent to it, and grant it? They said, With Death, unless the King would pardon them.

4. How they were to be punished, who forced the King to grant it? They said, As Traitors.

5. How they ought to be punished, that restrained the King so far from exercising his Prerogative, that he might not remit Penalties or Debts owing to him? They reply'd, As Traitors.

6. Whether, when the King hath order'd the Parliament to proceed upon certain Articles, the Lords and Commons may refuse, till the King shall grant what they please to demand of him? They answer'd, That to resist the King's Commands in such Cases was High-Treason.

7. Whether the King may not dissolve the Parliament when he pleases? They resolv'd he might.

8. Whether, since it was a Prerogative of the Crown to punish the Offences of, or remove all publick Officers or Judges, the Lords and Commons, without the King's permission or order, might impeach such Officers and Judges in Parliament? They determined, That they might not, and it was Treason in any or all the Members of Parliament to attempt it.

9. What Punishment they deserv'd, who mov'd or brought in the Statute, by which Edward II. was deposed to be a President for the above-mentioned Commission? They defined, As Traitors.

10. Whether the Judgment given against Michael de la Pool Earl of Suffolk were erroneous, and revocable? They said, That it was erroneous and revocable in every part, and that if it were again to be done they would not pass it.

These Resolutions being given, the King required them to subscribe them, and set their Seals to them, in the presence of the Lords and other great Persons there assembled. Tresilian and his Judges readily comply'd, but Belknap with his Brethren, well knowing the drift of what was done, was not willing to leave any such Marks of his Opinion behind him, and therefore refused to subscribe them, till the Duke of Ireland and Earl of Suffolk by severe Menaces forced him to sign them, contrary to his Conscience, as may be justly thought from his words which he then spake, 'That he wanted only an Hurdle, an Horse, and an Halter, to compleat the Reward of that Action, by which he had betray'd the Lords. The

The Lords condemned by a Jury of Londoners. Opinions of the Judges being thus known, a Jury of Londoners summon'd to Nottingham for that purpose were ready to indict the Duke of Gloucester, Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Darby, and Nottingham, of High-Treason for what they did in the last Parliament, and upon a full and formal hearing before the Judges they were condemned to Death, and their Lands being forfeited to the King, were disposed to and among his Favourites; and that the Sentence might be fully executed, the King sent into all parts of the Nation to gather an Army able to master all Opposition they could make against what had been done; which, tho' it met with cold Reception from many, yet great multitudes not knowing the Design in Hand, A. D. readily yielded their assistance, as their Duty to 1387. their King in their opinion oblig'd them.

While these things were transacting against the Lords at Nottingham, there happen'd a very great disturbance in the Church upon this occasion. One Monkish Hypocrite discover'd by one of their Brethren. Walter Disse, a Carmelite Fryar, and formerly Confessor to the Duke of Lancaster, having obtained of Pope Urban, in favour of his old Master, a liberty of conferring the Honour and Privileges of the Pope's Chaplains on such as would purchase them for their Money, Peter Pateshull an Austin-Fryar, and a Favourer of Wickliffe's Doctrine, being desirous of liberty and freedom from his Monkish Confinement, and the Society of those vile Persons he lived with, procur'd himself to be admitted the Pope's Chaplain, and immediately left his Monastery. He was a Person pious and learned, and spent his time much in Preaching after his Release. His abhorrence of the wicked Lives of the Monks, which he had with great Sorrow observ'd while he liv'd among them, made him very zealous in blaming their Hypocrisy and wicked Actions, so unbecoming their strict Profession of Religion. The People much applauded his Discourses, being generally disaffected to the Monks, and addicted to Wickliffe's Doctrine, which his Invectives favour'd of. The Monks, impatient of Reproof, shew'd great displeasure against him and his Sermons, and so frequently disturb'd his Preaching, that partly through the Contests between his Hearers and the Monks, who sometimes would come to Elows even in the Churches, and partly through fear of them, he was forced to give over publick Preaching, and by the advice of his Friends (of whom some were very considerable, viz. Sir William Nevill, Sir Richard Sturmy, and Sir John Montacute) betake himself to Writing; in which he accused the Monks of many horrid Crimes, as Murther, Sodomy, and Treason, of which he gave such convincing proofs, by naming the Persons, both Actors and Patients, that all People credited his Relations, and believed the Monasteries no better than what he term'd that from whence he came, The Devil's Dungeon. But these Books angered the Bishops, being look'd upon as the Disgrace of the Clergy, who thereupon were very zealous to suppress them; and to that end obtain'd of the King a Commission directed to all Sheriffs and Justices, commanding them to search for, and seize all Heretical Books, and suppress Lollardy in the whole Kingdom; which tho' it took no great effect, yet allay'd the present Heat and Contest between the Monks and their Enemies.

The Judgment which the King and his Favourites, through the compliance of the Judges, had passed upon the Lords, tho' absent, was no sooner given, but the Lords themselves had a full account of all the proceedings of it to their great amazement; and tho' the Duke of Gloucester was an hot and cholerick Man, yet the sense of his Duty to his Prince taught him a more submissive way of providing for his own defence than to run presently to Arms, which he knew would embroil the Nation, and hazard many Lives. Wherefore sending for the Bishop of London, Robert Braybrooke, he represented to him his own Case, and that of the Nobles with him, how unjustly they were condemned, and what danger they were in; and having taken a solemn Oath upon the Evangelists, that he was studious of the Safety and

A. D. 1387. Prosperity of the King's Person and Realm, and never had entertained so much as any undutiful Thought against him, much less had done any thing which might deserve so severe a Sentence as was pass'd upon him, unless the Revenge which he had threaten'd the Duke of Ireland with for doing so great an Injury to his Kinswoman, and did not yet recede from, might be interpreted for such; and desired him to wait on the King to mediate a Reconciliation between himself, and the Lords and King. The Bishop did not unwillingly undertake so good an Office, and being a Person both prudent, learned and eloquent, prov'd so good an Advocate, that the King seem'd satisfy'd with his Uncle; and because the Bishop had fully satisfy'd him, that a Quarrel between him and his Uncle would ruin them both, he desired a Reconciliation. But the Earl of Suffolk, who was by, knowing that if it were compleated 'twould prove fatal to him, interposed, and with a virulent Charge of Popularity and Rebellion laid upon the Lords, alter'd the King's good Inclinations to Peace, and the Bishop was commanded out of his Presence; tho' he with undaunted Courage maintain'd his first Arguments, and told the Earl, That he being a Person condemn'd by Parliament, had no other way to be safe, and revenge himself of his Adversaries, (as he accounted all the chief Members of it) but to set all things in a Combustion, and therefore was not to be allow'd to speak, who was a Party; yet he return'd, without success in his Negotiations, to the Lords. The Duke of Glocester and the condemn'd Peers in the mean time were not unmindful of their own safety, but had conferr'd together to secure themselves in case their submissive Address to the King for Peace should prove ineffectual, which they had reason to fear, so long as the Authors of those violent Courses were about his Person, and could so easily byass him against them. Wherefore when the Bishop return'd with the news of his ill success, they resolv'd immediately to raise what Force they could, and standing up in their own defence to expostulate with the King, why he fought their Death, and suffer'd himself to be govern'd by such Traitors. The King and his Friends easily foreseeing the effects of this fresh Provocation, thought to prevent any opposition from them by seizing them singly before they could get together, and for that purpose sends the Earl of Northumberland to apprehend the Earl of Arundel at his Castle of Rygate; but he found him so well guarded, that he was forced to dissemble the Reason of his coming, and let it pass for a Visit. This disappointment the King thought to amend by surprise, and therefore sent a strong force the same night to arrest him; but the Earl suspecting what after happen'd, had made his escape to the Duke of Glocester at Haringey-Park, near Highbate, and there they joyn'd their Forces<sup>a</sup> with the Earls of Warwick, Nottingham, and Darby<sup>b</sup>. The news of the Lords being united much disturb'd the King and his Friends, who could now expect no easie terms from those whom their own ill dealings had made desperate, and who were too powerful to be readily master'd. Wherefore a great Council was call'd to debate and consult what was best to be done in so difficult a Juncture. Alexander Nevill Archbishop of Tork would have had the King to send his Commissioners to the City of London, and into all parts of the Nation, to raise a Royal Army, and repress those his Rebellious Subjects by main force; but this being found upon tryal a thing not feasible, (for tho' the City could raise an Army of fifty thousand Men soon, yet very few of them would fight against the Lords) the Duke of Ireland, and Earl of Suffolk, and two or three more, who persuaded the King that the Lords intended to bring him under their Government, and make themselves absolute, advised him to make the King of France his Friend, by resigning Callis and all his other Dominions beyond Sea to him. These three Favourites counsell'd thus, because nothing but Arms could secure them from the Lords Fury. Whereas those whose Guilt and Fears were less, offer'd quite different Proposals. Ralph Lord Basset told the King plainly, That he was his true Subject, and so would ever continue, and if the Quarrel had been his own, he would venture all he had in the defence of his Right, but would not have his Head broke in the Duke of Ireland's Cause. The Earl of Northumberland assured the King, That the Lords, tho' now in Arms, were his true and faithful Subjects, and would not attempt any thing against his Crown and Dignity; but all they aim'd at was to ease themselves and the Nation of those ill Persons about him, who sought to oppress and destroy them, and many of his good Subjects; and therefore humbly begg'd of the King, that he would send to them, and require the Reasons of their assembling with so many People, and he doubted not but they would give him just Satisfaction. The greatest part of the Council approv'd of this Proposition, and the King himself assented to it. Whereupon the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of Ely were sent immediately to the Lords, who were advanced near London, to inform them, That the King had no mind to commence a War with his Subjects, but was willing to know the Cause of their Discontents, that he might relieve them; for which end he desired the Lords to meet him in Westminster-Hall on Sunday next, and exhibit their Complaints to him. The Lords were not unwilling to meet the King, but were jealous of the treacherous designs of such as were about him, and told the Bishops, That they would certainly attend his pleasure upon promise of Protection. The Bishop of Ely, being very zealous to make up the Breach between the King and his Nobles, engag'd himself upon Oath, that if there were any dangerous Designs laid against them, he would give them timely notice of it; and so got their promise to meet the King that day. The time of Meeting approaching, and the Lords being ready to attend the King, a Message came the night before from the Bishop of Ely to them, giving them Information, That an Ambush of a thousand Men, commanded by Sir Thomas Trivet and Sir Nicholas Bramber<sup>c</sup>, was laid in the Mews to surprize them; and advising them either to delay their coming, or if they adventur'd to come, to guard themselves with a sufficient Force for Security. But the Lords thought the first least hazardous, and so appear'd not. The King, as had been agreed upon, came to Westminster, expecting to have met the Lords; but seeing himself disappointed, demanded with some warmth of the Bishop of Ely why the Lords did not appear according to their promise sent by him? The Bishop as boldly and plainly reply'd, That the Lords had certain Information of a Plot against their Lives laid in the Mews, which being so contrary to the Faith of a Prince, they thought it in vain to treat with him. The King startled at this reply, as if he had no ways been privy to it, swore that he knew nothing of it; and immediately gave the Sheriffs of London order

D. 1387. to search the place mention'd, and if they found any such thing, to kill or take them; but before it could be done, the chief Actors in it had notice of the Discovery, and had dispers'd themselves. This Action of the King's, confirm'd by his Oath, seem'd such a Proof to the Lords, that that base Contrivance was carry'd on purely by their Enemies without the King's Approbation, tho' not without a full Confidence of his Pardon, if it had been effected; that upon his fresh Promise of their Security, they soon after attended upon him at Westminster, yet with such strong Guards, as shew'd that they came not to submit or petition, but to demand or capitulate. On the day of their meeting the King being set on his Throne in his Robes, and the Nobles present and kneeling before him, the Chancellor, who was the Bishop of Ely, deliver'd the King's Mind to them in a short Speech, telling them, 'That the King hearing of their riotous assembling in Haringey-Park, tho' he was advis'd to have repress'd them by force, which he could easily have done; yet out of his Princely Clemency, had chosen to put gentler Methods first in Execution, to avoid the Effusion of his Subjects' Blood if possible; and therefore had sent for them to discourse with them, and know the Reasons and Causes of their Discontents, and why they in so tumultuous a manner had drawn together such a number of People. The Lords made answer, 'That it was not out of any ambitious or turbulent Humour, that they had taken Arms; for they neither affected his Crown, nor envy'd his Peace, but through an unavoidable Necessity of preserving his Person and Realm, and securing their own Lives from the impending Dangers, which were falling upon them by such Persons as were Enemies to both, and shrowded their ill Actions under his Favour; That the Duke of Ireland, Earl of Suffolk, Archbishop of Tork, Sir Robert Tresilian, Sir Nicholas Bramber, and some others, were those Traytors to the King and Realm, which they were afraid of, and sought to remove; because so long as they were in Place and Favour, the Nation must be miserable, nor could any Man be safe; and that they had not brought any false Accusation against them, they declared themselves ready (if his Majesty would yield to it) to justify what they had alledg'd by single Combat (and then threw down their Gloves as the Challengers). The King having heard them with much Calmness, gave them this moderate and rational Reply; 'That supposing it were true which they had alledg'd, yet they had taken a very improper Method to rectify their Grievances, which ought to be done by Rules of Justice, not Acts of Rebellion; That their present Tumults were of very ill Consequence, and would encourage the Multitude to make use of the like Methods, which would be difficult to repress; That he would speedily call a Parliament, wherein the Persons accused should appear and all Matters of Difference should be adjust'd, and all true Causes of Trouble or Fears to themselves or the Nation be remov'd; and in the mean time, would pardon all that was past, and take them into his Protection. The King having thus finish'd his Speech, took the Duke of Glocester by the hand, rais'd him from his Knees, and bid the rest arise; and retreating with them into a private Chamber, gave them a Treat, and licens'd them to depart. The Lords were greatly satisfisd with this Behaviour to them, and after the King had put forth his Proclamation of Pardon, looked upon all things in a certain way of Settlement at the next Parliament.

The Duke of Ireland, and the rest of the Persons accused, were not present at this Meeting of the King and Lords; and therefore tho' the Lords were in good hopes of a fair Conclusion, yet they thought it not safe, lest there should lurk some secret Contrivance against them, to dismiss their Army. Which Resolution taken up merely from Suspicion, or upon Information, proved very fortunate to them; for while Affairs looked so well at London, the Duke of Ireland had a private Commission from the King to gather an Army of such as were his Friends about Chester, and to come to London; in which they hoped to find so many Assistants, as to make up their Forces collected from the Western Parts to become invincible, and so able without great Difficulty to subdue the Lords. This tho' acted with great Privacy, and at a mighty Distance, was not hidden from the Lords and their Friends; who therefore contrived to intercept the Duke in his Passage, by sending the Earl of Darby with a strong Party to lie in those Countries through which he was to pass. The Duke of Ireland having by the Interest and Assistance of Sir Thomas Molineux, Constable of the Castle of Chester, Sir Ralph Vernon, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, the Sheriff of Chester, and others, gather'd a good Body of six thousand Men out of Cheeshire and Lancashire, stout and well armed, marched according to the King's Order towards London; but at Radcott Bridge near Burford in Oxfordshire, they were met by the Earl of Darby and his Men, who to prevent their Progress and force them to fight, had broken down the Bridge. The Duke was surprized at their approach, and being fearful of his own Fate, perswaded the Gentlemen to retreat; but Sir Thomas Molineux being a Man of great Courage said, 'That it was but a Party of the Lords Army, and that commanded by the Earl of Darby, a Man famous neither for Courage nor Conduct; and if they should give ground to these, they could not hope to effect any thing against the whole Power of the Lords, and therefore encourag'd them to prepare for a Fight. The Cheeshire Gentlemen were easily won, and the Duke himself yielded, tho' his Guilt and Fears would not suffer him to consent, and so a Fight was begun the next day. The Earl of Darby was very sharp, and lasted long; Sir Thomas Molineux was slain, and most of his Army either kill'd or taken. The Duke saw the beginning of the Engagement, but fled long before the Victory shew'd it self, swimming over the River Thames to make his escape; but was forc'd to quit his Horse, because he could not make the farther Bank, and get away on foot. His Horse and Baggage, with his Armour, were all taken, and brought to the Earl of Darby. In his Trunks was found a Letter sent to him by the King himself, wherein he commands him to hasten to London with what speed he could, and promises him to live and die with him. The Duke of Ireland was suppos'd to have been drown'd, because his Horse was found in the River; but afterward he was discover'd to have fled into Holland, and from thence into France. The News of this lucky Victory, tho' over but a small Party, was not better receiv'd by the Lords than it deserv'd; for it proved in a manner the utter Overthrow of their Enemies. For the Duke of Ireland never return'd, the Earl of Suffolk fled to Calis to his Brother, who was Captain of that Fortrefs; the King betook himself to the Tower, and Tresilian and the Archbishop of Tork, with all the rest of the Party, withdrew from London, and concealed themselves. The Enemies of the Confederate Lords all disappear'd, and no Opposition was

A. D. 1388. was visible: Whereupon the Lords being again united, marched with their Army of forty thousand Men to London, and mustered at Clackenwell within the Prospect of the Tower. The Archbishop, and some others of the Peers, who were desirous to end this Quarrel, pray'd the King to condescend to a peaceable Composition of Affairs, but he made slight of the Proposal, and told them, 'That they would soon dissolve of themselves without any Treaty, their Multitude would in a short time consume all their Provision, and then they must break in pieces of course. The Lords had notice of these words, and being incens'd a little at them, swore, That they would not depart from London (which by this time had open'd her Gates to them) till they had spoken with him; and having given him notice of it, set a strong Guard about the Tower, that he might not elude them by a private escape. The King being thus beset, and having no way to avoid a Treaty condescended, and sent the Archbishop to acquaint them with it. The Lords accepted the News joyfully, but fearing some Treachery might be laid for them in the Tower; if they should attend him there, as he had appointed, they begg'd that the King would meet them at Westminster, but at length receded from that Desire, because the King dealt so candidly with them, that he sent them the Keys of the Gates, Turrets, and strong Chambers, and gave them leave with two hundred Men to search all Places, and clear up their Suspicions. The Duke of Gloucester and Earls of Warwick, Arundel, Darby, and Nottingham, were the chief who managed this Treaty with the King, who receiv'd them in a Pavilion of State, and after retir'd with them into his Chamber. Here they charg'd him with many dishonourable and unjust Actions against themselves, and the Nation, viz. 'That he had forg'd Crimes and an unjust Sentence, conspired with his Favourites at Nottingham, to take away their Lives; which tho' they had at their meeting at Westminster been sparing to upbraid him with, out of respect to his Honour, because they saw an amicable Agreement likely to go forward, yet now they could not but lay before him, because they had since found Letters from him to the Duke of Ireland, to raise Forces in Cheshire against them, even at the time of their former Treaty; by which Action he added Perfidiousness to Cruelty, and plainly shew'd that his Favour and Grace then pretended, was but a Vail to his ill Designs against them. That he had made an Agreement with the French King (as by some Letters which they had intercepted, and then shewed, they made it appear) to resign Calis, and his other Dominions on that side to him, upon condition he might enjoy them, as an Homager to his Crown, and that Letters of safe Conduct were sent to him to compleat this Agreement, which was indeed to betray the English Possessions, purchased with so Blood, into their Enemies hands. Many other lesser Grievances they also mention'd, which they were plentifully furnish'd with from the ill Conduct of the Ministers of State, employ'd by him. The King had little to say in his own Defence, because their Accusation was so plainly proved; but falling into an ingenuous Confession of his Errors and Misgovernment, with Tears, agreed to meet them the next day at Westminster, to rectifie whatever was amiss by their Advice and Consent. The Lords upon this Promise departed, all but the Earl of Darby, whom the King invited to Supper with him, and detained, A. D. 1388. as an Instance of his Resolution to joyn with them in settling all Disorders of the Nation, which he expressed much Satisfaction in, so long as the Earl was present. But when the Earl was departed, the King fell into Consultation with such as were about him; who tho' not so obnoxious as those that were fled, yet being either their Friends, or acting by their Measures, soon turn'd his Mind from his former purpose; and because they had buzz'd it into his Head, that that Meeting tended much to the Hazard of his Person, and would end with a great Diminution of his Authority, he fully resolv'd against it. The Lords, according to Appointment met the next day at Westminster, and expected the King, but in vain, for he would not leave the Tower; which when they understood, they grew impatient at his Inconstancy, and sent him word plainly, 'That if he would not meet them according to his Promise, they would certainly chuse another King, who should have more regard to the faithful Advices and Services of his Lords than he had. This Message being smart and unexpected, wrought the King into Compliance; so that he met them on the Morrow in Westminster-Hall. The main thing that the Lords insisted upon, and the King tho' not very freely agreed to, was, That several traitorous and wicked Persons, should for the Honour of the King's Person and the Good of the Nation, be removed from Court; and accordingly Alexander Archbishop of York, John Bishop of Durham, and Fryar Rustock, the King's Confessor, John Bishop of Chichester (the two first of which were fled) were strictly forbidden to come into the King's Palace or Presence. The Lords Zouch, Burnell and Beaumont also, Sir Alberic de Vere, Sir Baldwin Bedeford, Sir Richard Adderbury, Sir John Worth, Sir Thomas Clifford, and Sir John Lovell, suffer'd the like Banishment from Court, but with a farther Imposition, That they should give Sureties for their Appearance at the next Parliament, which was to meet shortly. Some Ladies also of no very good Reputation were expelled the Court, and forced to give Sureties for their Appearance the next Parliament, viz. the Ladies Mobun, Molings, Poynings, and Worth. Others whose Crimes were greater, or at least more open and prejudicial to the Nation, were imprison'd, viz. Sir Simon Barly, Sir William Ellingham, Sir John Salesbury, Sir Thomas Trevir, Sir James Barnish, Sir Nicholas Dagworth, and Sir Nicholas Bramber, Knights; Richard Clifford, John Lincoln, and John Morford, Clerks; Sir John Beauchamp, Keeper of the King's Privy-purse, Nicholas Lake, Dean of the Chapel, and John Blake, Barrister of Law, to be tried the next Parliament.

The time drawing very near, when the Parliament was to meet by the unanimous Agreement of the King and Lords, the King, who knew very well that it would prove fatal to his Friends, sought all means to prorogue it; but not daring to stand upon his Prerogative at this time, lest they should raise as great a Mischief to himself, permitted them to meet on Feb. 3. The Lords came to it with such Attendance, as seem'd necessary for their Safety. The Commons resorted to it with great Diligence, because of the general Expectation there was of a compleat Reformation of all Disorders by this Session; which it so well effected, that it was thought to deserve the Name of The Wonder-working Parliament. After the usual Forms of opening the Parliament,

A. D. 1388. they entred upon Action, and on the first day of their meeting arrested all the Judges that were sitting in Westminster-Hall upon the Bench, except Trefilian, who concealed himself in disguise, and Sir William Shipworth<sup>a</sup>, and sent them to the Tower, viz. Sir Robert Belknap, Sir Roger Fulthorp, Sir John Cary, Sir John Holt, Sir William Brooke, and John Lockton the King's Serjeant at Law. Their Crime was, 'That in the last Parliament they had over-ruled the Actions and Determinations of the Lords with their Advice and Directions, and had assured them that all was done according to Law, but afterwards had given the King a contrary Judgment at Nottingham, and had deliver'd it as their Opinion, that the Actions of the said Parliament was illegal and traitorous. The Judges had nothing to plead in excuse of this base Action but their Fears of the Duke of Ireland, who threaten'd their ruin, unless they made such Answers to the Questions as he expected and desired, and therefore left themselves to the Judgment of the Parliament, who considering that the whole matter was managed by Trefilian, and that the rest of the Judges were surprized, and forced to give their Sentence, laid the milder Punishment upon them<sup>b</sup>, and only confiscated their Goods, and banished them for their Lives, having resolved to deal the more severely with the Author of that illegal Judgment when they could apprehend him. The next thing that they entred upon was to proceed against Robert Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Nevill Archbishop of York, Michael de la Pool Earl of Suffolk, Sir Robert Trefilian Lord Chief Justice of England, and Nicholas Bramber Lord Mayor of London, who being fled from Justice were summon'd only, and not appearing were sentenced to perpetual Banishment, and their Estates confiscated. Not long after Sir Robert Trefilian was discover'd by one of his own Servants, and seized upon in disguise at an Apothecary's in Westminster, where he lay to observe the Transactions of Parliament. He was carry'd first to the Duke of Gloucester, who secured him in the Tower, and in the Afternoon he was brought before the Parliament, by whom he was sentenced to be drawn to Tyburn, and to have his Throat cut<sup>c</sup>, which Judgment was immediately executed upon him. For what Reasons that Punishment, never used before or since, was inflicted upon him, is hard to know, unless the greatness of his Crimes was signalized by so remarkable a Punishment. The Parliament having thus dealt with the greater Offenders, descended to the lesser, and having taken Sir Nicholas Bramber, a Person who to serve the Court-designs against the Lords had been several times made Lord Mayor of London, and in that Office by his illegal Cruelties had ruin'd and murder'd many of the Lord's Friends, for which Services he was to be made Duke of Troy, the ancient Name, as some have written, of that City, they condemn'd him for those and others his wicked Actions to be beheaded with that very Ax<sup>e</sup> (as some write) which he had made to inflict the same punishment on others. Sir John Salisbury, Sir James Barnish, John Beauchamp, John

Blake, and Thomas Uffe, were all drawn and hang'd for the same Crimes. Sir Simon Burley, Lord Chamberlain, and Constable of Dover-Castle, being accused of conspiring to deliver up that Castle to the French, was also beheaded; tho' the Earl of Darby interceded much to save his Life, because it was not prov'd against him; but the Duke of Gloucester, whose severe disposition made every one a Criminal that he did not love, would hearken neither to Reason nor Importunity, and so this poor Gentleman fell a Sacrifice to the Duke's Anger and Moroseness. With these Men the Parliament hoped that the Disorders of the Nation would be removed, the chief Causes of them taken away, and their Sufferings terrifie all that were like-affected; and therefore, as if all things were to begin a-new, the King and Parliament agreed to ratifie their Resolutions of doing their Duty to each other by Oath. The King promised to stand by the Lords in governing the Realm, and took his Coronation-Oath again, and the Houses swore Homage and Fealty to the King, as if both had vy'd together whether should be the better, the King or his Subjects. This Pacification was so well resented by the Parliament, that they granted the King half a tenth of the Clergy, and half a fifteenth of the Laity, 12 d. in the Pound for all Merchandises, except Wines, upon which they laid 2 s. a Tun, and 5 s. for every Sack of Wool, and then was dissolv'd; but the King was discontented, and angry at what he had done in it. Just at the rising of this Parliament, the Lord John Holland was created Earl of Huntington.

The Earl of Arundel being made Admiral again Reg. 12. by the Parliament, put forth to Sea with a great Navy, well stored with Land-Forces and several Noblemen to assist the Duke of Britain, who being under the King of France's displeasure, because he had imprison'd the Lord Gueselin Constable of France, fear'd an Invasion from thence. The English Fleet arriv'd at Rochel, and landing some Men, began to spoil the Country about Marrant; but a Peace being suddenly concluded between the Duke and the French King, the Earl return'd, and in his way meeting the French Fleet, took eighty of them, and invaded the Isle of Beas, and burnt it. He also took the Isle of Oleron.

The Truce between the Scots and English being expired about this time, the Scots looking upon the Dissentions of England to be an advantageous Juncture for them to invade it, made great Preparations for that end, and entred the bordering Countries, burning, killing, and plundering all places they came in. Gilleland in Cumberland, which belong'd to the Lord Dacres, felt their Fury first, whose Inhabitants they shut up in their Houses by two hundred in a Company, and set them on Fire. They then invaded the North with the like Barbarity, and came as far as Newcastle, where they met with the Earl of Northumberland, and his Sons, Henry Lord Peirce, surnam'd Hotspur, and Ralph, with a small Force to oppose them, as Guardians of those parts, and sworn Enemies of the Scots. The young Noblemen desirous to gain Honour, were eager to engage them; and

<sup>b</sup> They were all of them that were in Custody condemn'd by the Lords Temporal, with the assent of the King, to be drawn and hang'd as Traitors, their Heirs disinherited, and their Lands and Tenements, Goods and Chattels to be forfeited to the King; which Sentence pass upon Sir Robert Belknap, Sir Roger Fulthorp, Sir John Holt, Sir William Burgh, Sir John Cary, Judges; John Lockton the King's Serjeant, and Thomas Uff Under-Sheriff of Middlesex, who pack'd the Jury that found the Bill against the Lords. The Bishops, just as Sentence had pass, came in and interceded for their Lives, which the King granted them; but their Estates were seiz'd, and their Persons imprison'd. Rot. Parl. 11 Richard 2.

<sup>d</sup> His Throat was not cut; the Sentence given by the Lords against him was, That he should be drawn on a Hurdle through the City of London to Tyburn, and there be hang'd by the Neck. Walsingham and Caston, and after them Holinghead affirm he was hang'd. Rot. Parl. 11 Richard 2.

<sup>e</sup> It appears by the same Rolls, Par. 3. N<sup>o</sup> 15. that Sir Nicholas Bramber was condemn'd and executed in the same manner as Trefilian.

A. D. 1388. Earl Dowglas, who commanded that party of the Scots, and envy'd Hotspur's Fame, was as forward to joyn the Battel. They came to a fight at Otterborn, and Earl Dowglas encounter'd the Lord Peirce singly, seeking by force to extort his Name from him; but being equall'd in Courage, and overmatch'd with Strength, he was slain, and became a Monument of his Enemy's Valour. This Victory was hardly obtain'd before the Earl of Dunbar came upon the Englisb with a much greater Force, and having slain the greatest part of them, took the Lord Peirce and his Brother Prisoners.

The Parliament was again summon'd to meet in September, and accordingly assembled at Cambridge (as our Historians unanimously agree, but our Statute-Book say at Canterbury) on the morrow after the Nativity of the Virgin Mary, Sept. 9. This Parliament seems to have met to settle several Disorders and Irregularities of the Nation, not sufficiently provided for by Law before; and to that end enacted, 'That no Offices under the King, or Ministers of Justice, as Judges, Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs, or any other Officers in any of the King's Courts, should be ordain'd or made, for any Gift or Brocade, Favour or Affection, but for their known Abilities and Deserts only; it being but reasonable to suppose, as it is usually found, that they who buy such Places make no Conscience of doing Justice, but by Exactions, Delays, and unreasonable Fees, make the Administration of Judgment a Grievance, instead of a Relief to Subjects. That Servants shall not pass from one Hundred to another without a Testimonial under the King's Seal; and if any Servant be taken up without such Testimonial, he shall be put in the Stocks. This Law was made to keep Servants to their good Behaviour, and secure Masters from retaining idle and false Persons in their Services; and because Servants grew too exacting for their Wages, therefore a Law was made, 'That no Person should give or receive more Wages for the Service of Men or Women, than what was limited by the Statute under several Penalties. It was also enacted, 'That all sturdy Beggars, who were able to serve, should be punished, and the ancient Statute of Labourers should be put in execution; so that the want of Men to work in Husbandry might be no plea to enhance their Wages. A Statute also was framed to forbid Servants to wear a Sword, Buckler, or Dagger; Another to prohibit all Persons using any unlawful Games; Another to punish any scandalous Abuses of the Peers and great Men of the Kingdom; Another to prohibit the making of Dung-hills, and casting of Carrion into Ditches near great Towns to infect the Air, by which Diseases were created among the Inhabitants; Another to make it a Praemunire for any Person to go to Rome to procure any Benefice of the Pope; and lastly, A Statute was made to remove the Staple of Wool from Middleburgh to Calis. The King had a tenth of the Clergy, and a fifteenth of the Laity granted him by this Parliament. During this Session, Sir Thomas Trivet, a Favourite of the King's, riding to Barnwell with the King to his Lodgings, was thrown by his Horse, and dy'd of the Bruise receiv'd by the Fall. His Death was not much lamented by the People, because he was accounted an Enemy to the Lords, and the common Good.

Soon after the rising of this Parliament a Treaty of Peace was set on foot between England, France, A. D. and Scotland. The Commissioners for England 1389. were Walter Shirlow Bishop of Durham, the Earl of Salisbury, Lord Beauchamp, Sir John Clanbow, and Sir Nicholas Dagworth; for France, the Bishop of Baieux, the Lord Valeran Earl of St. Paul, Sir Guillam Melin, Sir Nich. Bracque, and Sir John Mercier; and for the Scots, the Bishop of Aberdeen, Sir James and Sir David Lyndsey, and Sir Walter Sancler, four for each Nation. They met at Balingham, a small Town between Calis and Bul-loigne, and after many Debates with much difficulty, came at length to agree upon a Truce between the three Nations for three Years, to commence from Midsummer next ensuing. While it was in agitation the Scots had made several Incurious into Northumberland, and carry'd away great Booties, which Thomas Mowbrey Earl of Nottingham was not able to prevent, tho' he was sent against them with five hundred Archers, because his Force was too weak to withstand their much greater numbers. The Scots were so well pleased with their Robberies, that they gave the news of Peace no kind welcome, and were hardly persuaded to accept it by the Lord Valeran, and some others of the French, who came over to see it establish'd and confirm'd in these Nations; and so at length the Truce began on August 1. on the Borders, and on Aug. 15. in other parts of both Nations, and all Hostilities ceased on both sides.

In Lent this Year was a memorable Contest between the Oxford-Scholars. The Welsh, who were always quarrelsome and proud, having firmly united the Scholars of the Southern parts to their side, began to abuse the Scholars of the North, who being very numerous, stood up together in their own defence; and so by the opposition much mischief was done on both sides. At length they came to an agreement, to determine all by a pitch Fight; but the Duke of Glocester hearing of it, and being much concern'd not only at the ill Example, but bad Consequences of it, found means to prevent it, and caused several of the Welsh, who were the Authors of this unhandsome Broil, to be expell'd the University, and others to be punish'd with the usual Academick Mulcts, and so put the whole Body into good order again.

Peace being thus every ways established at home and abroad, the King and his Friends, on whose Counsels he chiefly confided, thought this the best opportunity to assume to himself the Government of the Nation out of the Lords hands, in which it had been put for some Years. He was now full one and twenty Years of Age, and was undeniably capacitated to be master of his own Dominions; which because the Lords, either not sensible of his being of Age, or not willing to take notice of it, did not resign, he resolv'd to claim; and to that end calling a great Council of his Nobles and great Men to attend him at Westminster. As soon as they were all seated, and the King himself at the head of them, he demanded of them, 'What Age they supposed him to be of now? They answer'd, 'That they thought him to be something above one and twenty. The King then reply'd, 'That it was unreasonable that he should be deny'd what his meanest Subjects enjoy'd, who at that Age came into the management and full possession of their Birthrights, and were no longer under Guardians and Tutors; and therefore he challeng'd the Government of his Kingdoms out of their hands. The Lords, tho' fearing the ill Consequence of his Rule,

* This Truce was but for one Year. T. Walsingham.

* Henry de Knighton and Thomas Walsingham say, He came to the Council-Chamber, the Privy Council being then sitting; and do not mention the summoning any Assembly of the Nobility who were not Privy Counsellors.

A. D. 1289. yet did not deny what he required, but readily yielded up their Power entirely to him; in which Act the King was not so well contented, but that he declared publickly, 'That he renounced their Rule, and from thenceforth did assume to himself as full a Power of governing, disposing Affairs, and administering Justice in his Realm, as any of his Predecessors, the Kings of England, did and might lawfully use and exercise.

Reg. 12. And that he might give an Instance of his Power and try their Submission, he like a new King made an Alteration among the great Officers of State; for he took the great Seal from Thomas Arundel Bishop of Ely, then Lord Chancellor, and gave it to William of Wickham, then Bishop of Winchester, who very unwillingly accepted of it; John Fordham also Bishop of Exeter, then Treasurer, he remov'd from that Office and put in another, which also he did to Edmund Stafford, Keeper of the Privy-Seal; the Earl of Arundel, Lord Admiral, he also deprived of his Command and gave it to the Earl of Huntington; the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and Duke of Glocester, he put out of his Privy Council, and made five new Judges in the room of those that were hang'd and imprison'd. Many other Alterations he made in the Court, which was look'd upon as a new Model of a worse Management than had been before settled, and for some time so well carried on by the Lords.

The State being thus at Peace for the present, Matters of Religion began to be look'd into, which in the late Troubles had been neglected. The Followers of Wickliff were not insensible how happy a Juncture it was for them to promote their Doctrines, while their Enemies Heads were otherwise employ'd, and accordingly had so bestir'd themselves, that they were become a form'd Church, and in many Parts of the Nation had regular Congregations, with Pastors well qualified and chosen to administer Sacraments, and preach to the People. The Bishop of Salisbury, John Waltham, had gotten a very particular Account of all their Party, and their present Condition, by one that had been of their Society; and tho' he acquainted his Brethren with the great Increase of them, yet neither himself, nor any of the Bishops rais'd any Persecution against them. The Bishop of Norwich, Henry Spencer, threaten'd them loudly, That if any were found in his Diocese, he would make them, as he term'd it, Hop beadlefs, or fry a Faggot; and 'tis very probable, that he being a rough and Warlike Prelate, would have made good his Words, but they had Wit enough to keep out of his way. One John Swinderby, a Priest, was punish'd as an Heretick in the Diocese of Hereford; but because we read of no other that suffer'd, it may be suppos'd, that some Imprudence in himself brought him into Troubles. The chief Popish Doctrine that they oppos'd was, their Pilgrimages to Images, especially the Rood and Lady of Walsingham; which being so profitable a Custom to the Priests, would have brought a Storm upon them, as soon as an Opposition to any other Doctrine; but it was carried so privately, that tho' many were averse to it, yet few would expose themselves for it.

The Duke of Glocester being thought under some Displeasure with the King, because he was not of his Council, it gave Encouragement to some Court Parasites to seek his Ruine, and forge a Crime against him to endanger his Life, viz. That he was about to raise an Army, and depose the King. The Duke was thereupon called into Examination privately, and charged with the Accusation; but he cleared himself so well, that it was judg'd a Forgery both by the King himself and his Council. The Duke having escap'd the Danger, begg'd of the King, that the Authors of such false Crimes should be punish'd; but the King, either desirous to incense the Duke, or out of a Love to Flattery, enjoyn'd his Uncle neither to expostulate the Matter, nor question his Accusers.

In November, this Year, the Duke of Lancaster returned out of Spain into England. He had for almost three Years undergone a various Fortune, and tho' he had pass'd through many Troubles, at last made an honourable Conclusion, and came home with Joy and Triumph: He had met with as good Success at his first Entrance into Spain, as he could have desir'd. Many Spaniards came over to assist him in recovering his Wife's Right against the Usurper, and his Arms were every where victorious. The Spanish Army under Don Alvarez de Perez was totally routed, and the Spaniards terrified with the Loss, kept themselves close in their walled Towns, which were also many of them taken by the English and Portuguese. The French indeed promised them Assistance to drive out the English, after the intended Expedition into England was over; but a more kind Fate so befriended them, that the English were conquer'd without Weapons: For the Heat and Unkindness of the Climate so afflicted with mortal Diseases his whole Army, that he lost many of his best Men, as the Lord Fitzwater, and others, and the rest were made unfit for any Warlike Action. The Spaniards also, who had sided with the Duke, being angry with the English for making such havock of their Country without Cause, deserted him and went home; by which means the Duke and his Friends were left so naked and open to the Enemy, that in great Sorrow and Anguish of Mind he lamented his Misfortune, and begg'd of God, who judges of every Man's Right, to interpose on his behalf, and make an honourable Conclusion of that Expedition for him; which Prayer the Event so well answer'd, that God may well be judg'd to have heard him in his Trouble. He indeed endeavour'd to retrieve his Loss, by sending into England for a Recruit of his Forces; but the Troubles there would not allow the King to spare him any, which farther encreased his Grief. The Duke then having obtain'd leave of the King of Spain, that his sick Soldiers should remain in his Country till they were recover'd, departed in Sorrow to Baion, a City in Gascoigne, and there remained in much Melancholy for his ill Luck. Here Providence made way for that happy Conclusion, which the Duke had desired: For the Duke of Berry, the French King's Uncle, making a Proposition of a Marriage with Katharine the Duke's Daughter, and Heiress to the Crown of Spain after her Mother's Death, so roused the Thoughts of the King of Castile and Leon, lest that Match should by the Union of two such potent Interests in France and England, bring greater danger to his Throne than her Mother's had; that he by the Advice of his Council, became an earnest Suiter to the Duke of Lancaster for a Match between his Daughter and his eldest Son Henry. Some Propositions tending to a Conclusion with the Duke of Berry had been made,

* John Fordham was Bishop of Durham, Favourite to King Richard and Lord Treasurer, was remov'd in a turn of State three Years before; into his Place the King put the Bishop of Hereford, a Friend to the Lords, and now he turn'd him out of his Office, to give it to one of his own.

D. 1389. but the King of Spain's Offers being more agreeable to the Wilhes, and making more for the Honour of both the Lady and her Parents were greedily embraced, and the Marriage soon concluded upon these following Conditions advantageous to all sides, 1. That Henry Prince of Spain should marry the Lady Katharine eldest Daughter of John Duke of Lancaster, and Constantia his Wife, and that they should be call'd after Marriage Prince and Princess of Austria, so long as the present King lived. 2. That the Kingdom of Spain, after the present King's Death, should descend to the said Prince and Princess, and the Heirs of their Bodies; and for want of such Heirs to Edmund Duke of York, who had marry'd King Peter's other Daughter, and his Heirs. 3. That the King of Spain should pay the Duke of Lancaster 200000*l.* towards the Charges of the Expedition, and 10000*l.* a Year during his and his Dutcheff's Life at Baion. The Conclusion anger'd the French King, and produc'd some Threats of a War for the Wrong done the Duke of Berry. But the King of Spain valu'd not his Menaces so long as he was sure of the Assistance of the English, and the Duke of Lancaster return'd with Joy into England. Just at his landing the King had summon'd a great Council of his Peers to meet at Reading, whereupon the Duke immediately hasten'd thither; not only to meet the King and pay his Duty to him, but to reconcile the Difference which he had heard began to arise between the King and his Nobles. This Act of Piety he happily effected, and made them all Friends. The King kept his Christmas at Woodstock, and the Duke of Lancaster at Hartford Castle, and the Nobles in their Countries.

The young Earl of Pembroke killed at Justs.

While the Christmas Carnivals continu'd at Court, John Hastings Earl of Pembroke, an hopeful young Nobleman, learning to just (which was an Exercise much us'd in those times) with one Sir John St. John, receiv'd an unlucky Blow on the bottom of his Belly, and died of the Bruise. He was much lamented, because he was a generous and affable Person; but it seems it was a Fate entail'd upon his Family, to meet with an untimely Death: For it was observ'd, that from the time of Aumer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, who was one of the Peers that condemn'd Thomas Earl of Lancaster at Pomfret, about eighty Years before, none ever lived to see his Son, tho' the Descent in the whole Blood lasted all the while; which was thought a just Punishment of their Ancestors Sin against that great Peer, whom the Pope canonized for his Vertues as a State Martyr.

Sixteenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

A little after the Feast of S. Hilary a Parliament was assembled at Westminster, and divers things were enacted for the common Good, concerning the Officers of the Court, as Constable, Steward, Marshal, Clerk of the Market, Admirals, Serjeants at Arms, and Justices of Peace, concerning Weights and Measures, and several other Matters; but the most remarkable Acts that were made this Parliament were, 1. That against the Procurement of Pardons for those Peccantial Crimes of all Societies, Murders, Treasons, and Rapes. The Commons having observed that the King's Pardons were an Encouragement of such Facts, petition'd, That the King would oblige himself not to grant any Pardons for those Crimes. This the King refused to do, because he would not deprive his Crown of a Branch of his Prerogative, which his Ancestors ever enjoy'd, but yet he pass'd an Act in effect the same; for he enacted, That in all Pardons which he granted the Crime should be specified, and the Person at whose Suit it was granted endors'd; and that all Persons who procur'd a Pardon for any guilty of the said Crimes, should be fined according to their Quality, an Archbishop or Duke a 1000*l.* a Bishop or Earl a thousand Marks, an Abbot, Prior, Baron or Baronet, five hundred Mark, and inferior Ranks two hundred Marks, and a Year's Imprisonment; by which means, tho' the King had still his Power to pardon, yet Suiters were so discourag'd, that the Multitude of Pardons much abated: For Kings seldom grant but with importunate asking. 2. That it should be Treason to purchase or bring any Provisions from the Pope for any Ecclesiastical Benefice in England; which tho' it had been before enacted by King Edward III. was not observed, and so it was enforced again to be put in Execution better. These Acts being pass'd, to the great Satisfaction of the Commons, they granted the King several Subsidies, viz. 40*s.* a Sack for Wool, whereof 10*s.* to be paid to the King for his own Expences at Pleasure, and 30*s.* to be put into the Treasury for the Defence of the Nation; and a Tax of 6*d.* by the Pound, 4*d.* to the Treasury and 2*d.* to the King, and then they were dismissed home. At the rising of this Parliament, the King made John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Duke of Aquitaine, and had him enstalled by the Cap and Bonnet, and Edward the eldest Son of the Duke of York Earl of Rutland.

In the beginning of the Spring several unlucky Accidents befel the Nation together: Such a tempestuous Wind arose in March, that blew down many House, and did much other harm in several Parts. The Plague raged much, especially in the North, where many thousands died of it; but it was particularly observed to have the most malignant Effects upon young Men, who very rarely escaped, and were most easily infected with it. At the same time there was a great Scarcity of Corn, so that a Bushel of Wheat was sold for 13*d.* which was thought a great Price in those days. Thus by a Concurrence of Evils, did Divine Providence punish the Irregularities of the People of this Nation.

These Calamities at home made the English more ready to pity and relieve the Afflictions of others abroad; and for that end, two Parties were sent into foreign Countries. The one to Genoa, under the Command of John Beaufort, Natural Son of the Duke of Lancaster, Sir John Russell, Sir John Butler, and others; and the other to Prussia, under the Command of Henry of Lancaster Earl of Darby. The Occasion was this; the Sarazens of Barbary being very troublesome to the Citizens of Genoa, and by their Numbers threatening the Ruine of their Territories, had no way to secure themselves, but by begging the Assistance of the French and English; who looking upon it as the common Interest of Christendom to keep out those Barbarians from Europe, gladly embrac'd the Request of the Genoefes, and sent a choice Army of valiant Men thither. The English pass'd over into France and joined with the Forces, intended for the same Expedition by the French King, with whom they marched to Genoa, and there took Ship to assault the Infidels in Africk. The Sarazens were prepar'd to oppose their landing, and stood on the Shore ready to

The English and French Archers being commanded to attack them, soon made room with their Arrows for their safe footing on the shore, and having slain many of them, put the rest to flight. The Christians went forward to Tunis directly and besieged it, which not being able to withstand their Arms, was soon taken, with the slaughter of the King's Brother, divers great Men, and above four thousand others of the Barbarians. The King himself with a sufficient strength fled into the Castle, and held it out against the Christians six weeks; at the end of which for want of Provision he was obliged to desire Peace, and offer'd them a great Sum of Money to depart his Country. The Christians being much disabled by Sicknefs in their Camp, did not unwillingly hearken to the Proposals; yet pressing for other Conditions, obtain'd farther that they should carry away with them their Prey, and have such Christian Prisoners as they had taken deliver'd to them, and that the Barbarians should from thenceforth oblige themselves to cease from pillaging the Coasts of Italy and France, and then return'd home, laden with Riches and Honour. This was the only Voyage wherein the English and French prov'd successful in their Union, who formerly were used by mutual Dissentions to defeat the design of their Arms. Nor was the Earl of Darby less fortunate in his Achievements. The Lituanians had by their Incursions much afflicted Prussia, and reduced the Inhabitants to great Miseries. But the coming of the English under so brave and daring a Captain soon brought them relief; for they not only drove out the Lituanians, but invaded their Country, and took one of their Cities, the Earl himself being one of the first that scaled the Walls, and set up the English Banners, to the great Honour of himself and his Nation. And thus having restored the People of that Country to their Peace and Safety, he return'd home with an addition of Fame and Honour. While these things were done abroad, the King diverted himself with Feats of Arms at a solemn Jufts, at which twenty four Englishmen challeng'd all Comers, and were encounter'd by as many Foreigners with much Art and Valour. The Earls of S. Paul and Ostronant came over to be Spectators of this honourable Tryal of Courage and Skill, which was deservedly admired. The King gave the Strangers Gold-Chains as Badges of his Favour, and feasted them royally at Kensington several days, till they departed with content. A Parliament met about S. Martin's-day, but gave no Tax, nor did any thing extraordinary.

1391. The King of France considering the detriment that redounded to his Country by continual Dissentions with England, sent over an Embassage<sup>a</sup> about Christmas to make Proposals of a perpetual Peace between the two Nations. King Richard having taken advice with his Council about it, was much encouraged to compliance, and dismissed them with Promises of a speedy Treaty about it. Soon after their departure, the King by the like advice put out a Proclamation, pursuant to the Statute of Provisors made the last Parliament, and had it publish'd in London, commanding all beneficed Clergymen, who were Englishmen by Birth, and then resided in the Court of Rome, to return home within a Year, under the Penalty of forfeiting their Benefices; and if they were not beneficed, under certain other Punishments therein mentioned. This Proclamation

startled the Pope, and made him think that now the English began to be in earnest, and the Laws made against his profit would lie no longer dormant, as they had formerly done. Whereupon the Pope in anger sends his Nuncio over to the King, requiring him to abolish and repeal the said Statutes and Proclamation, so far as they tended to the derogation of the Church's Liberties; otherwise declaring, that he thought himself in Conscience obliged to proceed against all such Persons as had been instrumental in making those Laws according to the severity of the Canons. Moreover he insinuated to the King, that the late Propositions of Peace made by the French King were only intended to farther a design which he had contrived with the Antipope to make himself Emperor, and his Brothers the Dukes of Turin and Anjou, the one King of Tuscany and Lombardy, and the other King of Sicily; which Plot, if he could lull England asleep with hopes of a Peace till he he could effect, he should then be in a capacity of making himself absolute Master of all; which it concern'd England most to prevent, and therefore besought him to assist his Master against the French King, if he invaded Italy as he threaten'd to do. The King seem'd to give a favourable Ear to the Nuncio's words, and having communicated them to his Council, appointed him to stay till the Parliament met, which should be about Michaelmas, and then he should receive a full answer to all his Demands.

The Duke of Glocester went this Spring into Prussia, to the no small trouble of the People. He was always accounted the People's Darling, but it could not be imagined how much he had of the People's Affections before this Voyage; for his departure was as heavily taken as if the Sun had fallen from the Firmament, or the Happiness of the Nation were quite vanish'd with him. His Voyage was very rough and dangerous, as if Providence had been as much against it as the People; for he was carry'd by a violent Tempest upon the Coasts of Norway and Denmark, in his return, and at last with much difficulty arrived at Tinmouth, where he tarry'd a short time to refresh himself, and then return'd to his Mansion-house at Piesbey, receiving infinite Expressions of Joy for his safe arrival all along his Journey thither<sup>d</sup>.

This Summer many great Calamities afflicted the Nation, which seem'd to be presaged by some strange Clouds which cover'd the Sun for six weeks together, and much darken'd the Light of it. They first appear'd red and bloody, and remain'd all day upon the face of it; but at length they turn'd black, and remov'd at noon. Immediately upon the ceasing of this Prodigy follow'd both Pestilence and Famine. The Plague brake out in several parts of the Nation, but rag'd most in Norfolk, and about Tork. In that City there are said to have dy'd ten thousand, and in Norfolk a greater number. The Famine afflicted London, and the adjoining Countries chiefly, which were not so deeply infected with the Plague, but labour'd under so great a scarcity of Corn, that the Poor of the City were fed at the City-charge, two thousand Marks being taken out of the Orphan's Stock to buy Corn, and the twenty four Aldermen being forced to joyn twenty Pound a-piece for the same purpose, that the Wants of the Poor might not create them Troubles and Disturbances. They sold the Corn to such as had Money at a moderate price, and to such as lacked upon trust to be paid the next Year; and so not only preserved the

The Harvest brought an end of these Evils by its plenty; yet the unwholesome Food, which many had liv'd upon in the time of the Famine, cast them into Fluxes and other Distempers, whereof they dy'd in great multitudes. About this time Henry Hotspur Earl of Northumberland, who had been some time Governour of Callis, was call'd home and made Warden of the Marches of Scotland, and Thomas Mowbray Earl of Nottingham was made Lieutenant in his place.

Eighteenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

The Parliament, according to the King's promise to the Pope's Nuncio, met on the day after the Feast of all All-Souls at Westminster. Several things were enacted in this Session to regulate Abuses about the Measures of Corn, the Jurisdiction of the Admiral, Encroachments of the Lords of Mannours upon Freeholders, and other matters of like nature. But the Law which was thought of greatest benefit at that time, and since hath done great service to the Church, was the Act then made about Appropriations. It seems that before this Parliament it was lawful to appropriate the whole Fruits and Profits of any Benefice to a Religious House, upon condition that the Abbot or Prior took care to have the Cure tolerably supply'd by his Monks or Fryars of the House. This bred many Inconveniences, viz. in that Hospitality was neglected, the Churches and Rectories delapidated, and Ministers were often wanting: Whereupon the Commons complain'd, and procur'd this Act, 'That in every License to be made hereafter in Chancery for the appropriation of any Church the Bishop of the Diocese should have power to reserve a convenient Sum of Money out of the Fruits and Profits of it to sustain the poor Parishioners of the said Church, and to endow a perpetual Vicar sufficiently to supply the Cure of Souls constantly. This Act was the original of most of our Vicarages, which tho' they are a contemptible maintenance for the Clergy, especially since the Obventions of the Altar are removed, yet have proved a very great support to the Church, the poorest Livings often producing the most painful and laborious Ministers. So that the Nation hath a great Reason to applaud this Act, because our Governours ever since have been so negligent in providing a better; for had we not had this, 'tis to be feared the Church would have had no provision at all in abundance of places where Vicarages now are.

The Pope's Nuncio an-swer'd by Parliament

The Pope's Complaint against the Statute of Provisors was prefer'd to the Lords and Commons, and the King and Duke of Lancaster laboured all they could to have it repealed; but by all their Interest and Intercession could not obtain it, the Provisions of the Pope being accounted an intolerable grievance to the Nation, yet by much Importunity it was allow'd, that the King by his Proclamation should have power to dispence with the Execution of the Statute till the next Parliament; by which Concession, tho' the Pope gained not so much as he desired, yet he had his ends, it being not very material whether the Lion be dead or no, if his Claws be cut off, and his Teeth knock'd out; for 'tis all one for a Law not to be at all, and not be executed. This Parliament granted the King a tenth from the Clergy, and a fifteenth from the Laity to support the Charges of the Duke of Lancaster, who was in the Lent following to go over to Amiens to treat of a final Peace with the King of France in person; and 'twas thought necessary that he should be attended with a princely Equipage for the Honour of the Nation, and in respect to the King. And because an Invasion was fear'd from Scotland, therefore another tenth and fifteenth was granted, upon condition that it should not be gather'd, unless the Scots were so troublesome that an Expedition against them were judged necessary. And then the Parliament was dissolv'd, and sent home.

The King and Queen, with a great Concourse of the Bishops, Nobles and Ladies, kept their Christmas at Langley with mighty Magnificence and Splendour. On Christmas-day a large Dolphin of ten Foot long, and of a great bigness, was taken about London-Bridge; his coming so far up to land-ward was look'd upon as a Prefage of that tempestuous and stormy Weather which follow'd in a few days. Soon after Christmas the Duke of Lancaster, with the Bishop of Durham, and several others of the Nobility, having with them a train of a thousand Horsemen, set forward towards France, to the place of Treaty at Amiens. The King of France having heard a great Character of him for his Wisdom and Prudence (and indeed he was one of the wisest and greatest Peers of those days) made as magnificent Preparations for his Reception, as if he had been the greatest Emperor in the World, and met him himself at Amiens, with his Brother the Duke of Touraine, and his Uncles the Dukes of Berry, Bourbon, and Burgoyne, and many other Peers of France. The Charges of the English Ambassadors and their Retinue was born by the French King from their coming from Callis till they return'd thither again. At the Treaty divers Propositions for Peace were made on each side, but both Parties were so cautious to settle an advantageous Peace to themselves, especially since it was to continue so long by agreement, that nothing was concluded farther, than that the Truce which was then on foot, and to end at Midsummer, should continue another Year, and in the mean time more effectual Counsels should be taken at the meeting of the next Parliament for the conclusion of the intended Peace; and so the Duke of Lancaster and his Retinue return'd home again. In the absence of the Duke, the King having expended his Treasure for this Embassy, was in want of Money, and sent to the Citizens of London to borrow of them One (or, as others say, Ten) thousand Pounds. The Londoners, unmindful of their Duty to their Prince, flatly deny'd to answer his Request themselves; and when they understood that an Italian Lombard, or Banker, had undertaken to furnish the King with the desired Sum, they beat and abused him so grossly that he was in danger of Death. The King was so displeas'd with this insolent and rude answer, that he propounded it to his Council, and desired their Advice how he should deal with them, and was encouraged to repress their disloyal and impudent Behaviour with Severity and Arms. But the King himself considering that the Denial it self was lawful (for 'twas not reasonable for him to force their Estates from them) tho' the manner of doing it was very unbecoming Subjects, wisely wav'd his Resentments till a fitter opportunity should offer it self to retaliate their Unkindness more deservedly upon them, which his watchful Eye soon found out.

Soon after the Duke of Lancaster's arrival in England, the King call'd a great Council at Stamford, like a Parliament, for the King summon'd * Froissard, who was about that time in England, writes, That the Duke of York was joyn'd in this Commission with the Duke of Lancaster, and not the Bishop of Durham, as Walsingham relates; the former account is most probable, considering the high Quality of those they were to treat with.

A. D. 1392. some of the chief Men for Wisdom and Experience in most of the Towns of England, to consult about the Peace to be concluded with France, or resolve upon a War as soon as the current Truce was expired. The Duke of Lancaster put the King upon this Determination, because the King of France had engag'd him to hasten the Peace, that he might restore Leo King of Armenia, and subdue the other Barbarians, who were troublesome to Christendom. This Council had long and hot Debates among themselves about the Expediency and Conditions of the Peace propounded, but came to no Resolution; and so much the rather, because at that time the Duke of Gelderland, the King's Cousin, a valiant and stout Prince, came over; and advised the King to make no Agreement of Peace with the King of France, but upon such Conditions as were both advantageous and honourable to himself and Realm; promising him an Assistance of a considerable Body of Men, if he had occasion to make War either against the French or Scots. This Offer made the King, and whole Assembly, more indifferent to the Peace, and more resolute to obtain good Conditions if it went on.

Reg. 16. While these things were transacting for the publick Good, an unhappy Accident fell out at London; which from an inconsiderable beginning proceeded so far, as to make the Citizens as much stand in need of the King's Favour, as he did a little before of their Money. The Occasion was this: A Baker's Man carrying a Basket of Bread thro' Fleet-street to his Master's Customers, as he pass'd by the Bishop of Salisbury's Palace, had a Loaf taken out of his Basket by one Walter Roman the Bishop's Servant*. The Baker concern'd at the Loss, endeavour'd to take it from the Man by force, but was worsted by the Servant, and wounded in the Scuffle. The People of the Street knowing that the Baker had received the Wrong, as well as the Abuse, gather'd together to apprehend the Bishop's Servant, and have him punished for the Breach of the Peace; but his Fellow Servants seeing him in danger, got him into the Palace, and secur'd him against them. The People without, being enrag'd more by this Rescue, first peaceably, by the Constable, demand'd the Servant that had thus wronged the Baker's Man; but they denying to resign him, the unruly Rabble, who loved not the Bishop, nor much feared him, tho' at that time Lord Treasurer, began to be very outrageous, endeavouring to force open the Gates, and because they had Resistance that they could not, threaten'd to fire them. The Mayor, Sheriffs, and Aldermen, had Information of this Tumult, and with all Care and Speed sought to repress it; but the Commons were grown so numerous, and so justly provok'd, that neither Force nor Persuasions would prevail a long time: But at last, by much Intreaty, they appeased them, and sent them quietly home. The Bishop himself was then with the King at Windsor, and soon receiv'd an Account of his Servants about this Tumult; which that it might not seem foul on their side, represented the Citizens as spitefully as they could. The Bishop, who hated them in general, because they were commonly reputed Favourers of Wickliffe, and so Enemies to the Church, entertain'd the Relation with much Passion; and having acquainted Thomas Arundel Archbishop of York, and then Lord Chancellor, with it, immediately preferred a grievous Complaint of the City to the King, as if the Tumult had been encourag'd by the Heads of it, and was a malicious Outrage not only against the Church but State, he being both Treasurer and Bishop. The King, who kept his former Displeasure in his Breast, needed no Insigations upon so good an Occasion; but being farther incens'd by the Aggravations they made use of, was most furiously enrag'd and threaten'd to raze the City: But his Heat being allay'd by the Mediation of some of the Nobility, he sent for the Mayor, Sheriffs, and other chief Citizens to Court, and objected many Crimes and Disorders against them. They made a modest and plain Defence, but nothing would be accepted as sufficient; wherefore the Mayor was imprison'd at Windsor, and the rest of them sent to other Gaols, and all the Liberties and Privileges of the City seized into his own hands. The Authority of the Mayor was wholly removed, and the King put in a Governour under the Name of the Warden of the City. This Office was first conferred on Sir Edward Darlington, or as others say, Balerigge, on June 21. but he being thought to be too great a Friend to the Citizens, was in less than a Fortnight removed, and Sir Baldwin Radington plac'd in his room. He was a very prudent Man, and carry'd himself with such Austerity and Care, that he pleas'd both the King and City, and gave them some hopes, that by their contented Obedience to him and Submission to the King, they might in a little time obtain his Favour again. The Citizens, in this Condition, were very much discontented, and made humble Suit by the Queen, the Duke of Gloucester, the Bishop of London, and other noble Personages, to the King to be restored again to their ancient Liberties and Immunities. Who so far prevail'd at length with him by the Remembrance of their former good Services and rich Presents, that he sent for their Charter, and other Grants of Liberties to their City, which he caus'd to be diligently perus'd; and allowing some, and cancelling others, restor'd the City again to their ancient State and Favour, excepting their Government by a Mayor, which they could not obtain, till at several times they presented the King with two thousand Marks of Gold, and ten thousand Pound in Silver: So that in the end, the Denial of lending ten thousand Pound<sup>a</sup> cost them above as much more, and that Favour which they might have gotten by mere Compliance, they were forced to buy at a dear rate, and glad they could so attain it. This Reconciliation being finish'd, the Mayor, and Sheriffs, were chosen again after their usual manner, and the Terms which had been removed from Westminster to York, were again restored. The Bishop of London, who had had a principal Interest in making this Peace, was much honoured by the Citizens all his Life for it; and after his Death the Mayor, Aldermen, and many chief Citizens, according to their Companies, went nine times a Year in a solemn Procession to Westminster, where he lay bury'd, to pray for his Soul and the Souls of all Christians, as a grateful return of his Kindness to them.

The Irish about this time revolted from their Subjection, and the Duke of Gloucester being first made Duke of Ireland, was furnish'd with Money to raise an Army for an Expedition thither; which he did with all imaginable Care, and had gotten a very great Force ready to pass thither. His great Name had almost subdu'd all the Re-

But the Enemies of the Duke envying him the Honour of being so great a Benefactor to the common Good, prevail'd with the King so that he was countermanded, to the great Grief of the Commons, and Damage of both Kingdoms<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>1393.</sup> A little after Christmas the Parliament met at Winchester, and divers good Acts for the publick Benefit were made; as concerning Merchant-Strangers, Weights, and Measures; Freedom of Freeholders from Suit and Service in the Lords Courts, and the Acts to punish such as obtained Pardons for Murther, Treasons, and Rapes, repealed. But the Act of greatest Fame, was the Statute called the Statute of Præmunire, made this Session, by and in which it was enacted, 'That whereas the Bishop of Rome, under a Pretence of an absolute Supremacy over the Church, took upon him to dispose by his Mandates of most of the Bishopricks, Abbacies, and other Ecclesiastical Benefices of Worth in England; and if the Bishops did, upon the Legal Presentments of the Patrons of such Benefices, institute any Clerks to them, they were thereupon excommunicated by the Pope, to the great Damage and unjust Wrong of the King's good Subjects. And whereas the Bishop of Rome took upon him to translate and remove the said Bishops either out of the Realm, or from one See to another within the Realm, without the Knowledge of the King, or Consent of the Bishops themselves. If any Person shall purchase, or cause to be purchased in the Court of Rome, any such Translations, Sentences of Excommunication, Bulls, or other Instruments, to the Detriment of the King and his Realm, both they, and such as bring, receive, notifie, or put them in Execution, shall be put out of the King's Protection, and their Lands and Tenements, Goods and Chattels, forfeited to the King, and their Bodies attach'd, if they can be found, Process being made out against them by the Writ called Præmunire facias, as is ordain'd in other former Statutes of Provisors. This Statute was badly resented at Rome by the Pope, who was very peevish for the Statute of Mortmain, and other less severe Acts against his Incroachment made a little before; but this put him into such a Fury, that he immediately sent a Letter to the Duke of Bedford, wherein he calls the Act it self Execrabile Statutum, a cursed Statute, and the passing of it, Fædum & turpe facinus, a wicked and base Act. In this Parliament the Laity gave the King no Tax, but the Clergy yielded him half a Tenth to furnish out the Dukes of Lancaster and Glocester for their Negotiation into France, to compleat the Peace between the two Kingdoms, by which they shewed their Duty to their Prince and Zeal for Peace.

The Duke of Ireland died at Lovain. In the time of this Session Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, and Duke of Ireland, died at Lovain in Brabant in great Anguish of Mind and Poverty, and the King conferred his Honour of Earl of Oxford upon his Uncle, the Lord Aubery de Vere. By the Death also of John Eures, Constable of Dover Castle, and Lord Steward of the King's House, several Promotions were made at Court: For the Lord Thomas Peirce, who was Vice-Chamberlain, was raised to be the Lord High Steward; the Lord Thomas Beaumont was made Constable of Dover Castle and Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and the Lord William Scroop was made Vice-Chamberlain, and soon after bought the Regality of the Isle of Man (for that Isle was reputed a Kingdom, and the Lords of it are crown'd with a Crown of Gold) of the Lord William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, but he only held it for his own Life.

In the Spring of this Year the Dukes of Lancaster and Glocester, the Earl of Darby, and several other Peers<sup>d</sup>, passed over to Callis in order to finish the Treaty then in hand. They had a full Commission to conclude a Peace both by Sea and Land between the Kingdoms of England and France and their Allies. The Commissioners for the King of France were the Dukes of Burgogne and Berry: The Place of Treaty was Balingham<sup>e</sup>, where were stately Tents erected for their meeting. Here they met several days together, and after their Commissions were looked into, Proposals were laid down and argu'd on both sides. The Frenchmen required to have Callis razed, but the Dukes of Lancaster and Glocester answer'd, That they had no Power to treat in that Matter, and that they knew that their Master would hold it in Demesne and Inheritance; and if they intended to conclude the Peace, they must not mention it any farther, which smart Reply put an end to that Demand. Then the Dukes of Lancaster and Glocester insisted, That the Countries on that side, which had of late been either in the Possession of King Edward III. or King Richard their Master, should be restored, and the Florens which were left unpaid by reason of the War, should now be paid; which the English Lawyers proved to be agreeable to Reason and Equity. But the Frenchmen argu'd much against it, and would by no means yield to neither: So that their Debates were adjourned for nine days, that the Kings on both sides might be acquainted with what they had done. The Duke of Glocester, who was for no Peace with France, but upon very good Terms; for which Reason the People desired that he might be a Commissioner, was very resolute to have no Peace, unless the former Conditions were granted. But the French King, and Nobles, as well as King Richard and the Duke of Lancaster, were very desirous to bring it to an end, and so a Truce at their next meeting was made for four Years; and had not the King of France fallen suddenly into his old Disease of the four Years Frenzy, it is thought a longer and firmer Peace had been concluded, tho' without the Consent of the Duke of Glocester, who in his heart was wholly for War with France; which having brought so much advantage to the Nation formerly, was most desir'd by the People, whom the Duke sought to please above all things.

After the Conclusion of this Truce the King made Sir Thomas Peirce, the younger, Lord War-den of Bordeaux and Aquitain, and sent him thither: The Nation also suffer'd much by Tempests and excessive Rains. There were such vio-

<sup>a</sup> Holinhead, from whom our Author has taken this Event, says the Duke of Glocester was created Duke of Ireland; but that is very much to be doubted, the rather, for that the Earl of Oxford, on whom King Richard had bestow'd that Title, was not then dead; and tho' he was attainted, yet King Richard lov'd him still too well to give his Honour to his Enemy: Besides, that Title was so odious, that the Duke of Glocester would hardly have accepted of it; and no good Author, except Holinhead, has taken notice of it.

<sup>b</sup> There was no Duke of Bedford at that time, the first that bore that Title was John Brocher to Henry V. and after his Death Regent of France.

<sup>c</sup> Neither the House of Mountacute, nor that of Stanly, were permitted to wear a Crown of Gold; the Regalia being only a Leaden Crown, and the Robes that belong to them as Peers of England.

In other parts such abundance of Rain fell, especially about Bury in Suffolk, and New-Market, that the Floods carry'd away many Bridges and Houses. The Pestilence raged in Essex, and swept away great Multitudes. Other things happen'd also concurrent with these accidents. The Lord Rofs returning out of the Holy-land dy'd at Paphos. The Town of Chierburg, which was engaged to King Richard for the payment of two thousand Marks<sup>a</sup> by the King of Navarr, was restored to the said King upon the payment of the said Sum. Three Scotch Gentlemen also challenged three Englisch to fight at Jufts, viz. the Earl of Mar, the Lord Nottingham; Sir William Darrell the King of Scots Banner-bearer, Sir Peirce Courtney the King of England's Standard-bearer; and one Cockburn Esq; Sir Nicholas Hawkirke. In this Tryal of Manhood the Englisch were Victors, for the Earl of Mar and Cockburn were unhorsed by their Opponents, the former being so bruised and wounded by the fall, that he dy'd in his return home; Darrell ran five Courses, and was so equally match'd, that they neither were Victors.

1394. Twentieth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes. A Parliament met at Westminster a little after the Feast of St. Hilary, and after some things of common concern were enacted, the King growing weary of the Charge which he was at to maintain his Dominions in Ireland against the rebellious Natives, desired a Tax to enable him to make an Expedition into that Nation to reduce it by force; for as it now stood, 'twas an insupportable Burthen to England, the King being yearly at thirty thousand Pound charge to preserve the Dominion of that Island, which had brought formerly thirty thousand Pound a Year into his Treasury. The Houses yielded to his desires, and the Clergy granted him a tenth if he went into Ireland, but half a tenth only if he went not. In this Parliament the Duke of Lancaster accused the Earl of Arundel of encouraging and assisting the Commons of Chester against him, lying in his Castle of Holt by Chester with a Body of Men, while the People under one Nicholas Clifton assaulted the Duke's House. But the Earl of Arundel flatly deny'd that he had the least Intention that way, and gave such probable Reasons in his own defence, that he was clear'd of any such design, and by the mediation of certain great Persons was perfectly reconcil'd to the Duke.

The King immediately after the Dissolution of this Parliament made a speedy preparation for his Expedition into Ireland; but when he was almost ready his beloved Queen Ann dy'd at Sbene near Richmond in Surry, which put a stop to his proceedings awhile; for as he was always fond of her while she liv'd, so he was passionately griev'd for her when she dy'd; of which he gave this memorable proof, 'That he curs'd the place of her Death, and so hated it ever after; that he would never come there, but commanded the Buildings to be demolished. And indeed she is said to be a Princess of so great Worth both for Virtue and Piety, that the greatest Love was but her due. In the blind Age she liv'd in, she enjoy'd Light, and could not endure the implicit Devotion of the Romish Church. She had the Gospels in Englisch, and several of the best Expositors upon them. She favour'd Wickliffe's Doctrines, and had several of his Books, which after her A. D. Death being carry'd by her Maids into Bohemia, 1394. were a means of promoting the Reformation there. She was bury'd at Westminster, and a Sermon preach'd at her Interment by Thomas Arundel Archbishop of York, in which he commends her for her great pains in the study of Scripture, and reading Godly Books, in which, said he, she was more diligent than the Prelates themselves, tho' their Office and Business required it. Her Funerals being celebrated, the King, tho' full of Sorrow, went on in his design, which had been put off for some Months; and having by Proclamation commanded all Irishmen to depart the Kingdom before the Nativity of our Lady, Sept. 8. about Michaelmas he set forward for Ireland, attended by the Duke of Glocester, Earls of March, Nottingham and Rutland, Thomas Lord Peirey, and divers others, his Army consisting of four thousand Horse, and three thousand Foot. The Duke of Lancaster was not with him, because the King had a little before given the Dukedom of Aquitain to him and his Heirs, and sent him with five hundred Men at Arms and a thousand Archers to take possession of it. The King landed at Waterford in the beginning of October, and encamped his Army<sup>b</sup> very warily, expecting a vigorous assault from the Enemy at first; but they perceiving themselves too weak to oppose so strong an Army in a pitch Battel, did nothing against him but by surprize, falling suddenly upon some part of their Camp, or upon straggling Forragers, and lurking in their boggy Woods and Mountains when they advanced against them; by which, tho' they sav'd their Persons, yet they left their Estates and Towns expos'd to the Mercy of the Englisch, who so well used the advantage, that the Irish were forced to come in and submit themselves to the King to save their Estates. The chief of them were four Kings, viz. O-neal the Great, King of Meath, Brine King of Thomond, Arthur Macmur King of Lempster, and Conbur King of Cheveno and Darp, whom he courteously entertain'd and kept with him, lest they should relapse into their former disobedience, if they return'd to their People again. He kept his Christmas at Dublin, and at the end of that Feast held a Parliament there, calling all his Subjects to it, as well those who had lately submitted, as those who had continu'd in their Loyalty, that by his impartial favour he might equally oblige them to Fidelity for the future.

About the Feast of Epiphany, the Duke of York 1395. the King's Uncle, who was Lord-Warden of England, called a Parliament by the King's Order to provide him farther Supplies to carry on his Expedition, and the Duke of Glocester was sent over to represent to the Parliament the state of the King's Affairs, and desire another Tax. There needed little Rhetorick to persuade, when the Reason and Condition of things required it, and therefore they readily granted a tenth of the Clergy and a fifteenth of the Laity for the King's supply; yet humbly petitioning, that the Settlement of things in Ireland might be effected as soon as possible. Other matters were put off till the King's return, and so the Parliament was dismissed without making any Acts of publick concern. Yet while it sat, the Followers of Wickliffe, then call'd Lollards, being grown numerous among the common People, and having gotten some Friends in the Houses, by which they were encouraged to attempt a Reformation of the Dis-

1. That Pride, through the greatness of the Temporalities, daily increased in the Church, and Faith, Hope and Charity decayed.
2. That the present Priesthood was not the Priesthood of Christ's Institution.
3. That the Celibacy of the Priests was the cause of Sodomy, Whoredom, and other foul Sins.
4. That Transubstantiation engaged Christians in a brutish Idolatry.
5. That Exorcisms and Consecrations were not of divine Appointment, but magical Incantations.
6. That it was very unseemly for Prelates to be Justices of Peace, and Curates civil Officers.
7. That Prayers for the Dead were a bad motive of Almsh-giving.
8. That Pilgrimages to Crucifixes, to our Lady's Image, &c. were Idolatrous.
9. That Auricular Confession makes Priests arrogant and proud, and is an encouragement of Sin.
10. That Manlaughter and War for Temporal Gains, or Religion sake, is unlawful.
11. That Womens Vows of Chastity produced much Sin.
12. That multitudes of Arts and Trades which were not necessary, were a means of begetting much Pride and Vanity among Christians.
